

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "ECARTE."

DEDICATED TO THE FORTY-FIRST BRITISH REGIMENT BY A ONCE SHARER IN THEIR SERVICE.

Note to the first American edition.

Although the following work has been received with great favour by the reading public in England, it is in this country, where the scene is laid, and where we are more familiar with the Indian character, that its merits can be best tested. Though not without defects, yet, taken as a whole, we think it will be pronounced a very superior production. For deep interest throughout, it has few rivals of the modern school, and the style and language are in general excellent. We feel compelled on a second perusal to consider it highly creditable to the author, and an earnest of still higher flights in a field so successfully trodden by our own Cooper. It is the more remarkable as coming from the pen of the author of "Ecarté, or the Saloons of Paris," a work in which the gaming houses of the French capital, and its dissipation were the subjects—scenes which are strongly contrasted with those here portrayed.

CHAPTER I.

INTRODUCTORY.

A few cursory remarks, illustrative of the general features of the country where the scene of the following events is laid, may not be misplaced at the opening of this volume.

Without entering into minute geographical detail, it may be necessary merely to state that the most distant of the northwestern settlements of America is Michillimackinac, a name given by the Indians, and preserved by the Americans, who possess the fort even to this hour. It is situated at the head of the Lakes Michigan and Huron, and adjacent to the Island of St. Joseph's, where, since the existence of the United States as an independent republic, an English garrison has been maintained, with a view of keeping the original fortress in check. From the lakes we descend into the River Sinclair, which, in turn, disembogues itself into the lake of the same name. This again renders tribute to the Detroit, a broad majestic river, not less than a mile in breadth at its source, and progressively widening towards its mouth until it is finally lost in the beautiful Lake Erie. From the embouchure of this latter lake commences the Chippawa, better known from the celebrity of its stupendous falls of Niagara, which form an impassable barrier to the seaman, and, for a short space, sever the otherwise uninterrupted chain connecting the remote fortresses we have described with the Atlantic. At a distance of a few miles from the falls, the Chippawa finally empties itself into the Ontario, the most splendid of the gorgeous American lakes. At the opposite extremity of this magnificent and sea-like lake, the famed St. Lawrence takes its source; and after passing through a vast tract of country, connects itself with the Lake Champlain, celebrated, as well as Erie, for a signal defeat of the British flotilla during the late contest with the Americans.

The several forts and harbours established along the left bank of the St. Lawrence, and throughout that portion of the British possessions which is known as Lower Canada, are necessarily, from the improved condition and more numerous population of that province, on a larger scale and of better appointment; but in Upper Canada, where the traces of civilisation are less evident throughout, and become gradually more faint as we advance westward, the fortresses and harbours bear the same proportion in strength and extent to the scantiness of the population they are erected to protect.

At the epoch of our story, it will be borne in mind, the United States were the British colonies of America dependent on the mother country; while the Canadas, on the contrary, were, or had very recently been, under the dominion of France, from whom they had been wrested after a long struggle, greatly advanced in favour of England by the glorious battle fought on the plains of Abraham, near Quebec, and celebrated for the defeat of Montcalm and the death of Wolfe.

The several attempts made to repossess themselves of the strong hold of Quebec having, in every instance, been met by discomfiture and disappointment, the French, in despair, relinquished the contest, and, by treaty, ceded their claims to the Canadas,—an event that was hastened by the capitulation of the garrison of Montreal, commanded by the Marquis de Vaudreuil, to the victorious arms of General Amherst. Still, though conquered as a people, many of the leading men in the country, actuated by that jealousy for which they were remarkable, contrived to oppose obstacles to the quiet possession of a conquest by those whom they seemed to look upon as their hereditary enemies; and in furtherance of this object, paid agents, men of artful and intriguing character, were dispersed among the numerous tribes of savages, with a view of exciting them to acts of hostility against their conquerors. The long and uninterrupted possession, by the French, of those countries immediately bordering on the hunting grounds and haunts of the natives, with whom they carried on an extensive traffic in furs, had established a communion of interest between themselves and those savage and warlike people, which failed not to turn to account the vindictive views of the former. The whole of the province of Upper Canada at that time possessed but a scanty population, protected in its most flourishing and defensive points by stockade forts; the chief object of which was to secure the garrisons, consisting each of a few companies, from any sudden surprise on the part of the natives.

These stockade forts were never, at any one period, nearer to each other than from one hundred and fifty to two hundred miles, so that, in the event of surprise or alarm, there was little prospect of obtaining assistance from without. Each garrison, therefore, was almost wholly dependent on its own resources; and, when surrounded unexpectedly by numerous bands of hostile Indians, had no other alternative than to hold out to the death. Capitulation was out of the question; for, although the wile and artifice of the natives might induce them to promise mercy, the moment their enemies were in their power promises and treaties were alike broken, and indiscriminate massacre ensued. Communication by water was, except during a period of profound peace, almost impracticable; for, although of late years the lakes of Canada have been covered with vessels of war, many of them of vast magnitude, and been the theatres of conflicts that would not have disgraced the salt waters of ocean itself, at the period to which our story refers the flag of England was seen to wave only on the solitary mast of some ill-armed and ill-manned gun boat, employed rather for the purpose of conveying despatches from fort to fort, than with any serious view to acts either of aggression or defence.

In proportion as the colonies of America, now the United States, pushed their course of civilisation westward, in the same degree did the numerous tribes of Indians, who had hitherto dwelt more seaward, retire upon those of their own countrymen, who, buried in vast and impenetrable forests, had seldom yet seen the face of the European stranger; so that, in the end, all the more central parts of those stupendous wilds became doubly peopled. Hitherto, however, that civilisation had not been carried beyond the state of New York; and all those countries which have, since the American revolution, been added to the Union under the names of Kentucky, Ohio, Missouri, Michigan, &c., were, at the period embraced by our story, inhospitable and unproductive woods, subject only to the dominion of the native, and as yet unshorn by the axe of the cultivator. A few portions only of the opposite shores of Michigan were occupied by emigrants from the Canadas, who, finding no one to oppose or molest them, selected the most fertile spots along the banks of the river; and of the existence of these infant settlements, the English colonists, who had never ventured so far, were not even aware until after the conquest of Canada by the mother country. This particular district was the centre around which the numerous warriors, who had been driven westward by the colonists, had finally assembled; and rude villages and encampments rose far and near for a circuit of many miles around this infant settlement and fort of the Canadians, to both of which they had given the name of Detroit, after the river on whose elevated banks they stood. Proceeding westward from this point, and along the tract of country that diverged from the banks of the Lakes Huron, Sinclair, and Michigan, all traces of that partial civilisation were again lost in impervious wilds, tenanted only by the fiercest of the Indian tribes, whose homes were principally along the banks of Lake Superior, and in the country surrounding the isolated fort of Michillimackinac, the last and most remote of the European fortresses in Canada.

When at a later period the Canadas were ceded to Great Britain by France, those parts of the opposite frontier which we have just described became also tributary to the English crown, and were, by the peculiar difficulties that existed to communication with the more central and populous districts, rendered especially favourable to the exercise of hostile intrigue by the numerous active French emissaries every where dispersed among the Indian tribes. Fired by their wily suggestions, the high and jealous spirit of the Indian chiefs took the alarm, and they beheld with impatience the "Red Coat," or "Saganaw," usurping, as they deemed it, those possessions which had so recently acknowledged the supremacy of the pale flag of their ancient ally. Such was the state of things in 1763, the period at which our story commences,—an epoch fruitful in designs of hostility and treachery on the part of the Indians. Several inferior forts situated on the Ohio had already fallen into their hands, when they summoned all their address and cunning to accomplish the fall of the two important though remote posts of Detroit and Michillimackinac. For a length of time they were baffled by the activity and vigilance of the respective governors of these forts, who had had too much fatal experience in the fate of their companions not to be perpetually on the alert against their guile; but when they had at length, in some degree, succeeded in lulling the suspicions of the English, they determined on a scheme, suggested by a leading chief, a man of more than ordinary character, which promised fair to rid them altogether of a race they so cordially detested. We will not, however, mar the interest of our tale, by anticipating, at this early stage, either the nature or the success of a stratagem which forms the essential groundwork of our story.

And now we have partially explained a course of events which were in some measure necessary to the full understanding of the country by the majority of our readers, we shall, in furtherance of the same object, proceed to sketch a few of the most prominent scenes more immediately before us.

The fort of Detroit, as it was originally constructed by the French, stands in the middle of a common, or description of small prairie, bounded by woods, which were at that time untouched by the hand of civilisation. Erected at a distance of about half a mile from the banks of the river, which at that particular point are high and precipitous, it stood then just far enough from the woods that swept round it in a semicircular form to be secure from the rifle of the Indian; while from its batteries it commanded a range of country on every hand, which no enemy unsupported by cannon could traverse with impunity. Immediately in the rear, and on the skirt of the wood, the French had constructed a sort of bomb-proof, possibly intended to serve as a cover to the workmen originally employed in clearing the woods, but long since suffered to fall into decay. Without the fortification rose a strong and triple line of pickets, each of about two feet and a half in circumference, and so fitted into each other as to leave no other interstices than those which were perforated for the discharge of musketry. They were formed of the hardest and most knotted pines that could be procured; the sharp points of which were seasoned by fire until they acquired nearly the durability and consistency of iron. Beyond these firmly imbedded pickets was a ditch, encircling the fort, of about twenty feet in width, and of proportionate depth, the only communication over which to and from the garrison was by means of a drawbridge, protected by a strong chevaux-de-frise. The only gate with which the fortress was provided faced the river; on the more immediate banks of which, and to the left of the fort, rose the yet infant and straggling village that bore the name of both. Numerous farm-houses, however, almost joining each other, contributed to form a continuity of many miles along the borders of the river, both on the right and on the left; while the opposite shores of Canada, distinctly seen in the distance, presented, as far as the eye could reach, the same enlivening character of fertility. The banks, covered with verdure on either shore, were more or less undulating at intervals; but in general they were high without being abrupt, and picturesque without being bold, presenting, in their partial cultivation, a striking contrast to the dark, tall, and frowning forests bounding every point of the perspective.

At a distance of about five miles on the left of the town the course of the river was interrupted by a small and thickly wooded island, along whose sandy beach occasionally rose the low cabin or wigwam, which the birch canoe, carefully upturned and left to dry upon the sands, attested to be the temporary habitation of the wandering Indian. That branch of the river which swept by the shores of Canada was (as at this day) the only navigable one for vessels of burden, while that on the opposite coast abounded in shallows and bars, affording passage merely to the light barks of the natives, which seemed literally to skim the very surface of its waves. Midway between that point of the continent which immediately faced the eastern extremity of the island we have just named and the town of Detroit, flowed a small tributary river, the approaches to which, on either hand, were over a slightly sloping ground, the view of which could be entirely commanded from the fort. The depth of this river, now nearly dried up, at that period varied from three to ten or twelve feet; and over this, at a distance of about twenty yards from the Detroit, into which it emptied itself, rose, communicating with the high road, a bridge, which will more than once be noticed in the course of our tale. Even to the present hour it retains the name given to it during these disastrous times; and there are few modern Canadians, or even Americans, who traverse the "Bloody Bridge," especially at the still hours of advanced night, without recalling to memory the tragic events of those days, (handed down as they have been by their fathers, who were eye-witnesses of the transaction,) and peopling the surrounding gloom with the shades of those whose life-blood erst crimsoned the once pure waters of that now nearly exhausted stream; and whose mangled and headless corpses were slowly borne by its tranquil current into the bosom of the parent river, where all traces of them finally disappeared.

What Detroit was in 1763 it nearly is at the present day, with this difference, however, that many of those points which were then in a great degree isolated and rude are now redolent with the beneficent effects of improved cultivation; and in the immediate vicinity of that memorable bridge, where formerly stood merely the occasional encampment of the Indian warrior, are now to be seen flourishing farms and crops, and other marks of agricultural industry. At the final cession of the Canadas, the fort was delivered over to England, with whom it remained until the acknowledgment of the independence of the colonies by the mother country, when it hoisted the colours of the republic.

CHAPTER II.

It was during the midnight watch, late in September, 1763, that the English garrison of Detroit, was thrown into the utmost consternation by the sudden and mysterious introduction of a stranger within its walls. The circumstance at this moment was particularly remarkable; for the period was so fearful and pregnant with events of danger, the fort being assailed on every side by a powerful and vindictive foe, that a caution and vigilance of no common kind were unceasingly exercised by the prudent governor for the safety of those committed to his charge. A long series of hostilities had been pursued by the North American Indians against the subjects of England, within the few years that had succeeded to the final subjection of the Canadas to her victorious arms; and many and sanguinary were the conflicts in which the devoted soldiery were made to succumb to the cunning and numbers of their savage enemies. In those lone regions, both officers and men, in their respective ranks, were, by a communionship of suffering, isolation, and peculiarity of duty, drawn towards each other with feelings of almost fraternal affection; and the fates of those who fell were lamented with sincerity of soul, and avenged, when opportunity offered, with a determination prompted equally by indignation and despair. This sentiment of union, existing even between men and officers of different corps, was, with occasional exceptions, of course doubly strengthened among those who fought under the same colours, and acknowledged the same head; and, as it often happened in Canada, during this interesting period, that a single regiment was distributed into two or three fortresses, each so far removed from the other that communication could with the utmost facility be cut off, the anxiety and uncertainty of these detachments became proportioned to the danger with which they knew themselves to be more immediately beset. The garrison of Detroit, at the date above named, consisted of a third of the ——— regiment, the remainder of which occupied the forts of Michillimackinac and Niagara, and to each division of this regiment was attached an officer's command of artillery. It is true that no immediate overt act of hostility had for some time been perpetrated by the Indians, who were assembled in force around the former garrison; but the experienced officer to whom the command had been intrusted was too sensible of the craftiness of the surrounding hordes to be deceived, by any outward semblance of amity, into neglect of those measures of precaution which were so indispensable to the surety of his trust.

In this he pursued a line of policy happily adapted to the delicate nature of his position. Unwilling to excite the anger or wound the pride of the chiefs, by any outward manifestation of distrust, he affected to confide in the sincerity of their professions, and, by inducing his officers to mix occasionally in their councils, and his men in the amusements of the inferior warriors, contrived to impress the conviction that he reposed altogether on their faith. But, although these acts were in some degree coerced by the necessity of the times, and a perfect knowledge of all the misery that must accrue to them in the event of their provoking the Indians into acts of open hostility, the prudent governor took such precautions as were deemed efficient to defeat any treacherous attempt at violation of the tacit treaty on the part of the natives. The officers never ventured out, unless escorted by a portion of their men, who, although appearing to be dispersed among the warriors, still kept sufficiently together to be enabled, in a moment of emergency, to afford succour not only to each other, but to their superiors. On these occasions, as a further security against surprise, the troops left within were instructed to be in readiness, at a moment's warning, to render assistance, if necessary, to their companions, who seldom, on any occasion, ventured out of reach of the cannon of the fort, the gate of which was hermetically closed, while numerous supernumerary sentinels were posted along the ramparts, with a view to give the alarm if any thing extraordinary was observed to occur without.

Painful and harassing as were the precautions it was found necessary to adopt on these occasions, and little desirous as were the garrison to mingle with the natives on such terms, still the plan was pursued by the governor from the policy already named: nay, it was absolutely essential to the future interests of England that the Indians should be won over by acts of confidence and kindness; and so little disposition had hitherto been manifested by the English to conciliate, that every thing was to be apprehended from the untameable rancour with which these people were but too well disposed to repay a neglect at once galling to their pride and injurious to their interests.

Such, for a term of many months, had been the trying and painful duty that had devolved on the governor of Detroit; when, in the summer of 1763, the whole of the western tribes of Indians, as if actuated by one common impulse, suddenly threw off the mask, and commenced a series of the most savage trespasses upon the English settlers in the vicinity of the several garrisons, who were cut off in detail, without mercy, and without reference to either age or sex. On the first alarm the weak bodies of troops, as a last measure of security, shut themselves up in their respective forts, where they were as incapable of rendering assistance to others as of receiving it themselves. In this emergency the prudence and forethought of the governor of Detroit were eminently conspicuous; for, having long foreseen the possibility of such a crisis, he had caused a plentiful supply of all that was necessary to the subsistence and defence of the garrison to be provided at an earlier period, so that, if foiled in their attempts at stratagem, there was little chance that the Indians would speedily reduce them by famine. To guard against the former, a vigilant watch was constantly kept by the garrison both day and night, while the sentinels, doubled in number, were constantly on the alert. Strict attention, moreover, was paid to such parts of the ramparts as were considered most assailable by a cunning and midnight enemy; and, in order to prevent any imprudence on the part of the garrison, all egress or ingress was prohibited that had not the immediate sanction of the chief. With this view the keys of the gate were given in trust to the officer of the guard; to whom, however, it was interdicted to use them unless by direct and positive order of the governor. In addition to this precaution, the sentinels on duty at the gate had strict private instructions not to suffer any one to pass either in or out unless conducted by the governor in person; and this restriction extended even to the officer of the guard.

Such being the cautious discipline established in the fort, the appearance of a stranger within its walls at the still hour of midnight could not fail to be regarded as an extraordinary event, and to excite an apprehension which could scarcely have been surpassed had a numerous and armed band of savages suddenly appeared among them. The first intimation of this fact was given by the violent ringing of an alarm bell; a rope communicating with which was suspended in the governor's apartments, for the purpose of arousing the slumbering soldiers in any case of pressing emergency. Soon afterwards the governor himself was seen to issue from his rooms into the open area of the parade, clad in his dressing-gown, and bearing a lamp in one hand and a naked sword in the other. His countenance was pale; and his features, violently agitated, betrayed a source of alarm which those who were familiar with his usual haughtiness of manner were ill able to comprehend.

"Which way did he go?—why stand ye here?—follow—pursue him quickly—let him not escape, on your lives!" These sentences, hurriedly and impatiently uttered, were addressed to the two sentinels who, stationed in front of his apartments, had, on the first sound of alarm from the portentous bell, lowered their muskets to the charge, and now stood immovable in that position.

"Who does your honour mane?" replied one of the men, startled, yet bringing his arms to recover, in salutation of his chief.

"Why, the man—the stranger—the fellow who has just passed you." "Not a living soul has passed us since our watch commenced, your honour," observed the second sentinel; "and we have now been here upwards of an hour."

"Impossible, sirs: ye have been asleep on your posts, or ye must have seen him. He passed this way, and could not have escaped your observation had ye been attentive to your duty."

"Well, sure, and your honour knows bist," rejoined the first sentinel; "but so hilp me St. Patrick, as I have served man and boy in your honour's regiment this twelve years, not even the fitch of a man has passed me this blessed night. And here's my comrade, Jack Halford, who will take his Bible oath to the same, with all due diffidence to your honour." The pithy reply to this eloquent attempt at exculpation was a brief "Silence, sirrah, walk about!"

The men brought their muskets once more, and in silence, to the shoulder, and, in obedience to the command of their chief, resumed their limited walk; crossing each other at regular intervals in the course that enfiladed, as it were, the only entrance to the governor's apartments.

Meanwhile every thing was bustle and commotion among the garrison, who, roused from sleep by the appalling sound of the alarm bell at that late hour, were hastily arming. Throughout the obscurity might be seen the fitting forms of men, whose already fully accoutred persons proclaimed them to be of the guard; while in the lofty barracks, numerous lights flashing to and fro, and moving with rapidity, attested the alacrity with which the troops off duty were equipping for some service of more than ordinary interest. So noiseless, too, was this preparation, as far as speech was concerned, that the occasional opening and shutting of pans, and ringing of ramrods to ascertain the efficiency of the muskets, might be heard distinctly in the stillness of the night at a distance of many furlongs.

He, however, who had touched the secret spring of all this picturesque movement, whatever might be his gratification and approval of the promptitude with which the summons to arms had been answered by his brave troops, was far from being wholly satisfied with the scene he had conjured up. Recovered from the first and irrepressible agitation which had driven him to sound the tocsin of alarm, he felt how derogatory to his military dignity and proverbial coolness of character it might be considered, to have awakened a whole garrison from their slumbers, when a few files of the guard would have answered his purpose equally well. Besides, so much time had been suffered to elapse, that the stranger might have escaped; and if so, how many might be disposed to ridicule his alarm, and consider it as emanating from an imagination disturbed by sleep, rather than caused by the actual presence of one endowed like themselves with the faculties of speech and motion. For a moment he hesitated whether he should not countermand the summons to arms which had been so precipitately given; but when he recollected the harrowing threat that had been breathed in his ear by his midnight visitor,—when he reflected, moreover, that even now it was probable he was lurking within the precincts of the fort with a view to the destruction of all that it contained,—when, in short, he thought of the imminent danger that must attend them should he be suffered to escape,—he felt the necessity of precaution, and determined on his measures, even at the risk of manifesting a prudence which might be construed unfavorably. On re-entering his apartments, he found his orderly, who, roused by the midnight tumult, stood waiting to receive the commands of his chief.

"Desire Major Blackwater to come to me immediately." The mandate was quickly obeyed. In a few seconds a short, thick set, and elderly officer made his appearance in a grey military undress frock.

"Blackwater, we have traitors within the fort. Let diligent search be made in every part of the barracks for a stranger, an enemy, who has managed to procure admittance among us: let every nook and cranny, every empty cask, be examined forthwith; and cause a number of additional sentinels to be stationed along the ramparts, in order to intercept his escape."

"Good heaven, is it possible?" said the major, wiping the perspiration from his brow, though the night was unusually chilly for the season of the year:—"how could he contrive to enter a place so vigilantly guarded?"

"Ask me not how, Blackwater," returned the governor, seriously; "let it suffice that he has been in this very room, and that ten minutes since he stood where you now stand."

The major looked aghast—"God bless me, how singular! How could the savage contrive to obtain admission? or was he in reality an Indian?" "No more questions, Major Blackwater. Hasten to distribute the men, and let diligent search be made every where; and recollect, neither officer nor man courts his pillow until dawn."

The "major" emphatically prefixed to his name was a sufficient hint to the stout officer that the doubts thus familiarly expressed were here to cease, and that he was now addressed in the language of authority by his superior, who expected a direct and prompt compliance with his orders. He therefore slightly touched his hat in salutation, and withdrew to make the dispositions that had been enjoined by his colonel.

On regaining the parade, he caused the men, already forming into companies and answering to the roll call of their respective non-commissioned officers, to be wheeled into square, and then in a low but distinct voice stated the cause of alarm; and, having communicated the orders of the governor, finished by recommending to each the exercise of the most scrutinising vigilance; as on the discovery of the individual in question, and the means by which he had contrived to procure admission, the safety of the whole garrison, it was evident, must depend.

The soldiers now dispersed in small parties throughout the interior of the fort, while a select body were conducted to the ramparts by the officers themselves, and distributed between the sentinels already posted there, in such numbers, and at such distances, that it appeared impossible any thing wearing the human form could pass them unperceived, even in the obscurity that reigned around.

When this duty was accomplished, the officers proceeded to the posts of the several sentinels who had been planted since the last relief, to ascertain if any or either of them had observed ought to justify the belief that an enemy had succeeded in scaling the works. To all their enquiries, however, they received a negative reply, accompanied by a declaration, more or less positive with each, that such had been their vigilance during the watch, had any person come within their beat, detection must have been inevitable. The first question was put to the sentinel stationed at the gate of the fort, at which point the whole of the officers of the garrison were, with one or two exceptions, now assembled. The man at first evinced a good deal of confusion; but this might arise from the singular fact of the alarm that had been given, and the equally singular circumstance of his being thus closely interrogated by the collective body of his officers: he, however, persisted in declaring that he had been in no wise inattentive to his duty, and that no cause for alarm or suspicion had occurred near his post. The officers then, in order to save time, separated into two parties, pursuing opposite circuits, and arranging to meet at that point of the ramparts which was immediately in the rear, and overlooking the centre of the semicircular sweep of wild forest we have described as circumventing the fort.

"Well, Blessington, I know not what you think of this sort of work," observed Sir Everard Valletort, a young lieutenant of the ——— regiment, recently arrived from England, and one of the party who now traversed the rampart to the right; "but confound me if I would not rather be a barber's apprentice in London, upon nothing, and find myself, than continue a life of this kind much longer. It positively quite knocks me up; for what with early risings, and watchings, (I had almost added prayings,) I am but the shadow of my former self."

"Hist, Valletort, hist! speak lower," said Captain Blessington, the senior officer present, "or our search must be in vain. Poor fellow!" he pursued, laughing low and good humouredly at the picture of miseries thus solemnly enumerated by his subaltern;—"how much, in truth, are you to be pitied, who have so recently basked in all the sunshine of enjoyment at home. For our parts, we have lived so long amid these savage scenes, that we have almost forgotten what luxury, or even comfort, means. Doubt not, my friend, that in time you will, like us, be reconciled to the change."

"Confound me for an idiot, then, if I give myself time," replied Sir Everard, affectedly. "It was only five minutes before that cursed alarm bell was sounded in my ears, that I had made up my mind fully to resign or exchange the instant I could do so with credit to myself; and, I am sure, to be called out of a warm bed at this unseasonable hour offers little inducement for me to change my opinion."

"Resign or exchange with credit to yourself!" sullenly observed a stout tall officer of about fifty, whose spleen might well be accounted for in his rank of "Ensign" Delme. "Methinks there can be little credit in exchanging or resigning, when one's companions are left behind, and in a post of danger."

"By Jassu, and ye may say that with your own pritty mouth," remarked another veteran, who answered to the name of Lieutenant Murphy; "for it isn't now, while we are surrounded and bedeviled by the savages, that any man of the ——— regiment should be after talking of bating a retrace."

"I scarcely understand you, gentlemen," warmly and quickly retorted Sir Everard, who, with all his dandyism and effeminacy of manner, was of a high and resolute spirit. "Do either of you fancy that I want courage to face a positive danger, because I may not happen to have any particular vulgar predilection for early rising?"

"Nonsense, Valletort, nonsense," interrupted, in accents of almost feminine sweetness, his friend Lieutenant Charles de Haldimar, the youngest son of the governor: "Murphy is an eternal echo of the opinions of those who look forward to promotion; and as for Delme—do you not see the drift of his observation? Should you retire, as you have threatened, of course another lieutenant will be appointed in your stead; but, should you chance to lose your scalp during the struggle with the savages, the step goes in the regiment, and he, being the senior ensign, obtains promotion in consequence."

"Ah!" observed Captain Blessington, "this is indeed the greatest curse attached to the profession of a soldier. Even among those who most esteem, and are drawn towards each other as well by fellowship in pleasure as companionship in danger, this vile and debasing principle—this insatiable desire for personal advancement—is certain to intrude itself; since we feel that over the mangled bodies of our dearest friends and companions, we can alone hope to attain preferment and distinction."

This conversation, interrupted only by occasional questioning of the sentinels whom they passed in their circuit, was carried on in an audible whisper, which the close approximation of the parties to each other, and the profound stillness of the night, enabled them to hear with distinctness.

When the conversation dropped, the party pursued their course in silence. They had just passed the last sentinel posted in their line of circuit, and were within a few yards of the immediate rear of the fortress, when a sharp "Hist!" and sudden halt of their leader, Captain Blessington, threw them all into an attitude of the most profound attention.

"Did you hear?" he asked in a subdued whisper, after a few seconds of silence, in which he had vainly sought to catch a repetition of the sound.

"Assuredly," he pursued, finding that no one answered, "I distinctly heard a human groan." "Where?—in what direction?" asked Sir Everard and De Haldimar in the same breath.

"Immediately opposite to us on the common. But acc, here are the remainder of the party stationary, and listening also."

They now stole gently forward a few paces, and were soon at the side of their companions, all of whom were straining their necks and bending their heads in the attitude of men listening attentively.

"Have you heard any thing, Erakine?" asked Captain Blessington in the same low whisper, and addressing the officer who led the opposite party.

"Not a sound ourselves, but here is Sir Everard's black servant, Sambo, who has just riveted our attention, by declaring that he distinctly heard a groan towards the skirt of the common." "He is right," hastily rejoined Blessington; "I heard it also."

Again a death-like silence ensued, during which the eyes of the party were strained eagerly in the direction of the common. The night was clear and starry, yet the dark shadow of the broad belt of forest threw all that part of the waste which came within its immediate range into impenetrable obscurity.

"Do you see any thing?" whispered Valletort to his friend, who stood next him: "look—look!" and he pointed with his finger. "Nothing," returned De Haldimar, after an anxious gaze of a minute, "but that dilapidated old bomb-proof."

"See you not something dark, and slightly moving, immediately in a line with the left angle of the bomb-proof?" De Haldimar looked again. "I do begin to fancy I see something," he replied; "but so confusedly and indistinctly, that I know not whether it be not merely an illusion of my imagination. Perhaps it is a stray Indian dog devouring the carcass of the wolf you shot yesterday."

"Be it dog or devil, here is for a trial of his vulnerability. Sambo, quick, my rifle."

The young negro handed to his master one of those long heavy rifles, which the Indians usually make choice of for killing the buffalo, elk, and other animals whose wildness renders them difficult of approach. He then, unbidden, and as if tutored to the task, placed himself in a stiff upright position in front of his master, with every nerve and muscle braced to the most inflexible steadiness. The young officer next threw the rifle on the right shoulder of the boy for a rest, and prepared to take his aim on the object that had first attracted his attention.

"Make haste, massa,—him go directly,—Sambo see him get up."

All was breathless attention among the group of officers; and when the sharp ticking sound produced by the cocking of the rifle of their companion fell on their ears, they bent their gaze upon the point towards which the murderous weapon was levelled with the most aching and intense interest.

"Quick, quick, massa,—him quite up," again whispered the boy.

The words had scarcely passed his lips, when the crack of the rifle, followed by a bright blaze of light, sounded throughout the stillness of the night with exciting sharpness. For an instant all was hushed; but scarcely had the distant woods ceased to reverberate the spirit-stirring echoes, when the anxious group of officers were surprised and startled by a sudden flash, the report of a second rifle from the common, and the whizzing of a bullet past their ears. This was instantly succeeded by a fierce, wild, and prolonged cry, expressive at once of triumph and revenge. It was that peculiar cry which an Indian utters when the reeking scalp has been wrested from his murdered victim.

"Missed him, as I am a sinner," exclaimed Sir Everard, springing to his feet, and knocking the butt of his rifle on the ground with a movement of impatience. "Sambo, you young scoundrel, it was all your fault,— you moved your shoulder as I pulled the trigger. Thank heaven, however, the aim of the Indian appears to have been no better, although the sharp whistling of his ball proves his piece to have been well levelled for a random shot.

"His aim has been too true," faintly pronounced the voice of one somewhat in the rear of his companions. "The ball of the villain has found a lodgment in my breast. God bless ye all, my boys; may your fates be more lucky than mine!" While he yet spoke, Lieutenant Murphy sank into the arms of Blessington and De Haldimar, who had flown to him at the first intimation of his wound, and was in the next instant a corpse.

CHAPTER III.

"To your companies, gentlemen, to your companies on the instant. There is treason in the fort, and we had need of all our diligence and caution. Captain de Haldimar is missing, and the gate has been found unlocked. Quick, gentlemen, quick; even now the savages may be around us, though unseen."

"Captain de Haldimar missing!—the gate unlocked!" exclaimed a number of voices. "Impossible!—surely we are not betrayed by our own men." "The sentinel has been relieved, and is now in irons," resumed the communicator of this startling piece of intelligence. It was the adjutant of the regiment.

"Away, gentlemen, to your posts immediately," said Captain Blessington, who, aided by De Haldimar, hastened to deposit the stiffening body of the unfortunate Murphy, which they still supported, upon the rampart. Then addressing the adjutant, "Mr. Lawson, let a couple of files be sent immediately to remove the body of their officer."

"That shot which I heard from the common, as I approached, was not fired at random, then, I find," observed the adjutant, as they all now hastily descended to join their men, "Who has fallen?" "Murphy, of the grenadiers," was the reply of one near him.

"Poor fellow! our work commences badly," resumed Mr. Lawson: "Murphy killed, and Captain de Haldimar missing. We had few officers enough to spare before, and their loss will be severely felt; I greatly fear, too, those casualties may have a tendency to discourage the men."

"Nothing more easy than to supply their place, by promoting some of our oldest sergeants," observed Ensign Delme, who, as well as the ill-fated Murphy, had risen from the ranks. "If they behave themselves well, the king will confirm their appointments."

"But my poor brother, what of him, Lawson? what have you learnt connected with his disappearance?" asked Charles de Haldimar with deep emotion. "Nothing satisfactory, I am sorry to say," returned the adjutant: "in fact, the whole affair is a mystery which no one can unravel; even at this moment the sentinel, Frank Halloway, who is strongly suspected of being privy to his disappearance, is undergoing a private examination by your father the governor."

"Frank Halloway!" repeated the youth with a start of astonishment; "surely Halloway could never prove a traitor,—and especially to my brother, whose life he once saved at the peril of his own."

The officers had now gained the parade, when the "Fall in, gentlemen, fall in," quickly pronounced by Major Blackwater, prevented all further questioning on the part of the younger De Haldimar. The scene, though circumscribed in limit, was picturesque in effect, and might have been happily illustrated by the pencil of the painter. The immediate area of the parade was filled with armed men, distributed into three divisions, and forming, with their respective ranks facing outwards, as many sides of a hollow square, the mode of defence invariably adopted by the governor in all cases of sudden alarm.

In a few minutes from the falling in of the officers with their respective companies, the clank of irons was heard in the direction of the guard-room, and several forms were seen slowly advancing into the area already occupied as we have described. This party was preceded by the Adjutant Lawson, who, advancing towards Major Blackwater, communicated a message, that was followed by the command of the latter officer for the three divisions to face inwards. The officer of artillery also gave the word to his men to form lines of single files immediately in the rear of their respective guns, leaving space enough for the entrance of the approaching party, which consisted of half a dozen files of the guard, under a non-commissioned officer, and one whose manacled limbs, rather than his unaccoutred uniform, attested him to be not merely a prisoner, but a prisoner confined for some serious and flagrant offence.

This party now advanced through the vacant quarter of the square, and took their stations immediately in the centre. Here the countenances of each, and particularly that of the prisoner, who was, if we may so term it, the centre of that centre, were thrown into strong relief by the bright glare of the torches, so that the features of the prisoner stood revealed to those around as plainly as if it had been noon day. Not a sound, not a murmur, escaped from the ranks: but, though the etiquette and strict laws of military discipline chained all speech, the workings of the inward mind remained unchecked; and as they recognised in the prisoner Frank Halloway, one of the bravest and boldest in the field, and, as all had hitherto imagined, one of the most devoted to his duty, an irrepressible thrill of amazement and dismay crept throughout the frames, and for a moment blanched the cheeks of those especially who belonged to the same company. On being summoned from their fruitless search after the stranger, to fall in without delay, it had been whispered among the men that treason had crept into the fort, and a traitor, partly detected in his crime, had been arrested and thrown into irons: but the idea of Frank Halloway being that traitor was the last that could have entered into their thoughts, and yet they now beheld him covered with every mark of ignominy, and about to answer his high offence, in all human probability, with his life.

With the officers the reputation of Halloway for courage and fidelity stood no less high; but, while they secretly lamented the circumstance of his defalcation, they could not disguise from themselves the almost certainty of his guilt, for each, as he now gazed upon the prisoner, recollected the confusion and hesitation of manner he had evinced when questioned by them preparatory to their ascending to the ramparts.

Once more the suspense of the moment was interrupted by the entrance of other forms into the area. They were those of the adjutant, followed by a drummer, bearing his instrument, and the governor's orderly, charged with pens, ink, paper, and a book which, from its peculiar form and colour, every one present knew to be a copy of the articles of war. A variety of contending emotions passed through the breasts of many, as they witnessed the silent progress of these preparations, rendered painfully interesting by the peculiarity of their position, and the wildness of the hour at which they thus found themselves assembled together. The prisoner himself was unmoved: he stood proud, calm, and fearless, amid the guard, of whom he had so recently formed one; and though his countenance was pale, as much, perhaps, from a sense of the ignominious character in which he appeared as from more private considerations, still there was nothing to denote either the abjectness of fear or the consciousness of merited disgrace. Once or twice a low sobbing, that proceeded at intervals from one of the barrack windows, caught his ear, and he turned his glance in that direction with a restless anxiety, which he exerted himself in the instant afterwards to repress; but this was the only mark of emotion he betrayed.

The above dispositions having been hastily made, the adjutant and his assistants once more retired. After the lapse of a minute, a tall martial-looking man, habited in a blue military frock, and of handsome, though stern, haughty, and inflexible features, entered the area. He was followed by Major Blackwater, the captain of artillery, and Adjutant Lawson.

"Are the garrison all present, Mr. Lawson? are the officers all present?"

"All except those of the guard, sir," replied the adjutant, touching his hat with a submission that was scrupulously exacted on all occasions of duty by his superior.

The governor passed his hand for a moment over his brows. It seemed to those around him as if the mention of that guard had called up recollections which gave him pain; and it might be so, for his eldest son, Captain Frederick de Haldimar, had commanded the guard. Whether he had disappeared, or in what manner, no one knew.

"Are the artillery all present, Captain Wentworth?" again demanded the governor, after a moment of silence, and in his wonted firm authoritative voice.

"All present, sir," rejoined the officer, following the example of the adjutant, and saluting his chief.

"Then let a drum-head court-martial be assembled immediately, Mr. Lawson, and without reference to the roster let the senior officers be selected."

The adjutant went round to the respective divisions, and in a low voice warned Captain Blessington, and the four senior subalterns, for that duty. One by one the officers, as they were severally called upon, left their places in the square, and sheathing their swords, stepped into that part of the area appointed as their temporary court. They were now all assembled, and Captain Blessington, the senior of his rank in the garrison, was preparing to administer the customary oaths, when the prisoner Halloway advanced a pace or two in front of his escort, and removing his cap, in a clear, firm, but respectful voice, thus addressed the governor:—

"Colonel de Haldimar, that I am no traitor, as I have already told you, the Almighty God, before whom I swore allegiance to his majesty, can bear me witness. Appearances, I own, are against me: but, so far from being a traitor, I would have shed my last drop of blood in defence of the garrison and your family. Colonel de Haldimar," he pursued, after a momentary pause, in which he seemed to be struggling to subdue the emotion which rose, despite of himself, to his throat, "I repeat, I am no traitor, and I scorn the imputation—but here is my best answer to the charge. This wound, (and he unbuttoned his jacket, opened his shirt, and disclosed a deep scar upon his white chest,) this wound I received in defence of my captain's life at Quebec. Had I not loved him, I should not so have exposed myself, neither but for that should I now stand in the situation of shame and danger, in which my comrades behold me."

Every heart was touched by this appeal—this bold and manly appeal to the consideration of the governor. The officers, especially, who were fully conversant with the general merit of Halloway, were deeply affected, and Charles de Haldimar—the young, the generous, the feeling Charles de Haldimar—even shed tears.

"What mean you, prisoner?" interrogated the governor, after a short pause, during which he appeared to be weighing and deducing inferences from the expressions just uttered. "What mean you, by stating, but for that (alluding to your regard for Captain de Haldimar) you would not now be in this situation of shame and danger?"

The prisoner hesitated a moment; and then rejoined, but in a tone that had less of firmness in it than before,— "Colonel de Haldimar, I am not at liberty to state my meaning; for, though a private soldier, I respect my word, and have pledged myself to secrecy."

"You respect your word, and have pledged yourself to secrecy! What mean you, man, by this rhodomontade? To whom can you have pledged yourself, and for what, unless it be to some secret enemy without the walls? Gentlemen, proceed to your duty: it is evident that the man is a traitor, even from his own admission. On my life," he pursued, more hurriedly, and speaking in an under tone, as if to himself, "the fellow has been bribed by, and is connected with ———." The name escaped not his lips; for, aware of the emotion he was betraying, he suddenly checked himself, and assumed his wonted stern and authoritative bearing.

Once more the prisoner addressed the governor in the same clear firm voice in which he had opened his appeal.

"Colonel de Haldimar, I have no connection with any living soul without the fort; and again I repeat, I am no traitor, but a true and loyal British soldier, as my services in this war, and my comrades, can well attest. Still, I seek not to shun that death which I have braved a dozen times at least in the ——— regiment. All that I ask is, that I may not be tried—that I may not have the shame of hearing sentence pronounced against me yet; but if nothing should occur before eight o'clock to vindicate my character from this disgrace, I will offer up no further prayer for mercy. In the name of that life, therefore, which I once preserved to Captain de Haldimar, at the price of my own blood, I entreat a respite from trial until then."

"In the name of God and all his angels, let mercy reach your soul, and grant his prayer!"

Every ear was startled—every heart touched by the plaintive, melancholy, silver tones of the voice that faintly pronounced the last appeal, and all recognised it for that of the young, interesting, and attached wife of the prisoner. Again the latter turned his gaze towards the window whence the sounds proceeded, and by the glare of the torches a tear was distinctly seen by many coursing down his manly cheek. The weakness was momentary. In the next instant he closed his shirt and coat, and resuming his cap stepped back once more amid his guard, where he remained stationary, with the air of one who, having nothing further to hope, has resolved to endure the worst that can happen with resignation and fortitude.

After the lapse of a few moments, again devoted to much apparent deep thought and conjecture, the governor once more, and rather hurriedly, resumed,—

"In the event, prisoner, of this delay in your trial being granted, will you pledge yourself to disclose the secret to which you have alluded? Recollect, there is nothing but that which can save your memory from being consigned to infamy for ever; for who, among your comrades, will believe the idle denial of your treachery, when there is the most direct proof against you? If your secret die with you, moreover, every honest man will consider it as having been one so infamous and injurious to your character, that you were ashamed to reveal it."

These suggestions of the colonel were not without their effect; for, in the sudden swelling of the prisoner's chest, as allusion was made to the disgrace that would attach to his memory, there was evidence of a high and generous spirit, to whom obloquy was far more hateful than even death itself.

"I do promise," he at length replied, stepping forward, and uncovering himself as before,— "if no one appear to justify my conduct at the hour I have named, a full disclosure of all I know touching this affair shall be made. And may God, of his infinite mercy, grant, for Captain de Haldimar's sake, as well as mine, I may not then be wholly deserted!"

There was something so peculiarly solemn and impressive in the manner in which the unhappy man now expressed himself, that a feeling of the utmost awe crept into the bosoms of the surrounding throng; and more than one veteran of the grenadiers, the company to which Halloway belonged, was heard to relieve his chest of the long pent-up sigh that struggled for release.

"Enough, prisoner," rejoined the governor; "on this condition do I grant your request; but recollect,—your disclosure ensures no hope of pardon, unless, indeed, you have the fullest proof to offer in your defence. Do you perfectly understand me?"

"I do," replied the soldier firmly; and again he placed his cap on his head, and retired a step or two back among the guard.

"Mr. Lawson, let the prisoner be removed, and conducted to one of the private cells. Who is the subaltern of the guard?"

"Ensign Fortescue," was the answer.

"Then let Ensign Fortescue keep the key of the cell himself. Tell him moreover, I shall hold him individually responsible for his charge."

Once more the prisoner was marched out of the area; and, as the clanking sound of his chains became gradually fainter in the distance, the same voice that had before interrupted the proceedings, pronounced a "God be praised!—God be praised!" with such melody of sorrow in its intonations that no one could listen to it unmoved. Both officers and men were more or less affected, and all hoped—they scarcely knew why or what—but all hoped something favourable would occur to save the life of the brave and unhappy Frank Halloway.

Of the first interruption by the wife of the prisoner the governor had taken no notice: but on this repetition of the expression of her feelings he briefly summoned, in the absence of the adjutant, the sergeant-major of the regiment to his side.

"Sergeant-major Bletson, I desire that, in future, on all occasions of this kind, the women of the regiment may be kept out of the way. Look to it, sir!"

The sergeant-major, who had stood erect as his own halbert, which he held before him in a saluting position, during this brief admonition of his colonel, acknowledged, by a certain air of deferential respect and dropping of the eyes, unaccompanied by speech of any kind, that he felt the reproof, and would, in future, take care to avoid all similar cause for complaint. He then stalked stiffly away, and resumed, in a few hasty strides, his position in rear of the troops.

"Hard-hearted man!" pursued the same voice: "if my prayers of gratitude to heaven give offence, may the hour never come when my lips shall pronounce their bitterest curse upon your severity!"

There was something so painfully wild—so solemnly prophetic—in these sounds of sorrow as they fell faintly upon the ear, and especially under the extraordinary circumstances of the night, that they might have been taken for the warnings of some supernatural agency. During their utterance, not even the breathing of human life was to be heard in the ranks. In the next instant, however, Sergeant-major Bletson was seen repairing, with long and hasty strides, to the barrack whence the voice proceeded, and the interruption was heard no more.

Meanwhile the officers, who had been summoned from the ranks for the purpose of forming the court-martial, still lingered in the centre of the square, apparently waiting for the order of their superior, before they should resume their respective stations. As the quick and commanding glance of Colonel de Haldimar now embraced the group, he at once became sensible of the absence of one of the seniors, all of whom he had desired should be selected for the court-martial.

"Mr. Lawson," he remarked, somewhat sternly, as the adjutant now returned from delivering over his prisoner to Ensign Fortescue, "I thought I understood from your report the officers were all present!"

"I believe, sir, my report will be found perfectly correct," returned the adjutant, in a tone which, without being disrespectful, marked his offended sense of the implication.

"And Lieutenant Murphy —"

"Is here, sir," said the adjutant, pointing to a couple of files of the guard, who were bearing a heavy burden, and following into the square. "Lieutenant Murphy," he pursued, "has been shot on the ramparts; and I have, as directed by Captain Blessington, caused the body to be brought here, that I may receive your orders respecting the interment." As he spoke, he removed a long military grey cloak, which completely enshrouded the corpse, and disclosed, by the light of the still brightly flaming torches of the gunners, the features of the unfortunate Murphy.

"How did he meet his death?" enquired the governor; without, however, manifesting the slightest surprise, or appearing at all moved at the discovery.

"By a rifle shot fired from the common, near the old bomb proof," observed Captain Blessington, as the adjutant looked to him for the particular explanation he could not render himself.

"Ah! this reminds me," pursued the austere commandant,— "there was a shot fired also from the ramparts. By whom, and at what?"

"By me, sir," said Lieutenant Valletort, coming forward from the ranks, "and at what I conceived to be an Indian, lurking as a spy upon the common."

"Then, Lieutenant Sir Everard Valletort, no repetition of these firings, if you please; and let it be borne in mind by all, that although, from the peculiar nature of the service in which we are engaged, I so far depart from the established regulations of the army as to permit my officers to arm themselves with rifles, they are to be used only as occasion may require in the hour of conflict, and not for the purpose of throwing a whole garrison into alarm by trials of skill and dexterity upon shadows at this unseasonable hour."

"I was not aware, sir," returned Sir Everard proudly, and secretly galled at being thus addressed before the men, "it could be deemed a military crime to destroy an enemy at whatever hour he might present himself, and especially on such an occasion as the present. As for my firing at a shadow, those who heard the yell that followed the second shot, can determine that it came from no shadow, but from a fierce and vindictive enemy. The cry denoted even something more than the ordinary defiance of an Indian: it seemed to express a fiendish sentiment of personal triumph and revenge."

The governor started involuntarily. "Do you imagine, Sir Everard Valletort, the aim of your rifle was true—that you hit him?"

The question was asked so hurriedly, and in a tone so different from that in which he had hitherto spoken, that the officers around simultaneously raised their eyes to those of their colonel with an expression of undissembled surprise. He observed it, and instantly resumed his habitual sternness of look and manner.

"I rather fear not, sir," replied Sir Everard, who had principally remarked the emotion, "but may I hope (and this was said with emphasis), in the evident disappointment you experience at my want of success, my offence may be overlooked?"

The governor fixed his penetrating eyes on the speaker, as if he would have read his inmost mind; and then calmly, and even impressively observed,—

"Sir Everard Valletort, I do overlook the offence, and hope you may as easily forgive yourself. It were well, however, that your indiscretion, which can only find its excuse in your being so young an officer, had not been altogether without some good result. Had you killed or disabled the—savage, there might have been a decent palliative offered; but what must be your feelings, sir, when you reflect, the death of your officer," and he pointed to the corpse of the unhappy Murphy, "is, in a great degree, attributable to yourself? Had you not provoked the anger of the savage, and given a direction to his aim by the impotent and wanton discharge of your own rifle, this accident would never have happened."

This severe reproving of an officer, who had acted from the most praiseworthy of motives, and who could not possibly have anticipated the unfortunate catastrophe that had occurred, was considered especially harsh and unkind by every one present; and a low and almost inaudible murmur passed through the company to which Sir Everard was attached. For a minute or two that officer also appeared deeply pained, not more from the reproof itself than from the new light in which the observation of his chief had taught him to view, for the first time, the causes that had led to the fall of Murphy. Finding, however, that the governor had no further remark to address to him, he once more returned to his station in the ranks.

"Mr. Lawson," resumed the commandant, turning to the adjutant, "let this victim be carried to the spot on which he fell, and there interred. I know no better grave for a soldier than beneath the sod that has been moistened with his blood. Recollect," he continued, as the adjutant once more led the party out of the area,— "no firing, Mr. Lawson. The duty must be silently performed, and without the risk of provoking a forest of arrows, or a shower of bullets, from the savages. Major Blackwater," he pursued, as soon as the corpse had been removed, "let the men pile their arms even as they now stand, and remain ready to fall in at a minute's notice. Should any thing extraordinary happen before the morning, you will, of course, apprise me." He then strode out of the area with the same haughty and measured step that had characterised his entrance.

"Our colonel does not appear to be in one of his most amiable moods to-night," observed Captain Blessington, as the officers, after having disposed of their respective companies, now proceeded along the ramparts to assist at the last funeral offices of their unhappy associate. "He was disposed to be severe, and must have put you, in some measure, out of conceit with your favourite rifle, Valletort."

"True," rejoined the baronet, who had already rallied from the momentary depression of his spirits, "he hit me devilish hard, I confess, and was disposed to display more of the commanding officer than quite suits my ideas of the service. His words were as caustic as his looks; and could both have pierced me to the quick, there was no inclination on his part wanting. By my soul I could . . . but I forgive him. He is the father of my friend: and for that reason will I chew the cud of my mortification, nor suffer, if possible, a sense of his unkindness to rankle at my heart. At all events, Blessington, my mind is made up, and resign or exchange I certainly shall the instant I can find a decent loop-hole to creep out of."

Sir Everard fancied the ear of his captain was alone listening to these expressions of his feeling, or in all probability he would not have uttered them. As he concluded the last sentence, however, he felt his arm gently grasped by one who walked a pace or two silently in their rear. He turned, and recognised Charles de Haldimar.

"I am sure, Valletort, you will believe how much pained I have been at the severity of my father; but, indeed, there was nothing personally offensive intended. Blessington can tell you, as well as myself, it is his manner altogether. Nay, that although he is the first in seniority after Blackwater, the governor treats him with the same distance and hauteur he would use towards the youngest ensign in the service. Such are the effects of his long military habits, and his ideas of the absolutism of command. Am I not right, Blessington?"

"Quite right, Charles. Sir Everard may satisfy himself his is no solitary instance of the stern severity of your father. Still, I confess, notwithstanding the rigidity of manner which he seems, on all occasions, to think so indispensable to the maintenance of authority in a commanding officer, I never know him so inclined to find fault as he is to-night."

"Perhaps," observed Valletort, good humouredly, "his conscience is rather restless; and he is willing to get rid of it and his spleen together. I would wager my rifle against the worthless scalp of the rascal I fired at to-night, that this same stranger, whose asserted appearance has called us from our comfortable beds, is but the creation of his disturbed dreams. Indeed, how is it possible any thing formed of flesh and blood could have escaped us with the vigilant watch that has been kept on the ramparts? The old gentleman certainly had that illusion strongly impressed on his mind when he so sapiently spoke of my firing at a shadow."

"But the gate," interrupted Charles de Haldimar, with something of mild reproach in his tones,— "you forget, Valletort, the gate was found unlocked, and that my brother is missing. He, at least, was flesh and blood, as you say, and yet he has disappeared. What more probable, therefore, than that this stranger is at once the cause and the agent of his abduction?"

"Impossible, Charles," observed Captain Blessington; "Frederick was in the midst of his guard. How, therefore, could he be conveyed away without the alarm being given? Numbers only could have succeeded in so desperate an enterprise; and yet there is no evidence, or even suspicion, of more than one individual having been here."

"It is a singular affair altogether," returned Sir Everard, musingly. "Of two things, however, I am satisfied. The first is, that the stranger, whoever he may be, and if he really has been here, is no Indian; the second, that he is personally known to the governor, who has been, or I mistake much, more alarmed at his individual presence than if Pontiac and his whole band had suddenly broken in upon us. Did you remark his emotion, when I dwelt on the peculiar character of personal triumph and revenge which the cry of the lurking villain outside seem to express? and did you notice the eagerness with which he enquired if I thought I had hit him? Depend upon it, there is more in all this than is dreamt of in our philosophy."

"And it was your undisguised perception of that emotion," remarked Captain Blessington, "that drew down his severity upon your own head. It was, however, too palpable not to be noticed by all; and I dare say conjecture is as busily and as vaguely at work among our companions as it is with us. The clue to the mystery, in a great degree, now dwells with Frank Halloway; and to him we must look for its elucidation. His disclosure will be one, I apprehend, full of ignominy to himself, but of the highest interest and importance to us all. And yet I know not how to believe the man the traitor he appears."

"Did you remark that last harrowing exclamation of his wife?" observed Charles de Haldimar, in a tone of unspeakable melancholy. "How fearfully prophetic it sounded in my ears. I know not how it is," he pursued, "but I wish I had not heard those sounds; for since that moment I have had a sad strange presentiment of evil at my heart. Heaven grant my poor brother may make his appearance, as I still trust he will, at the hour Halloway seems to expect, for if not, the latter most assuredly dies. I know my father well; and, if convicted by a court martial, no human power can alter the destiny that awaits Frank Halloway."

"Rally, my dear Charles, rally," said Sir Everard, affecting a confidence he did not feel himself; "indulge not in these idle and superstitious fancies. I pity Halloway from my soul, and feel the deepest interest in his pretty and unhappy wife; but that is no reason why one should attach importance to the incoherent expressions wrung from her in the agony of grief."

"It is kind of you, Valletort, to endeavour to cheer my spirits, when, if the truth were confessed, you acknowledge the influence of the same feelings. I thank you for the attempt, but time alone can show how far I shall have reason, or otherwise, to lament the occurrences of this night."

"They had now reached that part of the ramparts whence the shot from Sir Everard's rifle had been fired. Several men were occupied in digging a grave in the precise spot on which the unfortunate Murphy had stood when he received his death wound; and into this, when completed, the body, enshrouded in the cloak already alluded to, was deposited by his companions."

CHAPTER IV.

While the adjutant was yet reading, in a low and solemn voice, the service for the dead, a fierce and distant yell, as if from a legion of devils, burst suddenly from the forest, and brought the hands of the startled officers instinctively to their swords. This appalling cry lasted, without interruption, for many minutes, and was then, as abruptly checked as it had been unexpectedly delivered. A considerable pause succeeded, and then again it rose with even more startling vehemence than before. By one unaccustomed to those devilish sounds, no distinction could have been made in the two several yells that had been thus savagely pealed forth; but those to whom practice and long experience in the warlike habits and customs of the Indians had rendered their shouts familiar, at once divined, or fancied they divined, the cause. The first was, to their conception, a yell expressive at once of vengeance and disappointment in pursuit,—perhaps of some prisoner who had escaped from their toils; the second, of triumph and success,—in all probability, indicative of the recapture of that prisoner. For many minutes afterwards the officers continued to listen, with the most aching attention, for a repetition of the cry, or even fainter sounds, that might denote either a nearer approach to the fort, or the final departure of the Indians. After the second yell, however, the woods, in the heart of which it appeared to have been uttered, were buried in as profound a silence as if they had never yet echoed back the voice of man; and all at length became satisfied that the Indians, having accomplished some particular purpose, had retired once more to their distant encampments for the night. Captain Erskine was the first who broke the almost breathless silence that prevailed among themselves.

"On my life, De Haldimar is a prisoner with the Indians. He has been attempting his escape,—has been detected,—followed, and again fallen into their hands. I know their infernal yells but too well. The last expressed their savage joy at the capture of a prisoner; and there is no one of us missing but De Haldimar."

"Not a doubt of it," said Captain Blessington; the cry was certainly what you describe it, and Heaven only knows what will be the fate of our poor friend."

No other officer spoke, for all were oppressed by the weight of their own feelings, and sought rather to give indulgence to speculation in secret, than to share their impressions with their companions. Charles de Haldimar stood a little in the rear, leaning his head upon his hand against the box of the sentry, (who was silently, though anxiously, pacing his walk,) and in an attitude expressive of the deepest dejection and sorrow.

"I suppose I must finish Lawson's work, although I am but a poor hand at this sort of thing," resumed Captain Erskine, taking up the prayer book the adjutant had, in hastening on the first alarm to get the men under arms, carelessly thrown on the grave of the now unconscious Murphy.

He then commenced the service at the point where Mr. Lawson had so abruptly broken off, and went through the remainder of the prayers. A very few minutes sufficed for the performance of this solemn duty, which was effected by the faint dim light of the at length dawning day, and the men in attendance proceeded to fill up the grave of their officer.

Gradually the mists, that had fallen during the latter hours of the night, began to ascend from the common, and disperse themselves in air, conveying the appearance of a rolling sheet of vapour retiring back upon itself, and disclosing objects in succession, until the eye could embrace all that came within its extent of vision. As the officers yet lingered near the rude grave of their companion, watching with abstracted air the languid and almost mechanical action of their jaded men, as they emptied shovel after shovel of the damp earth over the body of its new tenant, they were suddenly startled by an expression of exultation from Sir Everard Valletort.

"By Jupiter, I have pinked him," he exclaimed triumphantly. "I knew my rifle could not err; and as for my sight, I have carried away too many prizes in target-shooting to have been deceived in that. How delighted the old governor will be, Charles, to hear this. No more lecturing, I am sure, for the next six months at least;" and the young officer rubbed his hands together, at the success of his shot, with as much satisfaction and unconcern for the future, as if he had been in his own native England, in the midst of a prize-ring.

Roused by the observation of his friend, De Haldimar quitted his position near the sentry box, and advanced to the outer edge of the rampart. To him, as to his companions, the outline of the old bomb-proof was now distinctly visible, but it was some time before they could discover, in the direction in which Valletort pointed, a dark speck upon the common; and this so indistinctly, they could scarcely distinguish it with the naked eye.

"Your sight is quite equal to your aim, Sir Everard," remarked Lieutenant Johnstone, one of Erskine's subalterns, "and both are decidedly superior to mine; yet I used to be thought a good rifleman too, and have credit for an eye no less keen than that of an Indian; you have the advantage of me, however; for I honestly admit I never could have picked off yon fellow in the dark as you have done."

As the dawn increased, the dark shadow of a human form, stretched at its length upon the ground, became perceptible; and the officers, with one unanimous voice, bore loud testimony to the skill and dexterity of him who had, under such extreme disadvantages, accomplished the death of their skulking enemy.

"Bravo, Valletort," said Charles de Haldimar, recovering his spirits, as much from the idea, now occurring to him, that this might indeed be the stranger whose appearance had so greatly disturbed his father, as from the gratification he felt in the praises bestowed on his friend. "Bravo, my dear fellow!" then approaching, and in a half whisper, "when next I write to Clara, I shall request her, with my cousin's assistance, to prepare a chaplet of bays, wherewith I shall myself crown you as their proxy. But what is the matter now, Valletort? Why stand you there gazing upon the common, as if the victim of your murderous aim was rising from his bloody couch, to reproach you with his death? Tell me, shall I write to Clara for the prize, or will you receive it from her own hands?"

"Bid her rather pour her curses on my head; and to those, De Haldimar, add your own," exclaimed Sir Everard, at length raising himself from the statue-like position he had assumed. "Almighty God," he pursued, in the same tone of deep agony, "what have I done? Where, where shall I hide myself?"

As he spoke he turned away from his companions, and covering his eyes with his hand, with quick and unequal steps, even like those of a drunken man, walked, or rather ran, along the rampart, as if fearful of being overtaken. The whole group of officers, and Charles de Haldimar in particular, were struck with dismay at the language and action of Sir Everard; and for a moment they fancied that fatigue, and watching, and excitement, had partially affected his brain. But when, after the lapse of a minute or two, they again looked out upon the common, the secret of his agitation was too faithfully and too painfully explained.

What had at first the dusky and dingy hue of a half-naked Indian, was now perceived, by the bright beams of light just gathering in the east, to be the gay and striking uniform of a British officer. Doubt as to who that officer was there could be none, for the white sword-belt suspended over the right shoulder, and thrown into strong relief by the field of scarlet on which it reposed, denoted the wearer of this distinguishing badge of duty to be one of the guard.

If they could regret the loss of such a companion as Murphy, how deep and heartfelt must have been the sorrow they experienced when they beheld the brave, generous, manly, amiable, and highly-talented Frederick de Haldimar—the pride of the garrison, and the idol of his family—lying extended, a cold, senseless corpse, slain by the hand of the bosom friend of his brother!—Notwithstanding the stern severity and distance of the governor, whom few circumstances, however critical or exciting, could surprise into relaxation of his habitual stateiness, it would have been difficult to name two young men more universally liked and esteemed by their brother officers than were the De Haldimars—the first for the qualities already named—the second, for those retiring, mild, winning manners, and gentle affections, added to extreme and almost feminine beauty of countenance for which he was remarkable. Alas, what a gloomy picture was now exhibited to the minds of all! Frederick de Haldimar a corpse, and slain by the hand of Sir Everard Valletort! What but disunion could follow this melancholy catastrophe? and how could Charles de Haldimar, even if his bland nature should survive the shock, ever bear to look again upon the man who had, however innocently or unintentionally, deprived him of a brother whom he adored?

These were the impressions that passed through the minds of the compassionating officers, as they directed their glance alternately from the common to the pale and marble-like features of the younger De Haldimar, who, with parted lips and stupid gaze, continued to fix his eyes upon the inanimate form of his ill-fated brother, as if the very faculty of life itself had been for a period suspended. At length, however, while his companions watched in silence the mining workings of that grief which they feared to interrupt by ill-timed observations, even of condolence, the death-like hue, which had hitherto suffused the usually blooming cheek of the young officer, was succeeded by a flush of the deepest dye, while his eyes, swollen by the tide of blood now rushing violently to his face, appeared to be bursting from their sockets. The shock was more than his delicate frame, exhausted as it was by watching and fatigue, could bear. He tottered, reeled, pressed his hand upon his head, and before any one could render him assistance, fell senseless on the ramparts.

During the interval between Sir Everard Valletort's exclamation, and the fall of Charles de Haldimar, the men employed at the grave had performed their duty, and were gazing with mingled astonishment and concern, both on the body of their murdered officer, and on the dumb scene acting around them. Two of these were now despatched for a litter, with which they speedily reappeared. On this Charles de Haldimar, already delirious with the fever of intense excitement, was carefully placed, and, followed by Captain Blessington and Lieute-

Pant Johnstone, borne to his apartment in the small range of buildings constituting the officers' barracks. Captain Erskine undertook the disagreeable office of communicating these distressing events to the governor; and the remainder of the officers once more hastened to join or linger near their respective companies, in readiness for the order which it was expected would be given to despatch a numerous party of the garrison to secure the body of Captain de Haldimar.

CHAPTER V.

The sun was just rising above the horizon, in all that peculiar softness of splendour which characterises the early days of autumn in America, as Captain Erskine led his company across the drawbridge that communicated with the fort. It was the first time it had been lowered since the investment of the garrison by the Indians; and as the dull and rusty chains performed their service with a harsh and grating sound, it seemed as if an earnest were given of melancholy boding. Although the distance to be traversed was small, the risk the party incurred was great; for it was probable the savages ever on the alert, would not suffer them to effect their object unmolested. It was perhaps singular, and certainly contradictory, that an officer of the acknowledged prudence and forethought ascribed to the governor—qualities which in a great degree neutralised his excessive severity in the eyes of his troops—should have hazarded the chance of having his garrison enfeebled by the destruction of a part, if not of the whole, of the company appointed to this dangerous duty; but with all his severity, Colonel de Haldimar was not without strong affection for his children. The feelings of the father, therefore, in a great degree triumphed over the prudence of the commander: and to shield the corpse of his son from the indignities which he well knew would be inflicted on it by Indian barbarity, he had been induced to accede to the earnest prayer of Captain Erskine, that he might be permitted to lead out his company for the purpose of securing the body. Every means were, however, taken to cover the advance, and ensure the retreat of the detachment. The remainder of the troops were distributed along the rear of the ramparts, with instructions to lie flat on their faces until summoned by their officers from that position; which was to be done only in the event of close pursuit from the savages. Artillerymen were also stationed at the several guns that flanked the rear of the fort, and necessarily commanded both the common and the outskirt of the forest, with orders to fire with grape-shot at a given signal. Captain Erskine's instructions were, moreover, if attacked, to retreat back under the guns of the fort slowly and in good order, and without turning his back upon the enemy.

Thus confident of support, the party, after traversing the drawbridge with fixed bayonets, inclined to the right, and following the winding of the ditch by which it was surrounded, made the semi-circuit of the rampart until they gained the immediate centre of the rear, and in a direct line with the bomb-proof. Here their mode of advance was altered, to guard more effectually against the enemy with whom they might possibly have to contend. The front and rear ranks of the company, consisting in all of ninety men, were so placed as to leave space in the event of attack, of a portion of each wheeling inwards so as to present in an instant three equal faces of a square. As the rear was sufficiently covered by the cannon of the fort to defeat any attempt to turn their flanks, the manœuvre was one that enabled them to present a fuller front in whatever other quarter they might be attacked; and had this additional advantage, that in the advance by single files a narrower front was given to the aim of the Indians, who, unless they fired in an oblique direction, could only, of necessity, bring down two men (the leading files) at a time.

In this order, and anxiously overlooked by their comrades, whose eyes alone peered from above the surface of the rampart on which they lay prostrate, the detachment crossed the common; one rank headed by Captain Erskine, the other by Lieutenant Johnstone. They had now approached within a few yards of the unfortunate victim, when Captain Erskine commanded a halt of his party; and two files were detached from the rear of each rank, to place the body on a litter with which they had provided themselves. He and Johnstone also moved in the same direction in advance of the men, prepared to render assistance if required. The corpse lay on its face, and in no way despoiled of any of its glittering habiliments; a circumstance that too well confirmed the fact of De Haldimar's death having been accomplished by the ball from Sir Everard Valletort's rifle. It appeared, however, the ill-fated officer had struggled much in the agonies of death; for the left leg was drawn up into an unnatural state of contraction, and the right hand, closely compressed, grasped a quantity of grass and soil, which had evidently been torn up in a paroxysm of suffering and despair.

The men placed the litter at the side of the body, which they now proceeded to raise. As they were in the act of depositing it on this temporary bier, the plumed hat fell from the head, and disclosed, to the astonishment of all, the scalpless crown completely saturated in its own clotted blood and oozing brains. An exclamation of horror and disgust escaped at the same moment from the lips of the two officers, and the men started back from their charge as if a basilisk had suddenly appeared before them. Captain Erskine pursued:—

"What the devil is the meaning of all this, Johnstone?" "What, indeed!" rejoined his lieutenant, with a shrug of his shoulders, that was intended to express his inability to form any opinion on the subject.

"Unless it should prove," continued Erskine, "as I sincerely trust it may, that poor Valletort is not, after all, the murderer of his friend. It must be so. De Haldimar has been slain by the same Indian who killed Murphy. Do you recollect his scalp cry? He was in the act of despoiling his victim of this trophy of success, when Sir Everard fired. Examine the body well, Mitchell, and discover where the wound lies."

The old soldier to whom this order was addressed now prepared, with the assistance of his comrades, to turn the body upon its back, when suddenly the air was rent with terrific yells, that seemed to be uttered in their very ears, and in the next instant more than a hundred dark and hideous savages sprang simultaneously to their feet within the bomb-proof, while every tree along the skirt of the forest gave back the towering form of a warrior. Each of these, in addition to his rifle, was armed with all those destructive implements of warfare which render the Indians of America so formidable and so terrible an enemy.

"Stand to your arms, men," shouted Captain Erskine, recovering from his first and unavoidable, though but momentary, surprise. "First and fourth sections, on your right and left backwards wheel:—Quick, men, within the square, for your lives." As he spoke, he and Lieutenant Johnstone sprang hastily back, and in time to obtain admittance within the troops, who had rapidly executed the manœuvre commanded. Not so with Mitchell and his companions. On the first alarm they had quitted the body of the mutilated officer, and flown to secure their arms, but even while in the act of stooping to take them up, they had been grappled by a powerful and vindictive foe; and the first thing they beheld on regaining their upright position, was a dusky Indian at the side, and a gleaming tomahawk flashing rapidly round the head of each.

"Fire not, on your lives," exclaimed Captain Erskine hastily, as he saw several of the men in front levelling, in the excitement of the moment, their muskets at the threatening savages. "Prepare for attack," he pursued; and in the next instant each man dropped on his right knee, and a barrier of bristling bayonets seemed to rise from the very bowels of the earth. Attracted by the novelty of the sight, the bold and daring warriors, although still retaining their firm grasp of the unhappy soldiers, were for a moment diverted from their bloody purpose, and temporarily suspended the quick and rotatory motion of their weapons. Captain Erskine took advantage of this pause to seize the halbert of one of his sergeants, to the extreme point of which he hastily attached a white pocket handkerchief, that was loosely thrust into the breast of his uniform; this he waved on high three several times, and then relinquishing the halbert, dropped also on his knee within the square.

"The dog of a Sagawak asks for mercy," said a voice from within the bomb-proof, and speaking in the dialect of the Ottawas. "His pale flag bespeaks the quailing of his heart, and his attitude denotes the timidity of the hind. His warriors are like himself, and even now upon their knees they call upon their Manitou to preserve them from the vengeance of the red-skins. But mercy is not for dogs like these. Now is the time to make our tomahawks warm in their blood; and every head that we count shall be a scalp upon our war poles."

As he ceased, one universal and portentous yell burst from the fiend-like band; and again the weapons of death were fiercely brandished around the heads of the stupified soldiers who had fallen into their power.

"What can they be about?" anxiously exclaimed Captain Erskine, in the midst of this deafening clamour, to his subaltern. "Quiet, man; damn you, quiet, or I'll cut you down," he pursued, addressing one of his soldiers, whose impatience caused him to bring his musket half up to the shoulder. And again he turned his head in the direction of the fort:—"Thank God, here it comes at last,—I feared my signal had not been noticed."

While he yet spoke, the loud roaring of a cannon from the ramparts was heard, and a shower of grape-shot passed over the heads of the detachment, and was seen tearing up the earth around the bomb-proof, and scattering fragments of stone and wood into the air. The men simultaneously and unbidden gave three cheers.

In an instant the scene was changed. As if moved by some mechanical impulse, the fierce band that lined the bomb-proof sank below the surface, and were no longer visible, while the warriors in the forest again sought shelter behind the trees. The captured soldiers were also liberated without injury, so sudden and startling had been the terror produced in the savages by the lightning flash that announced its heavy messengers of destruction. Discharge after discharge succeeded without intermission; but the guns had been levelled so high, to prevent injury to their own men; they had little other effect than to keep the Indians from the attack. The rush of bullets through the close forest, and the crashing of trees and branches as they fell with startling force upon each other, were, with the peals of artillery, the only noises now to be heard; for not a yell, not a word was uttered by the Indians after the first discharge; and but for the certainty that existed in every mind, it might have been supposed the whole of them had retired.

"Now is your time," cried Captain Erskine; "bring in the litter to the rear, and stoop as much as possible to avoid the shot."

The poor half-strangled fellows, however, instead of obeying the order of their captain, looked round in every direction for the enemy by whom they had been so rudely handled, and who had glided from them almost as imperceptibly and swiftly as they had at first approached. It seemed as if they apprehended that any attempt to remove the body would be visited by those fierce devils with the same appalling and ferocious threatenings.

"Why stand ye there, ye dolts," continued their captain, "looking around as if ye were bewitched? Bring the litter in to the rear. Mitchell, you old fool, are you grown a coward in your age? Are you not ashamed to set such an example to your comrades?"

The doubt thus implied of the courage of his men, who, in fact, were merely stupified with the scene they had gone through, had, as Captain Erskine expected, the desired effect. They now bent themselves to the litter, on which they had previously deposited their muskets, and with a self-possession that contrasted singularly with their recent air of wild astonishment, bore it to the rear at the risk of being cut in two at every moment by the fire from the fort. One fierce yell, instinctively proffered by several of the lurking band in the forest, marked their disappointment and rage at the escape of their victims; but all attempt at uncovering themselves, so as to be enabled to fire, was prevented by the additional showers of grape which that yell immediately brought upon them.

The position in which Captain Erskine now found himself was highly critical. Before him, and on either flank, was a multitude of savages, who only awaited the cessation of the fire from the fort to commence their fierce and impetuous attack. That that fire could not long be sustained was evident, since ammunition could ill be spared for the present inefficient purpose, where supplies of all kinds were so difficult to be obtained; and, if he should attempt a retreat, the upright position of his men exposed them to the risk of being swept away by the ponderous metal, that already fanned their cheeks with the air it so rapidly divided. Suddenly, however, the fire from the batteries was discontinued, and this he knew to be a signal for himself. He gave an order in a low voice, and the detachment quitted their recumbent and defensive position, still remaining formed in square. At the same instant, a gun flashed from the fort; but not as before was heard the rushing sound of the destructive shot crushing the trees in its resistless course. The Indians took courage at this circumstance, for they deemed the bullets of their enemies were expended; and that they were merely discharging their powder to keep up the apprehension originally produced. Again they showed themselves, like so many demons, from behind their lurking places; and yells and shouts of the most terrific and threatening character once more rent the air, and echoed through the woods. Their cries of anticipated triumph were, however, but of short duration. Presently, a hissing noise was heard in the air; and close to the bomb-proof, and at the very skirt of the forest, they beheld a huge globe of iron fall perpendicularly to the earth, to the outer part of which was attached what they supposed to be a reed, that spat forth innumerable sparks of fire, without however, seeming to threaten the slightest injury. Attracted by the novel sight, a dozen warriors sprang to the spot, and fastened their gaze upon it with all the childish wonder and curiosity of men in a savage state. One, more eager and restless than his fellows, stooped over it to feel with his hand of what it was composed. At that moment it burst, and limbs, and head, and entrails, were seen flying in the air, with the fragments of the shell, and prostrate and struggling forms lay writhing on every hand in the last, fierce agonies of death.

A yell of despair and a shout of triumph burst at the same moment from the adverse parties. Taking advantage of the terror produced, by this catastrophe, in the savages, Captain Erskine caused the men bearing the corpse to retreat, with all possible expedition, under the ramparts of the fort. He waited until they got nearly half way, and then threw forward the wheeling sections, that had covered this movement, once more into single file, in which order he commenced his retreat. Step by step, and almost imperceptibly, the men paced backwards, ready, at a moment's notice, to re-form the square. Partly recovered from the terror and surprise produced by the bursting of the shell, the Indians were quick in perceiving this movement: filled with rage at having been so long balked of their aim, they threw themselves once more impetuously from their cover; and, with stimulating yells, at length opened their fire. Several of Captain Erskine's men were wounded by this discharge; when, again, and furiously the cannon opened from the fort. It was then that the superiority of the artillery was made manifest. Both right and left of the retreating files the ponderous shot flew heavily past, carrying death and terror to the Indians; while not a man of those who intervened was scathed or touched in its progress. The warriors in the forest were once more compelled to shelter themselves behind the trees; but in the bomb-proof, where they were more secure, they were also more bold. From this a galling fire, mingled with the most hideous yells, was now kept up; and the detachment, in their slow retreat, suffered considerably. Several men had been killed; and, about twenty, including Lieutenant Johnstone, wounded, when again, one of those murderous globes fell, hissing in the very centre of the bomb-proof. In an instant, the Indian fire was discontinued; and their dark and plant forms were seen hurrying with almost incredible rapidity over the dilapidated walls, and flying into the very heart of the forest, so that when the shell exploded, a few seconds afterwards, not a warrior was to be seen. From this moment the attack was not renewed, and Captain Erskine made good his retreat without further molestation.

"Well, old buffers!" exclaimed one of the leading files, as the detachment, preceded by its dead and wounded, now moved along the moat in the direction of the draw-bridge. "how did you like the grip of them black savages?—I say, Mitchell, old Nick will scarcely know the face of you, it's so much altered by fright. Did you see?" turning to the man in his rear, "how harum-scarum he looked, when the captain called out to him to come off?"

"Hold your clapper, you spooney, and be d——d to you!" exclaimed the angry veteran.—"Had the Indian fastened his paw upon your ugly neck as he did upon mine, all the pitiful life your mother ever put into you would have been spirited away from very fear; so you needn't brag."

"Sure, and if any of ye had a grain of spunk, ye would have fired, and freed a fellow from the clutch of them Ingin thieves," muttered another of the men at the litter. "All the time, the devil had me by the throat, swinging his tommyhawk about my head, I saw ye dancing up and down in the heavens, instead of being on your marrow-bones on the common."

"And didn't I want to do it?" rejoined the first speaker. "Ask Tom Winkler here, if the captain didn't swear he'd cut my head off if I even offered so much as to touch the trigger of my musket."

"Faith, and lucky he did," replied his covering man. (for the ranks had again joined), "since but for that, there wouldn't be at this moment so much as a hair of the scalp of one of you left."

"By gracious," said a good-humoured, quaint looking Irishman, who had been fixing his eyes on the litter during this colloquy; "it sames to me, my boys, that ye have caught the wrong cow by the horns, and that all your pains has been for nothing at all, at all. By the pope, ye are all wrong; it's like bringing salt butter to Cork, or coals to your Newcastle, as ye call it. Who the devil ever heard of the officer wearing ammunition shoes?"

The men all turned their gaze on that part of the vestment of the corpse to which their attention had been directed by this remark, when it was at once perceived, although it had hitherto escaped the observation even of the officers, that, not only the shoes were those usually worn by the soldiers, and termed ammunition or store shoes, but also, the trowsers were of the description of coarse grey, peculiar to that class.

"By the piper and ye're right, Dick Doherty," exclaimed another Irishman; "sure, and it isn't the officer at all! Just look at the great black fist of him too, and never call me Phil Sheban, if it ever was made for the handling of an officer's spit."

"What a set of hignoramuses ye must be," granted old Mitchell, "not to see that the captain's hand is only covered with dirt; and as for the ammunition shoes and trowsers, why you know our officers wear any thing since we have been cooped up in this here fort."

"Yea, by the holy poker, off duty, if they like it," returned Phil Sheban; "but it isn't even the colonel's own born son that dare to do so while officer of the guard."

At this point of their conversation, one of the leading men at the litter, in turning to look at its subject, stumbled over the root of a stump that lay in his way, and fell violently forward. The sudden action destroyed the equilibrium of the corpse, which rolled off its temporary bier upon the earth, and disclosed, for the first time, a face begrimed with masses of clotted blood, which had streamed forth from the scalped brain during the night.

"It's the devil himself," said Phil Sheban, making the sign of the cross, half in jest, half in earnest: "for it isn't the captain at all, and who but the devil could have managed to clasp on his rigimintals?"

"No, it's an Ingian," remarked Dick Burford, sagaciously; "it's an Ingian that has killed the captain, and dressed himself in his clothes. I thought he smelt strong, when I helped to pick him up."

"What a set of prating fools ye are," interrupted the leading sergeant; "who ever saw an Ingian with light hair? and sure this hair in the neck is that of a Christian."

At that moment Captain Erskine, attracted by the sudden halt produced by the falling of the body, came quickly up to the front.

"What is the meaning of all this, Cassidy?" he sternly demanded of the sergeant; "why is this halt without my orders, and how comes the body here?"

"Carter stumbled against a root, sir, and the body rolled over upon the ground."

"And was the body to roll back again?" angrily rejoined his captain. "What mean ye, fellows, by standing there; quick, replace it upon the litter, and mind this does not occur again."

"They say, sir," said the sergeant, respectfully, as the men proceeded to their duty, "that it is not Captain de Haldimar after all, but an Ingian."

"Not Captain de Haldimar! are ye all mad? and have the Indians, in reality, turned your brains with fear?"

What, however, was his own surprise, and that of Lieutenant Johnstone, when, on a closer examination of the corpse, which the men had now placed with its face uppermost, they discovered the bewildering fact that it was not, indeed, Captain de Haldimar who lay before them, but a stranger, dressed in the uniform of that officer.

There was no time to solve, or even to dwell on the singular mystery; for the Indians, though now retired, might be expected to rally and renew the attack. Once more, therefore, the detachment moved forward; the officers dropping as before to the rear, to watch any movements of the enemy should he re-appear. Nothing, however, occurred to interrupt their march; and in a few minutes the heavy clanking sound of the chains of the drawbridge, as it was again raised by its strong pulleys, and the dull creaking sound of the rusty bolts and locks that secured the ponderous gate, announced the detachment was once more safely within the fort.

While the wounded men were being conveyed to the hospital, a group, comprising almost all the officers of the garrison, hastened to meet Captain Erskine and Lieutenant Johnstone. Congratulations on the escape of the one, and compliments, rather than condolences, on the accident of the other, which the arm en écharpe denoted to be slight, were hastily and warmly proffered. These felicitations were the genuine ebullitions of the hearts of men who really felt a pride, unmixed with jealousy, in the conduct of their fellows; and so cool and excellent had been the manner in which Captain Erskine had accomplished his object, that it had claimed the undivided admiration of all who had been spectators of the affair, and had, with the aid of their telescopes, been enabled to follow the minutest movements of the detachment.

"By heaven!" he at length replied, his chest swelling with gratified pride at the warm and generous approval of his companions; "this more than repays me for every risk. Yet, to be sincere, the credit is not mine, but Wentworth's. But for you, my dear fellow," grasping and shaking the hand of that officer, "we should have rendered but a Flemish account of ourselves. How beautifully those guns covered our retreat! and the first mortar that sent the howling devils flying in air like so many Will-o'-the-wisps, who placed that, Wentworth?"

"I did," replied the officer, with a quickness that denoted a natural feeling of exultation; "but Bombardier Kitson's was the most effective. It was his shell that drove the Indians finally out of the bomb-proof, and left the coast clear for your retreat."

"Then Kitson, and his gunners also, merit our best thanks," pursued Captain Erskine, whose spirits, now that his detachment was in safety, were more than usually exhilarated by the exciting events of the last hour; "and what will be more acceptable, perhaps, they shall each have a glass of my best old Jamaica before they sleep,—and such stuff is not to be met with every day in this wilderness of a country. But, confound my stupid head! where are Charles de Haldimar and Sir Everard Valletot?"

"Poor Charles is in a high fever, and confined to his bed," remarked Captain Blessington, who now came up adding his congratulations in a low tone, that marked the dependency of his heart; "and Sir Everard I have just left on the rampart with the company, looking, as he well may, the very image of despair."

"Run to them, Summers, my dear boy," said Erskine, hastily addressing himself to a young ensign who stood near him; "run quickly, and relieve them of their errors. Say it is not De Haldimar who has been killed, therefore they need not make themselves any longer uneasy on that score." The officers gave a start of surprise. Summers, however, hastened to acquit himself of the pleasing task assigned him, without waiting to hear the explanation of the singular declaration.

"Not De Haldimar!" eagerly and anxiously exclaimed Captain Blessington; "who then have you brought to us in his uniform, which I clearly distinguished from the rampart as you passed? Surely you would not tamper with us at such a moment, Erskine?"

"Who it is, I know no more than Adam," rejoined the other; "unless, indeed, it be the devil himself. All I do know, is, it is not our friend De Haldimar; although, as you observe, he most certainly wears his uniform. But you shall see and judge for yourselves, gentlemen. Sergeant Cassidy," he enquired of that individual, who now came to ask if the detachment was to be dismissed, "where have you placed the litter?"

"Under the piazza of the guard-room, sir," answered the sergeant. These words had scarcely been uttered, when a general and hasty movement of the officers, anxious to satisfy themselves by personal observation it was not indeed De Haldimar who had fallen, took place in the direction alluded to, and in the next moment they were at the side of the litter.

A blanket had been thrown upon the corpse to conceal the loathsome disfigurement of the face, over which masses of thick coagulated blood were laid in patches and streaks, that set all recognition at defiance. The formation of the head alone, which was round and short, denoted it to be not De Haldimar's. Not a feature was left undefiled; and even the eyes were so covered, it was impossible to say whether their lids were closed or open. More than one officer's cheek paled with the sickness that rose to his heart as he gazed on the hideous spectacle; yet, as the curiosity of all was strongly excited to know who the murdered man really was who had been so un-accountably inducted in the uniform of their lost companion, they were resolved to satisfy themselves without further delay. A basin of warm water and a sponge were procured from the guard-room of Ensign Fortescue, who now joined them, and with these Captain Blessington proceeded to remove the disguise.

In the course of this lavation, it was discovered the extraordinary flow of blood and brains had been produced by the infliction of a deep wound on the back of the head, by the sharp and ponderous tomahawk of an Indian. It was the only blow that had been given; and the circumstance of the deceased having been found lying on his face, accounted for the quantity of gore, that, trickling downwards, had so completely disguised every feature. As the coat of thick encrusted matter gave way beneath the frequent application of the moistening sponge, the pallid hue of the countenance denoted the murdered man to be a white. All doubt, however, was soon at an end. The ammunition shoes, the grey trousers, the coarse linen, and the stiff leathern stock encircling the neck, attested the sufferer to be a soldier of the garrison; but it was not until the face had been completely denuded of its unsightly covering, and every feature fully exposed, that that soldier was at length recognised to be Harry Donellan, the trusty and attached servant of Captain de Haldimar.

While yet the officers stood apart, gazing at the corpse, and forming a variety of conjectures, as vague as they were unsatisfactory, in regard to their new mystery, Sir Everard Valletort, pale and breathless with the speed he had used, suddenly appeared among them.

"God of heaven! can it be true—and is it really not De Haldimar whom I have shot?" wildly asked the agitated young man. "Who is this, Erskine?" he continued, glancing at the litter. "Explain, for pity's sake, and quickly."

"Compose yourself, my dear Valletort," replied the officer addressed. "You see this is not De Haldimar, but his servant Donellan. Neither has the latter met his death from your rifle; there is no mark of a bullet about him. It was an Indian tomahawk that did his business; and I will stake my head against a hickory nut the blow came from the same rascal at whom you fired, and who gave back the shot and the scalp halloo."

This opinion was unanimously expressed by the remainder of the officers. Sir Everard was almost as much overpowered by his joy, as he had previously been overwhelmed by his despair, and he grasped and shook the hand of Captain Erskine, who had thus been the means of relieving his conscience, with an energy of gratitude and feeling that almost drew tears from the eyes of that blunt but gallant officer.

"Thank God! thank God!" he fervently exclaimed: "I have not then even the death of poor Donellan to answer for;" and hastening from the guard-room, he pursued his course hurriedly and delightedly to the barrack-room of his friend.

CHAPTER VI.

The hour fixed for the trial of the prisoner Holloway had now arrived, and the officers composing the court were all met in the mess-room of the garrison, surrounding a long table covered with green cloth, over which were distributed pens, ink, and paper for taking minutes of the evidence, and such notes of the proceedings as the several members might deem necessary in the course of the trial. Captain Blessington presided; and next him, on either hand, were the first in seniority, the two junior occupying the lowest places. The demeanour of the several officers, serious and befitting the duty they were met to perform, was rendered more especially solemn from the presence of the governor, who sat a little to the right of the president, and without the circle, remained covered, and with his arms folded across his chest. At a signal given by the president to the orderly in waiting, that individual disappeared from the room, and soon afterwards Frank Holloway, strongly ironed, as on the preceding night, was ushered in by several files of the guard, under Ensign Fortescue himself.

The prisoner having been stationed a few paces on the left of the president, that officer stood up to administer the customary oath. His example was followed by the rest of the court, who now rose, and extending each his right hand upon the prayer book, repeated, after the president, the form of words prescribed by military law. They then, after successively touching the sacred volume with their lips, once more resumed their seats at the table.

The prosecutor was the Adjutant Lawson, who now handed over to the president a paper, from which the latter officer read, in a clear and distinct voice, the following charges, viz—

"1st. For having on the night of the —th September 1763, while on duty at the gate of the Fortress of Detroit, either admitted a stranger into the garrison himself, or suffered him to obtain admission, without giving the alarm, or using the means necessary to ensure his apprehension, such conduct being treasonable, and in breach of the articles of war."

"2d. For having been accessory to the abduction of Captain Frederick de Haldimar and private Harry Donellan, the disappearance of whom from the garrison can only be attributed to a secret understanding existing between the prisoner and the enemy without the walls, such conduct being treasonable, and in breach of the articles of war."

"Private Frank Holloway," continued Captain Blessington, after having perused these two short but important charges, "you have heard what has been preferred against you; what say you, therefore? Are you guilty, or not guilty?"

"Not guilty," firmly and somewhat exultingly replied the prisoner, laying his hand at the same time on his swelling heart.

"Stay, sir," sternly observed the governor, addressing the president; "you have not read all the charges."

Captain Blessington took up the paper from the table, on which he had carelessly thrown it, after reading the accusations above detailed, and perceived, for the first time, that a portion had been doubled back. His eye now glanced over a third charge, which had previously escaped his attention.

"Prisoner," he pursued, after the lapse of a minute, "there is a third charge against you, viz. for having, on the night of the —th Sept. 1763, suffered Captain de Haldimar to unclothe the gate of the fortress, and, accompanied by his servant, private Harry Donellan, to pass your post without the sanction of the governor, such conduct being in direct violation of a standing order of the garrison, and punishable with death."

The prisoner started. "What!" he exclaimed, his cheek paling for the first time with momentary apprehension; "is this voluntary confession of my own to be turned into a charge that threatens my life? Colonel de Haldimar, is the explanation which I gave you only this very hour, and in private, to be made the public instrument of my condemnation? Am I to die because I had not firmness to resist the prayer of my captain and of your son, Colonel de Haldimar?"

The president looked towards the governor, but a significant motion of the head was the only reply; he proceeded,— "Prisoner Holloway, what plead you to this charge? Guilty, or not guilty?"

"I see plainly," said Holloway, after the pause of a minute, during which he appeared to be summoning all his energies to his aid; "I see plainly that it is useless to strive against my fate. Captain de Haldimar is not here, and I must die. Still I shall not have the disgrace of dying as a traitor, though I own I have violated the orders of the garrison."

"Prisoner," interrupted Captain Blessington, "whatever you may have to urge, you had better reserve for your defence. Meanwhile, what answer do you make to the last charge preferred?—Are you guilty, or not guilty?"

"Guilty," said Holloway, in a tone of mingled pride and sorrow, "guilty of having listened to the earnest prayer of my captain, and suffered him, in violation of my orders, to pass my post. Of the other charges I am innocent."

The court listened with the most profound attention and interest to the words of the prisoner, and they glanced at each other in a manner that marked their sense of the truth they attached to his declaration.

"Holloway, prisoner," resumed Captain Blessington, mildly, yet impressively; "recollect the severe penalty which the third charge, no less than the others, entails, and recall your admission. Be advised by me," he pursued, observing his hesitation. "Withdraw your plea, then, and substitute that of not guilty to the whole."

"Captain Blessington," returned the prisoner with deep emotion, "I feel all the kindness of your motive; and if any thing can console me in my present situation, it is the circumstance of having presiding at my trial an officer so universally beloved by the whole corps. Still," and again his voice acquired its wonted firmness, and his cheek glowed with honest pride, "still, I say, I scorn to retract my words. Of the two first charges I am as innocent as the babe unborn. To the last I plead guilty; and vain would it be to say otherwise, since the gate was found open while I was on duty, and I know the penalty attached to the disobedience of orders."

After some further but ineffectual remonstrances on the part of the president, the pleas of the prisoner were recorded, and the examination commenced. Governor de Haldimar was the first witness.

That officer, having been sworn, stated, that on the preceding night he had been intruded upon in his apartment by a stranger, who could have obtained admission only through the gate of the fortress, by which also he must have made good his escape. That it was evident the prisoner had been in correspondence with their enemies; since, on proceeding to examine the gate it had been found unlocked, while the confusion manifested by him on being accused, satisfied all who were present of the enormity of his guilt. Search had been made every where for the keys, but without success.

The second charge was supported by presumptive evidence alone; for although the governor swore to the disappearance of his son, and the murder of his servant, and dwelt emphatically on the fact of their having been forcibly carried off with the connivance of the prisoner, still there was no other proof of this, than the deductions drawn from the circumstances already detailed. To meet this difficulty, however, the third charge had been framed.

In proof of this the governor stated, "that the prisoner, on being interrogated by him immediately subsequent to his being relieved from his post, had evinced such confusion and hesitation, as to leave no doubt whatever of his guilt; that, influenced by the half promises of communication, which the court had heard as well as himself, he had suffered the trial of the prisoner to be delayed until the present hour, strongly hoping he might then be induced to reveal the share he had borne in these unworthy and treasonable practices; that, with a view to obtain this disclosure, so essential to the safety of the garrison, he had, conjointly with Major Blackwater, visited the cell of the prisoner, to whom he related the fact of the murder of Donellan, in the disguise of his master's uniform, conjuring him, at the same time, if he regarded his own life, and the safety of those who were most dear to him, to give a clue to the solution of this mysterious circumstance, and disclose the nature and extent of his connection with the enemy without; that the prisoner however resolutely denied, as before, the guilt imputed to him, but having had time to concoct a plausible story, stated, (doubtless with a view to shield himself from the severe punishment he well knew to be attached to his offence,) that Captain de Haldimar himself had removed the keys from the guard-room, opened the gate of the fortress, and accompanied by his servant, dressed in a coloured coat, had sallied forth upon the common. And this, emphatically pursued the governor, the prisoner admits he permitted, although well aware that, by an order of long standing for the security of the garrison, such a flagrant dereliction of his duty subjected him to the punishment of death."

Major Blackwater was the next witness examined. His testimony went to prove the fact of the gate having been found open, and the confusion manifested by the prisoner. It also substantiated that part of the governor's evidence on the third charge, which related to the confession recently made by Holloway, on which that charge had been framed.

The sergeant of the guard, and the governor's orderly having severally corroborated the first portions of Major Blackwater's evidence, the examination on the part of the prosecution terminated; when the president called on the prisoner Holloway for his defence. The latter, in a clear, firm, and collected tone, and in terms that surprised his auditory, thus addressed the Court:—

"Mr. President, and gentlemen,—Although standing before you in the capacity of a private soldier, and, oh! bitter and humiliating reflection, in that most wretched and disgraceful of all situations, a suspected traitor, I am not indeed what I seem to be. It is not for me here to enter into the history of my past life; neither will I tarnish the hitherto unsullied reputation of my family by disclosing my true name. Suffice it to observe, I am a gentleman by birth; and although, of late years, I have known all the hardships and privations attendant on my fallen fortunes, I was once used to bask in the luxuries of affluence, and to look upon those who now preside in judgment over me as my equals. A marriage of affection,—a marriage with one who had nothing but her own virtues and her own beauty to recommend her, drew upon me the displeasure of my family, and the little I possessed, independently of the pleasure of my relations, was soon dissipated. My proud soul scorned all thought of supplication to those who had originally spurned my wife from their presence; and yet my heart bled for the privations of her who, alike respectable in family, was, both from sex and the natural delicacy of her frame, so far less constituted to bear up against the frowns of adversity than myself. Our extremity had now become great,—too great for human endurance; when, through the medium of the public prints, I became acquainted with the glorious action that had been fought in this country by the army under General Wolfe. A new light burst suddenly upon my mind, and visions of after prosperity constantly presented themselves to my view. The field of honour was open before me, and there was a probability I might, by good conduct, so far merit the approbation of my superiors, as to obtain, in course of time, that rank among themselves to which by birth and education I was so justly entitled to aspire. Without waiting to consult my Ellen, whose opposition I feared to encounter until opposition would be fruitless, I hastened to Lieutenant Walgrave, the recruiting officer of the regiment,—tendered my services,—was accepted and approved,—received the bounty money,—and became definitely a soldier, under the assumed name of Frank Halloway.

"It would be tedious and impertinent, gentlemen," resumed the prisoner, after a short pause, "to dwell on the humiliations of spirit to which both my wife and myself were subjected at our first introduction to our new associates, who, although invariably kind to us, were nevertheless, ill suited, both by education and habit, to awaken any thing like congeniality of feeling or similarity of pursuit. Still we endeavoured, as much as possible, to lessen the distance that existed between us; and from the first moment of our joining the regiment, determined to adopt the phraseology and manners of those with whom an adverse destiny had so singularly connected us. In this we succeeded; for no one, up to the present moment, has imagined either my wife or myself to be other than the simple unpretending Frank and Ellen Halloway.

"On joining the regiment in this country," pursued the prisoner, after another pause, marked by much emotion, "I had the good fortune to be appointed to the grenadier company. Gentlemen, you all know the amiable qualities of Captain de Haldimar. But although, unlike yourselves, I have learnt to admire that officer only at a distance, my devotion to his interests has been proportioned to the kindness with which I have ever been treated by him; and may I not add, after this avowal of my former condition, my most fervent desire has all along been to seize the first favourable opportunity of performing some action that would eventually elevate me to a position in which I might, without blushing for the absence of the ennobling qualities of birth and condition, avow myself his friend, and solicit that distinction from my equal which was partially extended to me by my superior? The opportunity I sought was not long wanting. At the memorable affair with the French general, Levi, at Quebec, in which our regiment bore so conspicuous a part, I had the good fortune to save the life of my captain. A band of Indians, as you all, gentlemen, must recollect, had approached our right flank unperceived, and while busily engaged with the French in front, we were compelled to divide our fire between them and our new and fierce assailants. The leader of that band was a French officer, who seemed particularly to direct his attempts against the life of Captain de Haldimar. He was a man of powerful proportions and gigantic stature—"

"Hold!" said the governor, starting suddenly from the seat in which he had listened with evident impatience to this long outline of the prisoner's history. "Gentlemen," addressing the court, "that is the very stranger who was in my apartment last night,—the being with whom the prisoner is evidently in treacherous correspondence, and all this absurd tale is but a blind to deceive your judgment, and mitigate his own punishment. Who is there to prove the man he has just described was the same who aimed at Captain de Haldimar's life at Quebec."

A flush of deep indignation overspread the features of the prisoner, whose high spirit, now he had avowed his true origin, could ill brook the affront thus put upon his veracity.

"Colonel de Haldimar!" he proudly replied, while his chains clanked with the energy and force with which he drew up his person into an attitude of striking dignity; "for once I sink the private soldier, and address you in the character of the gentleman and your equal.

I have a soul, sir, notwithstanding my fallen fortunes, as keenly alive to honour as your own; and not even to save my wretched life, would I be guilty of the baseness you now attribute to me. You have asked," he pursued, in a more solemn tone, "what proof I have to show this individual to be the same who attempted the life of Captain de Haldimar. To Captain de Haldimar himself, should Providence have spared his days, I shall leave the melancholy task of bearing witness to all I here advance, when I shall be no more. Nay, sir," and his look partook at once of mingled scorn and despondency, "well do I know the fate that awaits me; for in these proceedings—in that third charge—I plainly read my death-warrant. But what, save my poor and wretched wife, have I to regret? Colonel de Haldimar," he continued, with a vehemence meant to check the growing weakness which the thought of his unfortunate companion called up to his heart, "I saved the life of your son, even by your own admission, no matter whose the arm that threatened his existence; and in every other action in which I have been engaged, honourable mention has ever been made of my conduct. Now, sir, I ask what has been my reward? So far from attending to the repeated recommendations of my captain for promotion, even in a subordinate rank, have you once deemed it necessary to acknowledge my services by even a recognition of them in any way whatever?"

"Mr. President, Captain Blessington," interrupted the governor haughtily, are we met here to listen to such language from a private soldier? You will do well, sir, to exercise your prerogative, and stay such impertinent matter, which can have no reference whatever to the defence of the prisoner."

"Prisoner," resumed the president, who as well as the other members of the court, had listened with the most profound and absorbing interest to the singular disclosure of him whom they still only knew as Frank Halloway, "this language cannot be permitted; you must confine yourself to your defence."

"Pardon me, gentlemen," returned Halloway, in his usual firm but respectful tone of voice; pardon me, if, standing on the brink of the grave as I do, I have so far forgotten the rules of military discipline as to sink for a moment the soldier in the gentleman; but to be taxed with an unworthy fabrication, and to be treated with contumely when avowing the secret of my condition, was more than human pride and human feeling could tolerate."

"Confine yourself, prisoner, to your defence," again remarked Captain Blessington, perceiving the restlessness with which the governor listened to these bold and additional observations of Halloway.

Again the governor interposed:—"What possible connection can there be between this man's life, and the crime with which he stands charged? Captain Blessington, this is trifling with the court, who are assembled to try the prisoner for his treason, and not to waste their time in listening to a history utterly foreign to the subject."

"The history of my past life—Colonel de Haldimar," proudly returned the prisoner, "although tedious and uninteresting to you, is of the utmost importance to myself; for on that do I ground the most essential part of my defence. There is nothing but circumstantial evidence against me on the two first charges; and as those alone can reflect dishonour on my memory, it is for the wisdom of this court to determine whether that evidence is to be credited in opposition to the solemn declaration of him, who, in admitting one charge, equally affecting his life with the others, repudiates as foul those only which would attain his honour. Gentlemen," he pursued, addressing the court, "it is for you to determine whether my defence is to be continued or not; yet, whatever be my fate, I would fain remove all injurious impression from the minds of my judges; and this can only be done by a simple detail of circumstances, which may, by the unprejudiced, be as simply believed."

Here the prisoner paused: when, after some low and earnest conversation among the members of the court, two or three slips of written paper were passed to the President. He glanced his eye hurriedly over them, and then directed Halloway to proceed with his defence.

"I have stated," pursued the interesting soldier, "that the officer who led the band of Indians was a man of gigantic stature, and of apparently great strength. My attention was particularly directed to him from this circumstance, and as I was on the extreme flank of the grenadiers, and close to Captain de Haldimar, I had every opportunity of observing his movements principally pointed at that officer. He first discharged a carbine, the ball of which killed a man of the company at his (Captain de Haldimar's) side; and then, with evident rage at having been defeated in his aim, he took a pistol from his belt, and advancing with rapid strides to within a few paces of his intended victim, presented it in the most deliberate manner. At that moment, gentlemen, (and it was but the work of a moment,) a thousand confused and almost inexplicable feelings rose to my heart. The occasion I had long sought was at length within my reach; but even the personal considerations, which had hitherto influenced my mind, were sunk in the anxious desire I entertained to preserve the life of an officer so universally beloved, and so every way worthy of the sacrifice. While yet the pistol remained levelled, I sprang before Captain de Haldimar, received the ball in my breast, and had just strength sufficient to fire my musket at the formidable enemy, when I sank senseless to the earth.

"It will not be difficult for you, gentlemen, who have feeling minds, to understand the pleasurable pride with which, on being conveyed to Captain de Haldimar's own apartments in Quebec, I found myself almost overwhelmed by the touching marks of gratitude showered on me by his amiable relatives. Miss Clara de Haldimar, in particular, like a ministering angel, visited my couch of suffering at almost every hour, and always provided with some little delicacy, suitable to my condition, of which I had long since tutored myself to forget even the use. But what principally afforded me pleasure, was to remark the consolations which she tendered to my poor drooping Ellen, who, already more than half subdued by the melancholy change in our condition in life, frequently spent hours together in silent grief at the side of my couch, and watching every change in my countenance with all the intense anxiety of one who feels the last stay on earth is about to be severed for ever. Ah! how I then longed to disclose to this kind and compassionate being the true position of her on whom she lavished her attention, and to make her known not as the inferior honoured by her notice, but as the equal alike worthy of her friendship and deserving of her esteem; but the wide, wide barrier that divided the wife of the private soldier from the daughter and sister of the commissioned officer sealed my lips, and our true condition continued unrevealed.

"Gentlemen," resumed Halloway, after a short pause, "if I dwell on these circumstances, it is with a view to show how vile are the charges preferred against me. Is it likely, with all the incentives to good conduct I have named, I should have proved a traitor to my country? And, even if so, what to gain, I would ask; and by what means was a correspondence with the enemy to be maintained by one in my humble station? As for the second charge, how infamous, how injurious is it to my reputation, how unworthy to be entertained! From the moment of my recovery from that severe wound, every mark of favour that could be bestowed on persons in our situation had been extended to my wife and myself, by the family of Colonel de Haldimar; and my captain, knowing me merely as the simple and low born Frank Halloway, although still the preserver of his life, has been unceasing in his exertions to obtain such promotion as he thought my conduct generally, independently of my devotedness to his person, might claim. How these applications were met, gentlemen, I have already stated; but notwithstanding Colonel de Haldimar has never deemed me worthy of the promotion solicited, that circumstance could in no way weaken my regard and attachment for him who had so often demanded it. How then, in the name of heaven, can a charge so improbable, so extravagant, as that of having been instrumental in the abduction of Captain de Haldimar, be entertained? and who is there among you, gentlemen, who will for one moment believe I could harbour a thought so absurd as that of lending myself to the destruction of one for whom I once cheerfully offered up the sacrifice of my blood? And now," pursued the prisoner, after another short pause, "I come to the third charge,—that charge which most affects my life, but impugns neither my honour nor my fidelity. That God, before whom I know I shall shortly appear, can attest the sincerity of my statement, and before him do I now solemnly declare what I am about to relate is true.

"Soon after the commencement of my watch last night, I heard a voice distinctly on the outside of the rampart, near my post, calling in a low and subdued tone on the name of Captain de Haldimar. The accents, hastily and anxiously uttered, were apparently those of a female. For a moment I continued irresolute how to act, and hesitated whether or not I should alarm the garrison; but, at length, presuming it was some young female of the village with whom my captain was acquainted, it occurred to me the most prudent course would be to apprise that officer himself. While I yet hesitated whether to leave my post for a moment for the purpose, a man crossed the parade a few yards in my front; it was Captain de Haldimar's servant, Donellan, then in the act of carrying some things from his master's apartment to the guard-room. I called to him, to say the sentinel at the gate wished to see the captain of the guard immediately. In the course of a few minutes he came up to my post, when I told him what I had heard. At that moment, the voice again repeated his name, when he abruptly left me and turned to the left of the gate, evidently on his way to the rampart. Soon afterwards I heard Captain de Haldimar immediately above me, sharply calling out 'Hist, hist!' as if the person on the outside, despairing of success, was in the act of retreating. A moment or two of silence succeeded, when a low conversation ensued between the parties. The distance was so great I could only distinguish inarticulate sounds; yet it seemed to me as if they spoke not in English, but in the language of the Ottawa Indians, a tongue with which, as you are well aware, gentlemen, Captain de Haldimar is familiar. This had continued about ten minutes when I again heard footsteps hastily descending the rampart, and moving in the direction of the guard-house. Soon afterwards Captain de Haldimar re-appeared at my post, accompanied by his servant Donellan; the former had the keys of the gate in his hand, and he told me that he must pass to the skirt of the forest on some business of the last importance to the safety of the garrison.

"At first I peremptorily refused, stating the severe penalty attached to the infringement of an order, the observation of which had so especially been insisted upon by the governor, whose permission, however, I ventured respectfully to urge, might, without difficulty, be obtained, if the business was really of the importance he described it. Captain de Haldimar, however, declared he well knew the governor would not accord that permission, unless he was positively acquainted with the nature and extent of the danger to be apprehended; and of these, he said, he was not himself sufficiently aware. All argument of this nature proving ineffectual, he attempted to enforce his authority, not only in his capacity of officer of the guard, but also as my captain, ordering me, on pain of confinement, not to interfere with or attempt to impede his departure. This, however, produced no better result; for I knew that, in this instance, I was amenable to the order of the governor alone, and I again firmly refused to violate my duty.

"Finding himself thwarted in his attempt to enforce my obedience, Captain de Haldimar, who seemed much agitated and annoyed by what he termed my obstinacy, now descended to entreaty; and in the name of that life which I had preserved to him, and of that deep gratitude which he had ever since borne to me, conjured me not to prevent his departure. 'Halloway,' he urged, 'your life, my life, my father's life,—the life of my sister Clara perhaps, who nursed you in illness, and who has ever treated your wife with attention and kindness,—all these depend upon your compliance with my request. Hear me,' he pursued, following up the impression which he clearly perceived he had produced in me by this singular and touching language: 'I promise to be back within the hour; there is no danger attending my departure, and here will I be before you are relieved from your post; no one can know I have been absent, and your secret will remain with Donellan and myself. Do you think,' he concluded, 'I would encourage a soldier of my regiment to disobey a standing order of the garrison, unless there was some very extraordinary reason for my so doing? But there is no time to be lost in parley. Halloway! I entreat you to offer no further opposition to my departure. I pledge myself to be back before you are relieved.'

"Gentlemen," impressively continued the prisoner, after a pause, during which each member of the court seemed to breathe for the first time, so deeply had the attention of all been riveted by the latter part of this singular declaration, "how, under these circumstances, could I be expected to act? Assured by Captain de Haldimar, in the most solemn manner, that the existence of those most dear to his heart hung on my compliance with his request, how could I refuse to him, whose life I had saved, and whose character I so much esteemed, a boon so earnestly, nay, so imploringly solicited? I acceded to his prayer, intimating at the same time, if he returned not before another sentinel should relieve me, the discovery of my breach of duty must be made, and my punishment inevitable. His last words, however, were to assure me he should return at the hour he had named, and when I closed the gate upon him, it was under the same impression his absence would only prove of the temporary nature he had stated.—Gentlemen," abruptly concluded Halloway, "I have nothing further to add; if I have failed in my duty as a soldier, I have, at least, fulfilled that of a man; and although the violation of the first entail upon me the punishment of death, the motives which impelled me to that violation will not, I trust, be utterly lost sight of by those by whom my punishment is to be awarded."

The candid, fearless, and manly tone in which Halloway had delivered this long and singular statement, however little the governor appeared to be affected by it, evidently made a deep impression on the court, who had listened with undiverted attention to the close. Some conversation again ensued, in a low tone, among several members, when two slips of written paper were passed up, as before, to the president. These elicited the following interrogatories:—

"You have stated, prisoner, that Captain de Haldimar left the fort accompanied by his servant Donellan. How were they respectively dressed?"

"Captain de Haldimar in his uniform; Donellan, as far as I could observe, in his regimental clothing also, with this difference, that he wore his servant's round glazed hat and his grey great coat."

"How then do you account for the extraordinary circumstance of Donellan having been found murdered in his master's clothes? Was any allusion made to a change of dress before they left the fort?"

"Not the slightest," returned the prisoner; "nor can I in any way account for this mysterious fact. When they quitted the garrison, each wore the dress I have described."

"In what manner did Captain de Haldimar and Donellan effect their passage across the ditch?" continued the president, after glancing at the second slip of paper. "The draw-bridge was evidently not lowered, and there were no other means at hand to enable him to effect his object with promptitude. How do you explain this, prisoner?"

When this question was put, the whole body of officers, and the governor especially, turned their eyes simultaneously on Halloway, for on his hesitation or promptness in replying seemed to attach much of the credit they were disposed to accord his statement. Halloway observed it, and coloured. His reply, however, was free, unflinching, and unstudied.

"A rope with which Donellan had provided himself, was secured to one of the iron hooks that support the pulleys immediately above the gate. With this they swung themselves in succession to the opposite bank."

The members of the court looked at each other, apparently glad that an answer so confirmatory of the truth of the prisoner's statement, had been thus readily given.

"Were they to have returned in the same manner?" pursued the president, framing his interrogatory from the contents of another slip of paper, which, at the suggestion of the governor, had been passed to him by the prosecutor, Mr. Lawson.

"They were," firmly replied the prisoner. "At least I presumed they were, for, I believe in the hurry of Captain de Haldimar's departure, he never once made any direct allusion to the manner of his return; nor did it occur to me until this moment how they were to regain possession of the rope, without assistance from within."

"Of course," observed Colonel de Haldimar, addressing the president, "the rope still remains. Mr. Lawson examine the gate, and report accordingly."

The adjutant hastened to acquit himself of this laconic order, and soon afterwards returned, stating not only that there was no rope, but that the hook alluded to had disappeared altogether.

For a moment the cheek of the prisoner paled; but it was evidently less from any fear connected with his individual existence, than from the shame he felt at having been detected in a supposed falsehood. He however speedily recovered his self-possession, and exhibited the same character of unconcern by which his general bearing throughout the trial had been distinguished.

On this announcement of the adjutant, the governor betrayed a movement of impatience, that was meant to convey his utter disbelief of the whole of the prisoner's statement, and his look seemed to express to the court it should also arrive, and without hesitation, at the same conclusion. Even all authoritative as he was, however, he felt that military etiquette and strict discipline prevented his interfering further in this advanced state of the proceedings.

"Prisoner," again remarked Captain Blessington, "your statement in regard to the means employed by Captain de Haldimar in effecting his departure, is, you must admit, unsupported by appearances. How happens it the rope is no longer where you say it was placed? No one could have removed it but yourself. Have you done so? and if so, can you produce it, or say where it is to be found?"

"Captain Blessington," replied Halloway, proudly, yet respectfully, "I have already invoked that great Being, before whose tribunal I am so shortly to appear, in testimony of the truth of my assertion; and again, in his presence, do I repeat, every word I have uttered is true. I did not remove the rope, neither do I know what is become of it. I admit its disappearance is extraordinary, but a moment's reflection must satisfy the court, I would not have devised a tale, the falsehood of which could at once have been detected on an examination such as that which has just been instituted. When Mr. Lawson left this room just now, I fully expected he would have found the rope lying as it had been left. What has become of it, I repeat, I know not; but in the manner I have stated did Captain de Haldimar and Donellan cross the ditch. I have nothing further to add," he concluded once more, drawing up his fine tall person, the native elegance of which could not be wholly disguised even in the dress of a private soldier; "nothing further to disclose. Yet do I repel with scorn the injurious insinuation against my fidelity, suggested in these doubts. I am prepared to meet my death as best may become a soldier, and let me add, as best may become a proud and well born gentleman; but humanity and common justice should at least be accorded to my memory. I am an unfortunate man, but no traitor."

The members were visibly impressed by the last sentences of the prisoner. No further question however was asked, and he was again removed by the escort, who had been wondering spectators of the scene, to the cell he had so recently occupied. The room was then cleared of the witnesses and strangers, the latter comprising nearly the whole of the officers off duty, when the court proceeded to deliberate on the evidence, and pass sentence on the accused.

CHAPTER VII.

Although the young and sensitive De Haldimar had found physical relief in the summary means resorted to by the surgeon, the moral wound at his heart not only remained unsoothed, but was rendered more acutely painful by the wretched reflections, which now that he had full leisure to review the past, and anticipate the future in all the gloom attached to both, so violently assailed him. From the moment when his brother's strange and mysterious disappearance had been communicated by the adjutant in the manner we have already seen, his spirits had been deeply and fearfully depressed. Still he had every reason to expect, from the well-known character of Halloway, the strong hope expressed by the latter might be realised; and that, at the hour appointed for trial, his brother would be present to explain the cause of his mysterious absence, justify the conduct of his subordinate, and exonerate him from the treachery with which he now stood charged. Yet, powerful as this hope was, it was unavoidably qualified by dispiriting doubt; for a nature affectionate and bland, as that of Charles de Haldimar, could not but harbour distrust, while a shadow of uncertainty, in regard to the fate of a brother so tenderly loved, remained. He had forced himself to believe as much as possible what he wished, and the effort had, to a certain extent, succeeded; but there had been something so solemn and so impressive in the scene that had passed when the prisoner was first brought up for trial, something so fearfully prophetic in the wild language of his unhappy wife, he had found it impossible to resist the influence of the almost superstitious awe they had awakened in his heart.

What the feelings of the young officer were subsequently, when in the person of the murdered man on the common, the victim of Sir Everard Valtort's aim, he recognised that brother, whose disappearance had occasioned him so much inquietude, we shall not attempt to describe: their nature is best shown in the effect they produced—the almost overwhelming agony of body and mind, which had borne him, like a stricken plant, unresisting to the earth. But now that, in the calm and solitude of his chamber, he had leisure to review the fearful events conspiring to produce this extremity, his anguish of spirit was even deeper than when the first rude shock of conviction had flashed upon his understanding. A tide of suffering, that overpowered, without rendering him sensible of its positive and abstract character, had, in the first instance, oppressed his faculties, and obscured his perception; but now, slow, sure, stinging, and gradually succeeding each other, came every bitter thought and reflection of which that tide was composed; and the generous heart of Charles de Haldimar was a prey to feelings that would have wrung the soul, and wounded the sensibilities of one far less gentle and susceptible than himself.

Between Sir Everard Valletort and Charles de Haldimar, who, it has already been remarked, were lieutenants in Captain Blessington's company, a sentiment of friendship had been suffered to spring up almost from the moment of Sir Everard's joining. The young men were nearly of the same age; and although the one was all gentleness, the other all spirit and vivacity, not a shade of disunion had at any period intervened to interrupt the almost brotherly attachment subsisting between them, and each felt the disposition of the other was the one most assimilated to his own. In fact, Sir Everard was far from being the ephemeral character he was often willing to appear. Under a semblance of affectation, and much assumed levity of manner, never, however, personally offensive, he concealed a brave, generous, warm, and manly heart, and talents becoming the rank he held in society, such as would not have reflected discredit on one numbering twice his years. He had entered the army, as most young men of rank usually did at that period, rather for the agrément it held forth, than with any serious view to advancement in it as a profession. Still he entertained the praiseworthy desire of being something more than what is, among military men, emphatically termed a feather-bed soldier. Not that we mean, however, to assert he was not a feather-bed soldier in its more literal sense; in fact, his own observations, recorded in the early part of this volume, sufficiently prove his predilection for the indulgence of pressing his downy couch to what is termed a decent hour in the day.

We need scarcely state Sir Everard's theories on this important subject were seldom reduced to practice; for, even long before the Indians had broken out into open acts of hostility, when such precautions were rendered indispensable, Colonel de Haldimar had never suffered either officer or man to linger on his pillow after the first faint dawn had appeared. This was a system to which Sir Everard could never reconcile himself. "If the men must be drilled," he urged, "with a view to their health and discipline, why not place them under the direction of the adjutant or the officer of the day, whoever he might chance to be, and not unnecessarily disturb a body of gentlemen from their comfortable slumbers at that unconscionable hour?" Poor Sir Everard! this was the only grievance of which he complained, and he complained bitterly. Scarcely a morning passed without his inveighing loudly against the barbarity of such a custom; threatening at the same time, amid the laughter of his companions, to quit the service in disgust at what he called so ungentlemanly and gothic a habit; and, but for two motives, there is every probability he would have seriously availed himself of the earliest opportunity of retiring. The first of these was his growing friendship for the amiable and gentle Charles de Haldimar; the second, the secret, and scarcely to himself acknowledged, interest which had been created in his heart for his sister Clara; whom he only knew from the glowing descriptions of his friend, and the strong resemblance she was said to bear to him by the other officers.

Clara de Haldimar was the constant theme of her younger brother's praise. Her image was ever uppermost in his thoughts—her name ever hovering on his lips; and when alone with his friend Valletort, it was his delight to dwell on the worth and accomplishments of his amiable and beloved sister. Then, indeed, would his usually calm blue eye sparkle with the animation of his subject, while his colouring cheek marked all the warmth and sincerity with which he bore attestation to her gentleness and her goodness. The heart of Charles de Haldimar, soldier as he was, was pure, generous, and unsophisticated as that of the sister whom he so constantly eulogised; and, while listening to his eloquent praises, Sir Everard learnt to feel an interest in a being whom all declared to be the counterpart of her brother, as well in personal attraction as in singleness of nature. With all his affected levity, and notwithstanding his early initiation into fashionable life—that matter-of-fact life which strikes at the existence of our earlier and dearer illusions—there was a dash of romance in the character of the young baronet which tended much to increase the pleasure he always took in the warm descriptions of his friend. The very circumstance of her being personally unknown to him, was, with Sir Everard, an additional motive for interest in Miss de Haldimar.

Imagination and mystery generally work their way together; and as there was a shade of mystery attached to Sir Everard's very ignorance of the person of one whom he admired and esteemed from report alone, imagination was not slow to improve the opportunity, and to endow the object with characteristics, which perhaps a more intimate knowledge of the party might have led him to qualify. In this manner, in early youth, are the silken and willing fetters of the generous and the enthusiastic forged. We invest some object, whose praises, whispered secretly in the ear, have glided imperceptibly to the heart, with all the attributes supplied by our own vivid and readily according imaginations; and so accustomed do we become to linger on the picture, we adore the semblance with an ardour which the original often fails to excite.

We do not say Clara de Haldimar would have fallen short of the high estimate formed of her worth by the friend of her brother; neither is it to be understood, Sir Everard suffered this fair vision of his fancy to lead him into the wild and labyrinthian paths of boyish romance.

Whatever were the impressions of the young baronet, and however he might have been inclined to suffer the fair image of the gentle Clara, such as he was perhaps wont to paint it, to exercise its spell upon his fancy, certain it is, he never expressed to her brother more than that esteem and interest which it was but natural he should accord to the sister of his friend. Neither had Charles de Haldimar, even amid all his warmth of commendation, ever made the slightest allusion to his sister, that could be construed into a desire she should awaken any unusual or extraordinary sentiment of preference. Much and fervently as he desired such an event, there was an innate sense of decorum, and it may be secret pride, that caused him to abstain from any observation having the remotest tendency to compromise the spotless delicacy of his adored sister; and such he would have considered any expression of his own hopes and wishes, where no declaration of preference had been previously made. There was another motive for this reserve on the part of the young officer. The baronet was an only child, and would, on attaining his majority, of which he wanted only a few months, become the possessor of a large fortune. His sister Clara, on the contrary, had little beyond her own fair fame and the beauty transmitted to her by the mother she had lost. Colonel de Haldimar was a younger son, and had made his way through life with his sword, and an unblemished reputation alone—advantages he had shared with his children, for the two eldest of whom his interest and long services had procured commissions in his own regiment.

But even while Charles de Haldimar abstained from all expression of his hopes, he had fully made up his mind that Sir Everard and his sister were so formed for each other, it was next to an impossibility they could meet without loving. In one of his letters to the latter, he had alluded to his friend in terms of so high and earnest panegyric, that Clara had acknowledged, in reply, she was prepared to find in the young baronet one whom she should regard with partiality, if it were only on account of the friendship subsisting between him and her brother. This admission, however, was communicated in confidence, and the young officer had religiously preserved his sister's secret.

These and fifty other recollections now crowded on the mind of the sufferer, only to render the intensity of his anguish more complete; among the bitterest of which was the certainty that the mysterious events of the past night had raised up an insuperable barrier to this union; for how could Clara de Haldimar become the wife of him whose hands were, however innocently, stained with the life-blood of her brother! To dwell on this, and the loss of that brother, was little short of madness, and yet De Haldimar could think of nothing else; nor for a period could the loud booming of the cannon from the ramparts, every report of which shook his chamber to its very foundations, call off his attention from a subject which, while it pained, engrossed every faculty and absorbed every thought. At length, towards the close, he called faintly to the old and faithful soldier, who, at the foot of the bed, stood watching every change of his master's countenance, to know the cause of the cannonade. On being informed the batteries in the rear were covering the retreat of Captain Erskine, who, in his attempt to obtain the body, had been surprised by the Indians, a new direction was temporarily given to his thoughts, and he now manifested the utmost impatience to know the result.

In a few minutes Morrison, who, in defiance of the surgeon's strict order not on any account to quit the room, had flown to obtain some intelligence which he trusted might remove the anxiety of his suffering master, again made his appearance, stating the corpse was already secured, and close under the guns of the fort, beneath which the detachment, though hotly assailed from the forest, were also fast retreating.

"And is it really my brother, Morrison? Are you quite certain that it is Captain de Haldimar?" asked the young officer, in the eager accents of one who, with the fullest conviction on his mind, yet grasps at the faintest shadow of a consoling doubt. "Tell me that it is not my brother, and half of what I possess in the world shall be yours."

The old soldier brushed a tear from his eye. "God bless you, Mr. de Haldimar, I would give half my grey hairs to be able to do so; but it is, indeed, too truly the captain who has been killed. I saw the very wings of his regimentals as he lay on his face on the litter."

Charles de Haldimar groaned aloud. "Oh God! oh God! would I had never lived to see this day." Then springing suddenly up in his bed—"Morrison where are my clothes? I insist on seeing my slaughtered brother myself."

"Good Heaven, sir, consider," said the old man approaching the bed, and attempting to replace the covering which had been spurned to its very foot—"consider you are in a burning fever, and the slightest cold may kill you altogether. The doctor's orders are, you were on no account to get up." The effort made by the unfortunate youth was momentary. Faint from the blood he had lost, and giddy from the excitement of his feelings, he sank back exhausted on his pillow, and wept like a child.

Old Morrison shed tears also; for his heart bled for the sufferings of one whom he had nursed and played with even in early infancy, and whom, although his master, he regarded with the affection he would have borne to his own child. As he had justly observed, he would have willingly given half his remaining years to be able to remove the source of the sorrow which so deeply oppressed him.

When this violent paroxysm had somewhat subsided, De Haldimar became more composed; but his was rather that composure which grows out of the apathy produced by overwhelming grief, than the result of any relief afforded to his suffering heart by the tears he had shed. He had continued some time in this faint and apparently tranquil state, when confused sounds in the barrack-yard, followed by the raising of the heavy drawbridge, announced the return of the detachment. Again he started up in his bed and demanded his clothes, declaring his intention to go out and receive the corpse of his murdered brother. All opposition on the part of the faithful Morrison was now likely to prove fruitless, when suddenly the door opened, and an officer burst hurriedly into the room.

"Courage! courage! my dear De Haldimar; I am the bearer of good news. Your brother is not the person who has been slain."

Again De Haldimar sank back upon his pillow, overcome by a variety of conflicting emotions. A moment afterwards, and he exclaimed reproachfully, yet almost gasping with the eagerness of his manner,—

"For God's sake, Sumners—in the name of common humanity, do not trifle with my feelings. If you would seek to lull me with false hopes, you are wrong. I am prepared to hear and bear the worst at present; but to be undeceived again would break my heart."

"I swear to you by every thing I have been taught to revere as sacred," solemnly returned Ensign Sumners, deeply touched by the affliction he witnessed, "what I state is strictly true. Captain Erskine himself sent me to tell you."

"What, is he only wounded then?" and a glow of mingled hope and satisfaction was visible even through the flush of previous excitement on the cheek of the sufferer. "Quick, Morrison, give me my clothes. Where is my brother, Sumners?" and again he raised up his debilitated frame with the intention of quitting his couch.

"De Haldimar, my dear De Haldimar, compose yourself, and listen to me. Your brother is still missing, and we are as much in the dark about his fate as ever. All that is certain is, we have no positive knowledge of his death; but surely that is a thousand times preferable to the horrid apprehensions under which we have all hitherto laboured."

"What mean you, Sumners? or am I so bewildered by my sufferings as not to comprehend you clearly?—Nay, nay, forgive me; but I am almost heart-broken at this loss, and scarcely know what I say. But what is it you mean? I saw my unhappy brother lying on the common with my own eye. Poor Valletort himself—here a rush of bitter recollections flashed on the memory of the young man, and the tears coursed each other rapidly down his cheek. His emotion lasted for a few moments, and he pursued,—“Poor Valletort himself saw him, for he was nearly as much overwhelmed with afflic-tion as I was; and even Morrison beheld him also, not ten minutes since, under the very walls of the fort; nay, distinguished the wings of his uniform: and yet you would persuade me my brother, instead of being brought in a corpse, is still missing and alive. This is little better than trifling with my wretchedness, Sumners," and again he sank back exhausted on his pillow.

"I can easily forgive your doubts, De Haldimar," returned the sympathising Sumners, taking the hand of his companion, and pressing it gently in his own; "for, in truth, there is a great deal of mystery attached to the whole affair. I have not seen the body myself; but I distinctly heard Captain Erskine state it certainly was not your brother, and he requested me to apprise both Sir Everard Valletort and yourself of the fact."

"Who is the murdered man, then? and how comes he to be clad in the uniform of one of our officers? Pshaw! it is too absurd to be credited. Erskine is mistaken—he must be mistaken—it can be no other than my poor brother Frederick. Sumners, I am sick, faint, with this cruel uncertainty: go, my dear fellow, at once, and examine the body; then return to me, and satisfy my doubts, if possible."

"Most willingly, if you desire it," returned Sumners, moving towards the door; "but believe me, De Haldimar, you may make your mind tranquil on the subject—Erskine spoke with certainty."

"Have you seen Valletort?" asked De Haldimar, with an involuntary shudder pervaded his frame.

"I have. He flew on the instant to make further enquiries; and was in the act of going to examine the body of the murdered man when I came here. But here he is himself, and his countenance is the harbinger of any thing but a denial of my intelligence."

"Oh, Charles, what a weight of misery has been removed from my heart!" exclaimed that officer, now rushing to the bedside of his friend, and seizing his extended hand,—"Your brother, let us hope, still lives."

"Almighty God, I thank thee!" fervently ejaculated De Haldimar; and then, overcome with joy, surprise, and gratitude, he again sank back upon his pillow, sobbing and weeping violently.

Sumners had, with delicate tact, retired the moment Sir Everard made his appearance: for he, as well as the whole body of officers, was aware of the close friendship that subsisted between the young men.

We shall not attempt to paint all that passed between the friends during the first interesting moments of an interview which neither had expected to enjoy again, or the delight and satisfaction with which they congratulated themselves on the fulfilment of those fears, which, if realised, must have embittered every future moment of their lives with the most harrowing recollections.

With that facility with which in youth the generous and susceptible are prone to exchange their tears for smiles, as some powerful motive for the reaction may prompt, the invalid had already, and for the moment, lost sight of the painful past in the pleasureable present, so that his actual excitement was strongly in contrast with the melancholy he had so recently exhibited. Never had Charles de Haldimar appeared so eminently handsome; and yet his beauty resembled that of a frail and delicate woman, rather than that of one called to the manly and arduous profession of a soldier. The large, blue, long, dark-lashed eye, in which a shade of languor harmonised with the soft but animated expression of the whole countenance,—the dimpled mouth,—the small, clear, and even teeth,—all these now characterised Charles de Haldimar; and if to these we add a voice rich, full, and melodious, and a smile sweet and fascinating, we shall be at no loss to account for the readiness with which Sir Everard suffered his imagination to draw on the brother for those attributes he ascribed to the sister.

It was while this impression was strong upon his fancy, he took occasion to remark, in reply to an observation of De Haldimar's, alluding to the despair with which his sister would have been seized, had she known one brother had fallen by the hand of the friend of the other.

"The grief of my own heart, Charles, on this occasion, would have been little inferior to her own. The truth is, my feelings during the last three hours have let me into a secret, of the existence of which I was, in a great degree, ignorant until then: I scarcely know how to express myself, for the communication is so truly absurd and romantic you will not credit it." He paused, hesitated, and then, as if determined to anticipate the ridicule he seemed to feel would be attached to his confession, with a forced half laugh pursued: "The fact is, Charles, I have been so much used to listen to your warm and eloquent praises of your sister, I have absolutely, I will not say fallen in love with (that would be going too far), but conceived so strong an interest in her, that my most ardent desire would be to find favour in her eyes. What say you, my friend? are you inclined to forward my suit; and if so, is there any chance for me, think you, with herself?"

The breast of Charles de Haldimar, who had listened with deep and increasing attention to this avowal, swelled high with pleasureable excitement, and raising himself up in his bed with one hand, while he grasped one of Sir Everard's with the other, he exclaimed with a transport of affection too forcible to be controlled,—

"Oh, Valletort, Valletort! this is, indeed, all that was wanting to complete my happiness. My sister Clara I adore with all the affection of my nature; I love her better than my own life, which is wrapped up in hers. She is an angel in disposition,—all that is dear, tender, and affectionate,—all that is gentle and lovely in woman; one whose welfare is dearer far to me than my own, and without whose presence I could not live. Valletort, that prize,—that treasure, that dearer half of myself, is yours,—yours for ever. I have long wished you should love each other, and I felt, when you met, you would. If I have hitherto forborne from expressing this fondest wish of my heart, it has been from delicacy—from a natural fear of compromising the purity of my adored Clara. Now, however, you have confessed yourself interested, by a description that falls far short of the true merit of that dear girl, I can no longer disguise my gratification and delight. Valletort," he concluded, impressively, "there is no other man on earth to whom I would say so much; but you were formed for each other, and you will, you must, be the husband of my sister."

If the youthful and affectionate De Haldimar was happy, Sir Everard was no less so; for already, with the enthusiasm of a young man of twenty, he painted to himself the entire fruition of those dreams of happiness that had so long been familiarised to his imagination.

A single knock was now heard at the door of the apartment; it was opened, and a sergeant appeared at the entrance.

"The company are under arms for punishment parade, Lieutenant Valletort," said the man, touching his cap.

In an instant, the visionary prospects of the young men gave place to the stern realities connected with that announcement of punishment. The treason of Halloway,—the absence of Frederick de Haldimar,—the dangers by which they were beset,—and the little present probability of a re-union with those who were most dear to them,—all these recollections now flashed across their minds with the rapidity of thought; and the conversation that had so recently passed between them seemed to leave no other impression than what is produced from some visionary speculation of the moment.

CHAPTER VIII.

As the bells of the fort tolled the tenth hour of morning, the groups of dispersed soldiery, warned by the rolling of the assembly drum, once more fell into their respective ranks in the order described in the opening of this volume. Soon afterwards the prisoner Halloway was reconducted into the square by a strong escort, who took their stations as before in the immediate centre, where the former stood principally conspicuous to the observation of his comrades. His countenance was paler, and had less, perhaps, of the indifference he had previously manifested; but to supply this there was a certain subdued air of calm dignity, and a composure that sprang, doubtless, from the consciousness of the new character in which he now appeared before his superiors. Colonel de Haldimar almost immediately followed, and with him were the principal staff of the garrison, all of whom, with the exception of the sick and wounded and their attendants, were present to a man. The former took from the hands of the adjutant, Lawson, a large packet, consisting of several sheets of folded paper closely written upon. These were the proceedings of the court martial.

After enumerating the several charges, and detailing the evidence of the witnesses examined, the governor came at length to the finding and sentence of the court, which were as follows:—

"The court having duly considered the evidence adduced against the prisoner private Frank Halloway, together with what he has urged in his defence, are of opinion,— "That with regard to the first charge, it is not proved.

"That with regard to the second charge, it is not proved.

"That with regard to the third charge, even by his own voluntary confession, the prisoner is guilty.

"The court having found the prisoner private Frank Halloway guilty of the third charge preferred against him, which is in direct violation of a standing order of the garrison entailing capital punishment, do hereby sentence him, the said prisoner, private Frank Halloway, to be shot to death at such time and place as the officer commanding may deem fit to appoint."

Although the utmost order pervaded the ranks, every breath had been suspended, every ear stretched during the reading of the sentence; and now that it came arrayed in terror and in blood, every glance was turned in pity on its unhappy victim. But Halloway heard it with the ears of one who has made up his mind to suffer; and the faint half smile that played upon his lip spoke more in scorn than in sorrow. Colonel de Haldimar pursued:—

"The court having found it imperatively incumbent on them to award the punishment of death to the prisoner, private Frank Halloway, at the same time gladly avail themselves of their privilege by strongly recommending him to mercy. The court cannot, in justice to the character of the prisoner, refrain from expressing their unanimous conviction, that notwithstanding the mysterious circumstances which have led to his confinement and trial, he is entirely innocent of the treachery ascribed to him. The court have founded this conviction on the excellent character, both on duty and in the field, hitherto borne by the prisoner,—his well known attachment to the officer with whose abduction he stands charged,—and the manly, open, and (as the court are satisfied) correct history given of his former life. It is, moreover, the impression of the court, that, as stated by the prisoner, his guilt on the third charge has been the result only of his attachment for Captain de Haldimar. And for this, and the reasons above assigned, do they strongly recommend the prisoner to mercy.

(Signed)

"NOEL BLESSINGTON,
Captain and President.

"Sentence approved and confirmed.

"CHARLES DE HALDIMAR, Colonel Commandant."

While these concluding remarks of the court were being read, the prisoner manifested the deepest emotion. If a smile of scorn had previously played upon his lip, it was because he fancied the court, before whom he had sought to vindicate his fame, had judged him with a severity not inferior to his colonel's; but now that, in the presence of his companions, he heard the flattering attestation of his services, coupled even as it was with the sentence that condemned him to die, tears of gratitude and pleasure rose despite of himself to his eyes; and it required all his self-command to enable him to abstain from giving expression to his feelings towards those who had so generously interpreted the motives of his dereliction from duty. But when the melancholy and startling fact of the approval and confirmation of the sentence met his ear, without the slightest allusion to that mercy which had been so urgently recommended, he again overcame his weakness, and exhibited his wonted air of calm and unconcern.

"Let the prisoner be removed, Mr. Lawson," ordered the governor, whose stern and somewhat dissatisfied expression of countenance was the only comment on the recommendation for mercy.

The order was promptly executed. Once more Halloway left the square, and was reconducted to the cell he had occupied since the preceding night.

"Major Blackwater," pursued the governor, "let a detachment consisting of one half the garrison be got in readiness to leave the fort within the hour. Captain Wentworth, three pieces of field artillery will be required. Let them be got ready also." He then retired from the area, while the officers, who had just received his commands, prepared to fulfil the respective duties assigned them.

Since the first alarm of the garrison no opportunity had hitherto been afforded the officers to snatch the slightest refreshment. Advantage was now taken of the short interval allowed by the governor, and they all repaired to the mess-room, where their breakfast had long since been provided.

"Well, Blessington," remarked Captain Erskine, as he filled his plate for the third time from a large haunch of smoke-dried venison, for which his recent skirmish with the Indians had given him an unusual relish, "so it appears your recommendation of poor Halloway to mercy is little likely to be attended to. Did you remark how displeased the colonel looked as he bungled through it? One might almost be tempted to think he had an interest in the man's death, so determined does he appear to carry his point."

Although several of his companions, perhaps, felt and thought the same, still there was no one who would have ventured to avow his real sentiments in so unqualified a manner. Indeed such an observation proceeding from the lips of any other officer would have excited the utmost surprise; but Captain Erskine, a brave, bold, frank, and somewhat thoughtless soldier, was one of those beings who are privileged to say any thing. His opinions were usually expressed without ceremony; and his speech was not the most circumspect now, as since his return to the fort he had swallowed, fasting, two or three glasses of a favourite spirit, which, without intoxicating, had greatly excited him.

"I remarked enough," said Captain Blessington, who sat leaning his head on one hand, while with the other he occasionally, and almost mechanically, raised a cup filled with a liquid of a pale blood colour to his lips,— "quite enough to make me regret from my very soul I should have been his principal judge. Poor Holloway, I pity him much; for, on my honour, I believe him to be the gentleman he represents himself."

"A finer fellow does not live," remarked the last remaining officer of the grenadiers. "But surely Colonel de Haldimar cannot mean to carry the sentence into effect. The recommendation of a court, couched in such terms as these, ought alone to have some weight with him."

"It is quite clear, from the fact of his having been remanded to his cell, the execution of the poor fellow will be deferred at least," observed one of Captain Erskine's subalterns. "If the governor had intended he should suffer immediately, he would have had him shot the moment after his sentence was read. But what is the meaning and object of this new sortie? and whither are we now going? Do you know, Captain Erskine, our company is again ordered for this duty?"

"Know it, Leslie! of course I do; and for that reason am I paying my court to the more substantial part of the breakfast. Come, Blessington, my dear fellow, you have quite lost your appetite, and we may have sharp work before we get back. Follow my example: throw that nasty blood-thickening sassafras away, and lay a foundation from this venison. None sweeter is to be found in the forests of America. A few slices of that, and then a glass each of my best Jamaica, and we shall have strength to go through the expedition, if its object be the capture of the bold Pontiac himself."

"I presume the object is rather to seek for Captain de Haldimar," said Lieutenant Boyce, the officer of grenadiers; "but in that case why not send out his own company?"

"Because the colonel prefers trusting to cooler heads and more experienced arms," good-humouredly observed Captain Erskine. "Blessington is our senior, and his men are all old stagers. My lads, too, have had their mettle up already this morning, and there is nothing like that to prepare men for a dash of enterprise. It is with them as with blood horses, the more you put them on their speed the less anxious are they to quit the course. Well, Johnstone, my brave Scot, ready for another skirmish?" he asked, as that officer now entered to satisfy the cravings of an appetite little inferior to that of his captain.

"With 'Nunquam non paratus' for my motto," gaily returned the young man, "it were odd, indeed, if a mere scratch like this should prevent me from establishing my claim to it by following wherever my gallant captain leads."

"Most courteously spoken, and little in the spirit of a man yet smarting under the infliction of a rifle wound, it must be confessed," remarked Lieutenant Leslie. "But, Johnstone, you should bear in mind a too close adherence to that motto has been, in some degree, fatal to your family."

"No reflections, Leslie, if you please," returned his brother subaltern, slightly reddening. "If the head of our family was unfortunate enough to be considered a traitor to England, he was not so, at least to Scotland; and Scotland was the land of his birth. But let his political errors be forgotten. Though the winged spur no longer adorn the booted heel of an earl of Annandale, the time may not be far distant when some liberal and popular monarch of England shall restore a title forfeited neither through cowardice nor dishonour, but from an erroneous sense of duty."

"That is to say," muttered Ensign Delme, looking round for approval as he spoke, "that our present king is neither liberal nor popular. Well, Mr. Johnstone, were such an observation to reach the ears of Colonel de Haldimar you would stand a very fair chance of being brought to a court martial."

"That is to say nothing of the kind, sir," somewhat fiercely retorted the young Scot; "but any thing I do say you are at liberty to repeat to Colonel de Haldimar, or whom you will. I cannot understand, Leslie, why you should have made any allusion to the misfortunes of my family at this particular moment, and in this public manner. I trust it was not with a view to offend me;" and he fixed his large black eyes upon his brother subaltern, as if he would have read every thought of his mind.

"Upon my honour, Johnstone, I meant nothing of the kind," frankly returned Leslie. "I merely meant to hint that as you had had your share of service this morning, you might, at least, have suffered me to borrow your spurs, while you reposed for the present on your laurels."

"There are my gay and gallant Scots," exclaimed Captain Erskine, as he swallowed off a glass of the old Jamaica which lay before him, and with which he usually neutralised the acidities of a meat breakfast.

"Settled like gentlemen and lads of spirit, as ye are," he pursued, as the young men cordially shook each other's hand across the table. "What an enviable command is mine, to have a company of brave fellows who would face the devil himself were it necessary; and two hot and impatient subs., who are ready to cut each other's throat for the pleasure of accompanying me against a set of savages that are little better than so many devils. Come, Johnstone, you know the Colonel allows us but one sub. at a time, in consequence of our scarcity of officers, therefore it is but fair Leslie should have his turn. It will not be long, I dare say, before we shall have another brush with the rascals."

"In my opinion," observed Captain Blessington, who had been a silent and thoughtful witness of what was passing around him, "neither Leslie nor Johnstone would evince so much anxiety, were they aware of the true nature of the duty for which our companies have been ordered. Depend upon it, it is no search after Captain de Haldimar in which we are about to be engaged; for much as the colonel loves his son, he would on no account compromise the safety of the garrison, by sending a party into the forest, where poor De Haldimar, if alive, is at all likely to be found."

"Faith you are right, Blessington; the governor is not one to run these sort of risks on every occasion. My chief surprise, indeed, is, that he suffered me to venture even upon the common; but if we are not designed for some hostile expedition, why leave the fort at all?"

"The question will need no answer, if Holloway be found to accompany us."

"Psha! why should Holloway be taken out for the purpose? If he be shot at all, he will be shot on the ramparts, in the presence of, and as an example to, the whole garrison. Still, on reflection, I cannot but think it impossible the sentence should be carried into full effect, after the strong, nay, the almost unprecedented recommendation to mercy recorded on the face of the proceedings."

Captain Blessington shook his head despondingly. "What think you, Erskine, of the policy of making an example, which may be witnessed by the enemy as well as the garrison? It is evident, from his demeanour throughout, nothing will convince the colonel that Holloway is not a traitor, and he may think it advisable to strike terror in the minds of the savages, by an execution which will have the effect of showing the treason of the soldier to have been discovered."

In this opinion many of the officers now concurred; and as the fate of the unfortunate Holloway began to assume a character of almost certainty, even the spirit of the gallant Erskine, the least subdued by the recent distressing events, was overclouded; and all sank, as if by one consent, into silent communion with their thoughts, as they almost mechanically completed the meal, at which habit rather than appetite still continued them. Before any of them had yet risen from the table, a loud and piercing scream met their ears from without; and so quick and universal was the movement it produced, that its echo had scarcely yet died away in distance, when the whole of the breakfast party had issued from the room, and were already spectators of the cause.

As the officers now passed from the mess-room nearly opposite to the gate, they observed, at that part of the barracks which ran at right angles with it, and immediately in front of the apartment of the younger De Haldimar, whence he had apparently just issued, the governor, struggling, though gently, to disengage himself from a female, who, with disordered hair and dress, lay almost prostrate upon the piazza, and clapping his booted leg with an energy evidently borrowed from the most rooted despair. The quick eye of the haughty man had already rested on the group of officers drawn by the scream of the supplicant. Numbers, too, of the men, attracted by the same cause, were collected in front of their respective block-houses, and looking from the windows of the rooms in which they were also breakfasting, preparatory to the expedition. Vexed and irritated beyond measure, at being thus made a conspicuous object of observation to his inferiors, the unbending governor made a violent and successful effort to disengage his leg; and then, without uttering a word, or otherwise noticing the unhappy being who lay extended at his feet, he stalked across the parade to his apartments at the opposite angle, without appearing to manifest the slightest consciousness of the scene that had awakened such universal attention.

Several of the officers, among whom was Captain Blessington, now hastened to the assistance of the female, whom all had recognised, from the first, to be the interesting and unhappy wife of Holloway. Many of the comrades of the latter, who had been pained and pitying spectators of the scene, also advanced for the same purpose; but, on perceiving their object anticipated by their superiors, they withdrew to the block-houses, whence they had issued. Never was grief more forcibly depicted, than in the whole appearance of this unfortunate woman; never did anguish assume a character more fitted to touch the soul, or to command respect. Her long fair hair, that had hitherto been hid under the coarse mob cap, usually worn by the wives of the soldiers, was now divested of all fastenings, and lay shadowing a white and polished bosom, which, in her violent struggles to detain the governor, had burst from its rude but modest confinement, and was now displayed in all the dazzling delicacy of youth and sex. If the officers gazed for a moment with excited look upon charms that had long been strangers to their sight, and of an order they had little deemed to find in Ellen Holloway, it was but the involuntary tribute rendered by nature unto beauty. The depth and sacredness of that sorrow, which had left the wretched woman unconscious of her exposure, in the instant afterwards imposed a check upon admiration, which each felt to be a violation of the first principles of human delicacy, and the feeling was repressed almost in the moment that gave it birth.

They were immediately in front of the room occupied by Charles de Haldimar, in the piazza of which were a few old chairs, on which the officers were in the habit of throwing themselves during the heat of the day. On one of these Captain Blessington, assisted by the officer of grenadiers, now seated the suffering and sobbing wife of Holloway. His first care was to repair the disorder of her dress; and never was the same office performed by man with greater delicacy, or absence of levity by those who witnessed it. This was the first moment of her consciousness. The inviolability of modesty for a moment rose paramount even to the desolation of her heart; and putting rudely aside the band that reposed unavoidably upon her person, the poor woman started from her seat, and looked wildly about her, as if endeavouring to identify those by whom she was surrounded. But when she observed the pitying gaze of the officers fixed upon her, in earnestness and commiseration, and heard the benevolent accents of the ever kind Blessington exhorting her to composure, her weeping became more violent and her sobs more convulsive. Captain Blessington threw an arm round her waist to prevent her from falling; and then motioning to two or three women of the company to which her husband was attached, who stood at a little distance, in front of one of the block-houses, prepared to deliver her over to their charge.

"No, no, not yet!" burst at length from the lips of the agonised woman, as she shrank from the rude but well intentioned touch of the sympathising assistants, who had promptly answered the signal; then, as if obeying some new direction of her feelings, some new impulse of her grief, she liberated herself from the slight grasp of Captain Blessington, turned suddenly round, and, before any one could anticipate the movement, entered an opening on the piazza, raised the latch of a door situated at its extremity, and was, in the next instant, in the apartment of the younger De Haldimar.

The scene that met the eyes of the officers, who now followed close after her, was one well calculated to make an impression on the hearts even of the most insensible. In the despair and recklessness of her extreme sorrow, the young wife of Halloway had already thrown herself upon her knees at the bed side of the sick officer; and, with her hands upraised and firmly clasped together, was now supplicating him in tones, contrasting singularly in their gentleness with the depth of the sorrow that had rendered her thus regardless of appearances, and insensible to observation.

"Oh, Mr. de Haldimar!" she implored, "in the name of God and of our blessed Saviour, if you would save me from madness, intercede for my unhappy husband, and preserve him from the horrid fate that awaits him. You are too good, too gentle, too amiable, to reject the prayer of a heart-broken woman. Moreover Mr. de Haldimar," she proceeded, with deeper energy, while she caught and pressed, between her own white and bloodless hands, one nearly as delicate that lay extended near her. "consider all my dear but unfortunate husband has done for your family. Think of the blood he once spilt in the defence of your brother's life; that brother, through whom alone, oh God! he is now condemned to die. Call to mind the days and nights of anguish I passed near his couch of suffering, when yet writhing beneath the wound aimed at the life of Captain de Haldimar. Almighty Providence!" she pursued, in the same impassioned yet plaintive voice, "why is not Miss Clara here to plead the cause of the innocent, and to touch the stubborn heart of her merciless father? She would, indeed, move heaven and earth to save the life of him to whom she so often vowed eternal gratitude and acknowledgment. Ah, she little dreams of his danger now; or, if prayer and intercession could avail, my husband should yet live, and this terrible struggle at my heart would be no more."

Overcome by her emotion, the unfortunate woman suffered her aching head to droop upon the edge of the bed, and her sobbing became so painfully violent, that all who heard her expected, at every moment, some fatal termination to her immoderate grief. Charles de Haldimar was little less affected; and his sorrow was the more bitter, as he had just proved the utter inefficacy of any thing in the shape of appeal to his inflexible father.

"Mrs. Halloway, my dear Mrs. Halloway, compose yourself," said Captain Blessington, now approaching, and endeavouring to raise her gently from the floor, on which she still knelt, while her hands even more firmly grasped that of De Haldimar. "You are ill, very ill, and the consequences of this dreadful excitement may be fatal. Be advised by me, and retire. I have desired my room to be prepared for you, and Sergeant Wilnot's wife shall remain with you as long as you may require it."

"No, no, no!" she again exclaimed with energy; "what care I for my own wretched life—my beloved and unhappy husband is to die. Oh God! to die without guilt—to be cut off in his youth—to be shot as a traitor—and that simply for obeying the wishes of the officer whom he loved!—the son of the man who now spurns all supplication from his presence. It is inhuman, it is unjust—and Heaven will punish the hard-hearted man who murders him—yes, murders him! for such a punishment for such an offence is nothing less than murder." Again she wept bitterly, and as Captain Blessington still essayed to soothe and raise her:—"No, no! I will not leave this spot," she continued; "I will not quit the side of Mr. de Haldimar, until he pledges himself to intercede for my poor husband. It is his duty to save the life of him who saved his brother's life; and God and human justice are with my appeal. Oh, tell me, then, Mr. de Haldimar,—if you would save my wretched heart from breaking,—tell me you will intercede for, and obtain the pardon of my husband!"

As she concluded this last sentence in passionate appeal, she had risen from her knees; and, conscious only of the importance of the boon solicited, now threw herself upon the breast of the highly pained and agitated young officer. Her long and beautiful hair fell floating over his face, and mingled with his own, while her arms were wildly clasped around him, in all the energy of frantic and hopeless adjuration.

"Almighty God!" exclaimed the agitated young man, as he made a feeble and fruitless effort to raise the form of the unhappy woman; "what shall I say to impart comfort to this suffering being? Oh, Mrs. Halloway," he pursued, "I would willingly give all I possess in this world to be the means of saving your unfortunate husband,—and as much for his own sake as for yours would I do this; but, alas! I have not the power. Do not think I speak without conviction. My father has just been with me, and I have pleaded the cause of your husband with an earnestness I should scarcely have used had my own life been at stake. But all my entreaties have been in vain. He is obstinate in the belief my brother's strange absence, and Donellan's death, are attributable only to the treason of Halloway. Still there is a hope. A detachment is to leave the fort within the hour, and Halloway is to accompany them. It may be, my father intends this measure only with a view to terrify him into a confession of guilt; and that he deems it politic to make him undergo all the fearful preliminaries without carrying the sentence itself into effect."

The unfortunate woman said no more. When she raised her heaving chest from that of the young officer, her eyes, though red and shrunk to half their usual size with weeping, were tearless; but on her countenance there was an expression of wild woe, infinitely more distressing to behold, in consequence of the almost unnatural check so suddenly imposed upon her feelings. She tottered, rather than walked, through the group of officers, who gave way on either hand to let her pass; and rejecting all assistance from the women who had followed into the room, and who now, in obedience to another signal from Captain Blessington, hastened to her support, finally gained the door and quitted the apartment.

CHAPTER IX.

The sun was high in the meridian, as the second detachment, commanded by Colonel de Haldimar in person, issued from the fort of Detroit. It was that soft and hazy season, peculiar to the bland and beautiful autumns of Canada, when the golden light of Heaven seems as if transmitted through a veil of tissue, and all of animate and inanimate nature, expanding and fructifying beneath its fostering influence, breathes the most delicious languor and voluptuous repose. It was one of those still, calm, warm, and genial days, which in those regions come under the vulgar designation of the Indian summer; a season that is ever hailed by the Canadian with a satisfaction proportioned to the extreme sultriness of the summer, and the equally oppressive rigour of the winter, by which it is immediately preceded and followed.

Such a day as that we have just described was the 9th of September, 1763, when the chief portion of the English garrison of Detroit issued forth from the fortifications in which they had so long been cooped up, and in the presumed execution of a duty undeniably the most trying and painful that ever fell to the lot of soldier to perform. The detachment wended its slow and solemn course, with a mournful pageantry of preparation that gave fearful earnest of the tragedy expected to be enacted.

In front, and dragged by the hands of the gunners, moved two of the three three-pounders, that had been ordered for the duty. Behind these came Captain Blessington's company, and in their rear, the prisoner Halloway, divested of his uniform, and clad in a white cotton jacket, and cap of the same material. Six rank and file of the grenadiers followed, under the command of a corporal, and behind these again, came eight men of the same company; four of whom bore on their shoulders a coffin, covered with a coarse black pall that had perhaps already assisted at fifty interments; while the other four carried, in addition to their own, the muskets of their burdened comrades. After these, marched a solitary drummer-boy; whose tall bear-skin cap attested him to be of the grenadiers also, while his muffled instrument marked the duty for which he had been selected. Like his comrades, none of whom exhibited their scarlet uniforms, he wore the collar of his great coat closely buttoned beneath his chin, which was only partially visible above the stiff leathern stock that encircled his neck. Although his features were half buried in his huge cap and the high collar of his coat, there was an air of delicacy about his person that seemed to render him unsuited to such an office; and more than once was Captain Erskine, who followed immediately behind him at the head of his company, compelled to call sharply to the urchin, threatening him with a week's drill unless he mended his feeble and unequal pace, and kept from under the feet of his men. The remaining gun brought up the rear of the detachment, who marched with fixed bayonets and two balls in each musket; the whole presenting a front of sections, that completely filled up the road along which they passed. Colonel de Haldimar, Captain Wentworth, and the Adjutant Lawson followed in the extreme rear.

An event so singular as that of the appearance of the English without their fort, beset as they were by a host of fierce and dangerous enemies, was not likely to pass unnoticed by a single individual in the little village of Detroit. We have already observed, that most of the colonist settlers had been cruelly massacred at the very onset of hostilities. Not so, however, with the Canadians, who, from their anterior relations with the natives, and the mutual and tacit good understanding that subsisted between both parties, were suffered to continue in quiet and unmolested possession of their homes, where they preserved an avowed neutrality, never otherwise infringed than by the assistance secretly and occasionally rendered to the English troops, whose gold they were glad to receive in exchange for the necessities of life.

Every dwelling of the infant town had commenced giving up its tenants, from the moment when the head of the detachment was seen traversing the drawbridge; so that, by the time it reached the highway, and took its direction to the left, the whole population of Detroit were already assembled in groups, and giving expression to their several conjectures, with a vivacity of language and energy of gesticulation that would not have disgraced the parent land itself. As the troops drew nearer, however, they all sank at once into a silence, as much the result of certain unacknowledged and undefined fears, as of the respect the English had ever been accustomed to exact.

At the further extremity of the town, and at a bend in the road, which branched off more immediately towards the river, stood a small public house, whose creaking sign bore three ill executed fleur-de-lis, apologetic emblems of the arms of France. The building itself was little more than a rude log hut, along the front of which ran a plank, supported by two stumps of trees, and serving as a temporary accommodation both for the traveller and the inmate. On this bench three persons, apparently attracted by the beauty of the day and the mildness of the autumnal sun, were now seated, two of whom were leisurely puffing their pipes, while the third, a female, was employed in carding wool, a quantity of which lay in a basket at her feet, while she warbled, in a low tone, one of the simple airs of her native land. The elder of the two men, whose age might be about fifty, offered nothing remarkable in his appearance; he was dressed in a coat made of the common white blanket, while his hair, cut square upon the forehead, and tied into a club of nearly a foot long, fell into the cape or hood attached to it.

His companion was habited in a still more extraordinary manner. His lower limbs were cased, up to the mid-thigh, in leathern leggings, the seam of which was on the outside, leaving a margin, or border, of about an inch wide, which had been slit into innumerable small fringes, giving them an air of elegance and lightness: a garter of leather, curiously wrought, with the stained quills of the porcupine, encircled each leg, immediately under the knee, where it was tied in a bow, and then suffered to hang pendant half way down the limb; to the fringes of the leggings, moreover, were attached numerous dark-coloured horny substances, emitting, as they rattled against each other, at the slightest movement of the wearer, a tinkling sound, resembling that produced by a number of small thin delicate brass bells; these were the tender hoofs of the wild deer, dried, scraped, and otherwise prepared for this ornamental purpose.

The form and face of this individual were in perfect keeping with the style of his costume, and the character of his equipment. His stature was beyond that of the ordinary race of men, and his athletic and muscular limbs united the extremes of strength and activity. His features, marked and prominent, wore a cast of habitual thought, strangely tinged with ferocity; and the expression of his otherwise not unhandsome countenance was repellent and disdainful. At the first glance he might have been taken for one of the swarthy natives of the soil; but though time and constant exposure to scorching suns had given to his complexion a dusky hue, still there was wanting the quick, black, penetrating eye; the high cheek bone; the straight, coarse, shining black hair; the small bony hand and foot; and the placidly proud and serious air, by which the former is distinguished. His own eye was of a deep bluish gray; his hair short, dark, and wavy; his hands large and muscular; and so far from exhibiting any of the self-command of the Indian, the constant play of his features betrayed each passing thought with the same rapidity with which it was conceived. But if any doubt could have existed in the mind of him who beheld this strangely accoutred figure, it would have been instantly dispelled by a glance at his limbs. From his leggings to the hip, that portion of the lower limb was completely bare, and disclosed, at each movement of the garment that was suffered to fall loosely over it, not the swarthy and copper-coloured flesh of the Indian, but the pale though sun-burnt skin of one of a more temperate clime. His age might be about forty-five.

At the moment when the English detachment approached the bend in the road, these two individuals were conversing earnestly together, pausing only to puff at intervals thick and wreathing volumes of smoke from their pipes, which were filled with a mixture of tobacco and odoriferous herbs. Presently, however, sounds that appeared familiar to his ear arrested the attention of the wildly accoutred being we have last described. It was the heavy roll of the artillery carriages already advancing along the road, and somewhat in the rear of the hut. To dash his pipe to the ground, seize and cock and raise his rifle to his shoulder, was but the work of a moment. Startled by the suddenness of the action, his male companion moved a few paces also from his seat, to discover the cause of this singular movement. The female, on the contrary, stirred not, but ceasing for a moment the occupation in which she had been engaged, fixed her dark and brilliant eyes upon the tall form of the rifleman, whose athletic limbs, thrown into powerful relief by the distention of each nerve and muscle, appeared to engross her whole admiration and interest, without any reference to the cause that had produced this abrupt and hostile change in his movements. It was evident that, unlike the other inhabitants of the town, this group had been taken by surprise, and were utterly unprepared to expect any thing in the shape of interruption.

For upwards of a minute, during which the march of the men became audible even to the ears of the female, the formidable warrior, for such his garb denoted him to be, continued motionless in the attitude he had at first assumed. No sooner, however, had the head of the advancing column come within sight, than the aim was taken, the trigger pulled, and the small and ragged bullet sped hissing from the grooved and delicate barrel. A triumphant cry was next pealed from the lips of the warrior,—a cry produced by the quickly repeated application and removal of one hand to and from the mouth, while the other suffered the butt end of the now harmless weapon to fall loosely upon the earth. He then slowly and deliberately withdrew within the cover of the hut.

This daring action, which had been viewed by the leading troops with astonishment not unmingled with alarm, occasioned a temporary confusion in the ranks, for all believed they had fallen into an ambuscade of the Indians. A halt was instantly commanded by Captain Blessington, in order to give time to the governor to come up from the rear, while he proceeded with one of the leading sections to reconnoitre the front of the hut. To his surprise, however, he found neither enemy, nor evidence that an enemy had been there. The only individuals visible were the Canadian, and the dark-eyed female. Both were seated on the bench;—the one smoking his pipe with a well assumed appearance of unconcern;—the other carding her wool, but with a hand that by a close observer might be seen to tremble in its office, and a cheek that was paler than at the moment when we first placed her before the imagination of the reader. Both, however, started with unaffected surprise on seeing Captain Blessington and his little force turn the corner of the house from the main road; and certain looks of recognition passed between all parties, that proved them to be no strangers to each other.

"Ah, monsieur," said the Canadian, in a mingled dialect, neither French nor English, while he attempted an ease and freedom of manner that was too miserably affected to pass current with the mild but observant officer whom he addressed, "how much surprise I am, and glad to see you. It is a long time since you came out of de fort. I hope de gouverneur and de officir be all very well. I was tinkin to go to-day to see if you want any ting. I have got some nice rum of the Jamaïque for Capitaine Erskine. Will you please to try some?" While speaking, the voluble host of the Fleur de lis had risen from his seat, laid aside his pipe, and now stood with his hands thrust into his pockets of his blanket coat.

"It is indeed a long time since we have been here, Master François," somewhat sarcastically and drily replied Captain Blessington; "and you have not visited us quite so often latterly yourself, though well aware we were in want of fresh provisions. I give you all due credit, however, for your intention of coming to-day, but you see we have anticipated you. Still this is not the point. Where is the Indian who fired at us just now? and how is it we find you leagued with our enemies?"

"What, sir, is it you say?" asked the Canadian, holding up his hands with feigned astonishment. "Me league myself with de savage. Upon my honour I did not see nobody fire, or I should tell you. I love de English too well to do dem harms."

"Come, come, François, no nonsense. If I cannot make you confess, there is one not far from me who will. You know Colonel de Haldimar too well to imagine he will be trifled with in this manner: if he detects you in a falsehood, he will certainly cause you to be hanged up at the first tree. Take my advice, therefore, and say where you have secreted this Indian; and recollect, if we fall into an ambuscade, your life will be forfeited at the first shot we hear fired."

At this moment the governor, followed by his adjutant, came rapidly up to the spot. Captain Blessington communicated the ill success of his queries, when the former cast on the terrified Canadian one of those severe and searching looks which he so well knew how to assume.

"Where is the rascal who fired at us, sirrah? tell me instantly, or you have not five minutes to live."

The heart of mine host of the Fleur de lis quailed within him at this formidable threat; and the usually ruddy hue of his countenance had now given place to an ashy paleness. Still as he had positively denied all knowledge of the matter on which he was questioned, he appeared to feel his safety lay in adhering to his original statement. Again, therefore, he assured the governor, on his honour (laying his hand upon his heart as he spoke,) that what he had already stated was the fact.

"Your honour—you pitiful trading scoundrel!—how dare you talk to me of your honour? Come, sir, confess at once where you have secreted this fellow, or prepare to die."

"If I may be so bold, your honour," said one of Captain Blessington's men, "the Frenchman lies. When the Indian fired among us, this fellow was peeping under his shoulder and watching us also. If I had not seen him too often at the fort to be mistaken in his person, I should have known him, at all events, by his blanket coat and red handkerchief."

This blunt statement of the soldier, confirmed as it was the instant afterwards by one of his comrades, was damning proof against the Canadian, even if the fact of the rifle being discharged from the front of the hut had not already satisfied all parties of the falsehood of his assertion.

"Come forward, a couple of files, and seize this villain," resumed the governor with his wonted sternness of manner. "Mr. Lawson, see if his hut does not afford a rope strong enough to hang the traitor from one of his own apple trees."

Both parties proceeded at the same moment to execute the two distinct orders of their chief. The Canadian was now firmly secured in the grasp of the two men who had given evidence against him, when, seeing all the horror of the dreadful fate that awaited him, he confessed the individual who had fired had been sitting with him the instant previously, but that he knew no more of him than of any other savage occasionally calling at the Fleur de lis. He added, that on discharging the rifle he had bounded across the palings of the orchard, and fled in the direction of the forest. He denied all knowledge or belief of an enemy waiting in ambush; stating, moreover, even the individual in question had not been aware of the sortie of the detachment until apprised of their near approach by the heavy sound of the gun carriages.

"Here are undeniable proofs of the man's villany, sir," said the adjutant, returning from the hut and exhibiting objects of new and fearful interest to the governor. "This hat and rope I found secreted in one of the bedrooms of the auberge. The first is evidently Donellan's; and from the hook attached to the latter, I apprehend it to be the same stated to have been used by Captain de Haldimar in crossing the ditch."

The governor took the hat and rope from the hands of his subordinate, examined them attentively, and after a few moments of deep musing, during which his countenance underwent several rapid though scarcely perceptible changes, turned suddenly and eagerly to the soldier who had first convicted the Canadian in his falsehood, and demanded if he had seen enough of the man who had fired to be able to give even a general description of his person.

"Why yes, your honour, I think I can; for the fellow stood long enough after firing his piece, for a painter to have taken him off from head to foot. He was a taller and larger man by far than our biggest grenadier, and that is poor Harry Donellan, as your honour knows. But as for his dress, though I could see it all, I scarcely can tell how to describe it. All I know is, he was covered with smoked deer skin, in some such fashion as the great chief Pontec, only, instead of having his head bare and shaved, he wore a strange outlandish sort of a hat, covered over with wild birds' feathers in front."

"Enough," interrupted the governor, motioning the man to silence; then, in an under tone to himself,—"By heaven, the very same." A shade of disappointment, and suppressed alarm, passed rapidly across his brow; it was but momentary. "Captain Blessington," he ordered quickly and impatiently, "search the hut and grounds for this lurking Indian, who is, no doubt, secreted in the neighbourhood. Quick, quick, sir; there is no time to be lost." Then in an intimidating tone to the Canadian, who had already dropped on his knees, supplicating mercy, and vociferating his innocence in the same breath,—"So, you infernal scoundrel, this is the manner in which you have repaid our confidence. Where is my son, sir? Or have you already murdered him, as you did his servant? Tell me, you villain, what have you to say to these proofs of your treachery? But stay, I shall take another and fitter opportunity to question you. Mr. Lawson, secure this traitor properly, and let him be conveyed to the centre of the detachment."

The mandate was promptly obeyed; and in despite of his own unceasing prayers and protestations of innocence, and the tears and entreaties of his dark-eyed daughter Babette, who had thrown herself on her knees at his side, the stout arms of mine host of the Fleur de lis were soon firmly secured behind his back with the strong rope that had been found under such suspicious circumstances in his possession. Before he was marched off, however two of the men who had been sent in pursuit, returned from the orchard, stating that further search was now fruitless. They had penetrated through a small thicket at the extremity of the grounds, and had distinctly seen a man answering the description given by their comrades, in full flight towards the forest skirting the heights in front.

The governor was evidently far from being satisfied with the result of a search too late instituted to leave even a prospect of success. "Where are the Indians principally encamped, sirrah?" he sternly demanded of his captive; "answer me truly, or I will carry off this wench as well, and if a single hair of a man of mine be even singed by a shot from a skulking enemy, you may expect to see her bayoneted before your eyes."

"Ah, my God! Monsieur le Gouverneur," exclaimed the affrighted aubergiste, "as I am an honest man, I shall tell de truth, but spare my child. They are all in de forest, and half a mile from de little river dat runs between dis and de Pork Island."

"Hog Island, I suppose you mean."

"Yes sir, de Hog Island is de one I means."

"Conduct him to the centre, and let him be confronted with the prisoner," directed the governor, addressing his adjutant; "Captain Blessington, your men may resume their stations in the ranks." The order was obeyed; and notwithstanding the tears and supplications of the now highly excited Babette, who flung herself upon his neck, and was only removed by force, the terrified Canadian was borne off from his premises by the troops.

CHAPTER X.

While this scene was enacting in front of the Fleur de lis, one of a far more touching and painful nature was passing in the very heart of the detachment itself. At the moment when the halt was ordered by Captain Blessington, a rumour ran through the ranks that they had reached the spot destined for the execution of their ill-fated comrade. Those only in the immediate front were aware of the true cause; but although the report of the rifle had been distinctly heard by all, it had been attributed by those in the rear to the accidental discharge of one of their own muskets. A low murmur, expressive of the opinion generally entertained, passed gradually from rear to front, until it at length reached the ears of the delicate drummer boy who marched behind the coffin. His face was still buried in the collar of his coat; and what was left uncovered of his features by the cap, was in some degree hidden by the forward drooping of his head upon his chest. Hitherto he had moved almost mechanically along, tottering and embarrassing himself at every step under the cumbersome drum that was suspended from a belt round his neck over the left thigh; but now there was a certain indescribable drawing up of the frame, and tension of the whole person, denoting a concentration of all the moral and physical energies,—a sudden working up, as it were, of the intellectual and corporeal being to some determined and momentous purpose.

At the first halt of the detachment, the weary supporters of the coffin had deposited their rude and sombre burden upon the earth, preparatory to its being resumed by those appointed to relieve them. The dull sound emitted by the hollow fabric, as it touched the ground, caught the ear of him for whom it was destined, and he turned to gaze upon the sad and lonely tenement so shortly to become his final resting place. There was an air of calm composure and dignified sorrow upon his brow, that infused respect into the hearts of all who beheld him; and even the men selected to do the duty of executioners sought to evade his glance, as his steady eye wandered from right to left of the fatal rank. His attention, however, was principally directed towards the coffin, which lay before him; on this he gazed fixedly for upwards of a minute. He then turned his eyes in the direction of the fort, shuddered, heaved a profound sigh, and looking up to heaven, with the apparent fervour that became his situation, seemed to pray for a moment or two inwardly and devoutly. The thick and almost suffocating breathing of one immediately beyond the coffin, was now distinctly heard by all. Halloway started from his attitude of devotion, gazed earnestly on the form whence it proceeded, and then wildly extending his arms, suffered a smile of satisfaction to illumine his pale features. All eyes were now turned upon the drummer boy, who, evidently labouring under convulsive excitement of feeling, suddenly dashed his cap and instrument to the earth, and flew as fast as his tottering and uncertain steps would admit across the coffin, and into the arms extended to receive him.

"My Ellen! oh, my own devoted, but too unhappy Ellen!" passionately exclaimed the soldier, as he clasped the slight and agitated form of his disguised wife to his throbbing heart. "This, this, indeed, is joy even in death. I thought I could have died more happily without you, but nature tugs powerfully at my heart; and to see you once more, to feel you once more here," (and he pressed her wildly to his chest,) "is indeed a bliss that robs my approaching fate of half its terror."

"Oh Reginald! my dearly beloved Reginald! my murdered husband!" shrieked the unhappy woman; "your Ellen will not survive you. Her heart is already broken, though she cannot weep; but the same grave shall contain us both. Reginald, do you believe me? I swear it; the same grave shall contain us both."

Exhausted with the fatigue and excitement she had undergone, the faithful and affectionate creature now lay, without sense or motion, in the arms of her wretched husband. Halloway bore her, unopposed, a pace or two in advance, and deposited her unconscious form on the fatal coffin.

No language of ours can render justice to the trying character of the scene. All who witnessed it were painfully affected, and over the bronzed cheek of many a veteran coursed a tear, that, like that of Sterne's recording angel, might have blotted out a catalogue of sins. Although each was prepared to expect a reprimand from the governor, for suffering the prisoner to quit his station in the ranks, humanity and nature pleaded too powerfully in his behalf, and neither officer or man attempted to interfere, unless with a view to render assistance. Captain Erskine, in particular, was deeply pained, and would have given any thing to recal the harsh language he had used towards the supposed idle and inattentive drummer boy. Taking from a pocket in his uniform a small flask of brandy, which he had provided against casualties, the compassionate officer slightly raised the head of the pale and unconscious woman with one hand, while with the other he introduced a few drops between her parted lips. Halloway knelt at the opposite side of the coffin; one hand searching, but in vain, the suspended pulse of his inanimate wife; the other, unbuttoning the breast of the drum-boy's jacket, which, with every other part of the equipment, she wore beneath the loose great coat so effectually accomplishing her disguise.

Such was the position of the chief actors in this truly distressing drama, at the moment when Colonel de Haldimar came up with his new prisoner, to mark what effect would be produced on Halloway by his unexpected appearance. His own surprise and disappointment may be easily conceived, when, in the form of the recumbent being who seemed to engross universal attention, he recognised, by the fair and streaming hair, and half exposed bosom, the unfortunate being whom, only two hours previously, he had spurned from his feet in the costume of her own sex, and reduced, by the violence of her grief, to almost infantine debility. Question succeeded question to those around, but without eliciting any clue to the means by which this mysterious disguise had been effected. No one had been aware, until the truth was so singularly and suddenly revealed, the supposed drummer was any other than one of the lads attached to the grenadiers; and as for the other facts, they spoke too plainly to the comprehension of the governor to need explanation. Once more, however, the detachment was called to order. Halloway struck his hand violently upon his brow, kissed the wan lips of his still unconscious wife, breathing as he did so, a half murmured hope she might indeed be the corpse she appeared. He then raised himself from the earth with a light and elastic yet firm movement, and resumed the place he had previously occupied, where, to his surprise, he beheld a second victim bound, and, apparently, devoted to the same death. When the eyes of the two unhappy men met, the governor closely watched the expression of the countenance of each; but although the Canadian started on beholding the soldier, it might be merely because he saw the latter arrayed in the garb of death, and followed by the most unequivocal demonstrations of a doom to which he himself was, in all probability, devoted. As for Halloway, his look betrayed neither consciousness nor recognition; and though too proud to express complaint or to give vent to the feelings of his heart, his whole soul appeared to be absorbed in the unhappy partner of his luckless destiny. Presently he saw her borne, and in the same state of insensibility, in the arms of Captain Erskine and Lieutenant Leslie, towards the hut of his fellow prisoner, and he heard the former officer enjoin the weeping girl, Babette, to whose charge they delivered her over, to pay every attention to her situation might require. The detachment then proceeded.

The narrow but deep and rapid river alluded to by the Canadian, as running midway between the town and Hog Island, derived its source far within the forest, and formed the bed of one of those wild, dark, and thickly wooded ravines so common in America. As it neared the Detroit, however, the abruptness of its banks was so considerably lessened, as to render the approach to it on the town side over an almost imperceptible slope. Within a few yards of its mouth, as we have already observed, a rude but strong wooden bridge, over which lay the high road, had been constructed by the French; and from the centre of this, all the circuit of intermediate clearing, even to the very skirt of the forest, was distinctly commanded by the naked eye. To the right, on approaching it from the town, lay the adjacent shores of Canada, washed by the broad waters of the Detroit, on which it was thrown into strong relief, and which, at the distance of about a mile in front, was seen to diverge into two distinct channels, pursuing each a separate course, until they again met at the western extremity of Hog Island. On the left, and in the front, rose a succession of slightly undulating hills, which, at a distance of little more than half a mile, terminated in an elevation considerably above the immediate level of the Detroit side of the ravine. That, again, was crowned with thick and overhanging forest, taking its circular sweep around the fort. The intermediate ground was studded over with rude stumps of trees, and bore, in various directions, distinct proofs of the spoliation wrought among the infant possessions of the murdered English settlers. The view to the rear was less open; the town being partially hidden by the fruit-laden orchards that lined the intervening high road, and hung principally on its left. This was not the case with the fort. Between these orchards and the distant forest lay a line of open country, fully commanded by its cannon, even to the ravine we have described, and in a sweep that embraced every thing from the bridge itself to the forest, in which all traces of its source was lost.

When the detachment had arrived within twenty yards of the bridge, they were made to file off to the left, until the last gun had come up. They were then fringed; the rear section of Captain Erskine's company resting on the road, and the left flank, covered by the two first guns pointed obliquely, both in front and rear, to guard against surprise, in the event of any of the Indians stealing round to the cover of the orchards. The route by which they had approached this spot was upwards of two miles in extent; but, as they now filed off into the open ground, the leading sections observed, in a direct line over the cleared country, and at the distance of little more than three quarters of a mile, the dark ramparts of the fortress that contained their comrades, and could even distinguish the uniforms of the officers and men drawn up in line along the works, where they were evidently assembled to witness the execution of the sentence on Halloway.

Such a sight as that of the English so far from their fort, was not likely to escape the notice of the Indians. Their encampment, as the Canadian had truly stated, lay within the forest, and beyond the elevated ground already alluded to; and to have crossed the ravine, or ventured out of reach of the cannon of the fort, would have been to have sealed the destruction of the detachment. But the officer to whom their security was entrusted, although he had his own particular views for venturing thus far, knew also at what point to stop; and such was the confidence of his men in his skill and prudence, they would have fearlessly followed wherever he might have chosen to lead. Still, even amid all the solemnity of preparation attendant on the duty they were out to perform, there was a natural and secret apprehensiveness about each, that caused him to cast his eyes frequently and fixedly on that part of the forest which was known to afford cover to their merciless foes. At times they fancied they beheld the dark and flitting forms of men gliding from tree to tree along the skirt of the wood; but when they gazed again, nothing of the kind was to be seen, and the illusion was at once ascribed to the heavy state of the atmosphere, and the action of their own precautionary instincts.

Meanwhile the solemn tragedy of death was preparing in mournful silence. On the centre of the bridge, and visible to those even within the fort, was placed the coffin of Halloway, and at twelve paces in front were drawn up the six rank and file on whom had devolved, by lot, the cruel duty of the day. With calm and fearless eye the prisoner surveyed the preparations for his approaching end; and whatever might be the inward workings of his mind, there was not among the assembled soldiery one individual whose countenance betrayed so little of sorrow and emotion as his own. With a firm step, when summoned, he moved towards the fatal coffin, dashing his cap to the earth as he advanced, and baring his chest with the characteristic contempt of death of the soldier. When he had reached the centre of the bridge, he turned facing his comrades, and knelt upon the coffin. Captain Blesington, who, permitted by the governor, had followed him with a sad heart and heavy step, now drew a prayer-book from his pocket, and read from it in a low voice. He then closed the volume, listened to something the prisoner earnestly communicated to him, received a small packet which he drew from the bosom of his shirt, shook him long and cordially by the hand, and then hastily resumed his post at the head of the detachment.

The principal inhabitants of the village, led by curiosity, had followed at a distance to witness the execution of the condemned soldier; and above the heads of the line, and crowning the slope, were collected groups of both sexes and of all ages, that gave a still more imposing character to the scene. Every eye was now turned upon the firing party, who only awaited the signal to execute their melancholy office, when suddenly, in the direction of the forest, and upon the extreme height, there burst the tremendous and deafening yells of more than a thousand savages. For an instant Halloway was forgotten in the instinctive sense of individual danger, and all gazed eagerly to ascertain the movements of their enemy. Presently a man, naked to the waist, his body and face besmeared with streaks of black and red paint, and his whole attitude expressing despair and horror, was seen flying down the height with a rapidity proportioned to the extreme peril in which he stood. At about fifty paces in his rear followed a dozen bounding, screaming Indians, armed with uplifted tomahawks, whose anxiety in pursuit lent them a speed that even surpassed the efforts of flight itself. It was evident the object of the pursued was to reach the detachment, that of the pursuers to prevent him. The struggle was maintained for a few moments with equality, but in the end the latter were triumphant, and at each step the distance that separated them became less. At the first alarm, the detachment, with the exception of the firing party, who still occupied their ground, had been thrown into square, and, with a gun planted in each angle, awaited the attack momentarily expected. But although the heights were now alive with the dusky forms of naked warriors, who, from the skirt of the forest, watched the exertions of their fellows, the pursuit of the wretched fugitive was confined to these alone. Foremost of the latter, and distinguished by his violent exertions and fiendish cries, was the tall and wildly attired warrior of the Fleur de lis. At every bound he gained upon his victim. Already were they descending the nearest of the undulating hills, and both now became conspicuous objects to all around; but principally the pursuer, whose gigantic frame and extraordinary speed riveted every eye, even while the interest of all was excited for the wretched fugitive alone.

At that moment Halloway, who had been gazing on the scene with an astonishment little inferior to that of his comrades, sprang suddenly to his feet upon the coffin, and waving his hand in the direction of the pursuing enemy, shouted aloud in a voice of mingled joy and triumph,—

"Ha! Almighty God, I thank thee! Here, here comes one who alone has the power to snatch me from my impending doom."

"By Heaven, the traitor confesses, and presumes to triumph in his guilt," exclaimed the voice of one, who, while closely attending to every movement of the Indians, was also vigilantly watching the effect likely to be produced on the prisoner by this unexpected interruption. "Corporal, do your duty."

"Stay, stay—one moment stay!" implored Halloway with uplifted hands.

"Do your duty, sir," fiercely repeated the governor.

"Oh stop—for God's sake, stop! Another moment and he will be here, and I—"

He said no more—a dozen bullets penetrated his body—one passed directly through his heart. He leaped several feet in the air, and then fell heavily, a lifeless bleeding corpse, across the coffin.

Meanwhile the pursuit of the fugitive was continued, but by the warrior of the Fleur de lis alone. Aware of their inefficiency to keep pace with this singular being, his companions had relinquished the chase, and now stood resting on the brow of the hill where the wretched Halloway had first recognised his supposed deliverer, watching eagerly, though within musket shot of the detachment, the result of a race on which so much apparently depended. Neither party, however, attempted to interfere with the other, for all eyes were now turned on the flying man and his pursuer with an interest that denoted the extraordinary efforts of the one to evade and the other to attain the accomplishment of his object. The immediate course taken was in a direct line for the ravine, which it evidently was the object of the fugitive to clear at its nearest point. Already had he approached within a few paces of its brink, and every eye was fastened on the point where it was expected the doubtful leap would be taken, when suddenly, as if despairing to accomplish it at a bound, he turned to the left, and winding along its bank, renewed his efforts in the direction of the bridge. This movement occasioned a change in the position of the parties, which was favourable to the pursued. Hitherto they had been so immediately on a line with each other, it was impossible for the detachment to bring a musket to bear upon the warrior, without endangering him whose life they were anxious to preserve. For a moment or two his body was fairly exposed, and a dozen muskets were discharged at intervals from the square, but all without success. Recovering his lost ground, he soon brought the pursued again in a line between himself and the detachment, edging rapidly nearer to him as he advanced, and uttering terrific yells, that were echoed back from his companions on the brow of the hill. It was evident, however, his object was the recapture, not the destruction, of the flying man, for more than once did he brandish his menacing tomahawk in rapid sweeps around his head, as if preparing to dart it, and as often did he check the movement. The scene at each succeeding moment became more critical and intensely interesting. The strength of the pursued was now nearly exhausted, while that of his formidable enemy seemed to suffer no diminution. Leap after leap he took with fearful superiority, sideling as he advanced. Already had he closed upon his victim, while with a springing effort a large and bony hand was extended to secure his shoulder in his grasp. The effort was fatal to him; for in reaching too far he lost his balance, and fell heavily upon the sword. A shout of exultation burst from the English troops, and numerous voices now encouraged the pursued to renew his exertions. The advice was not lost; and although only a few seconds had elapsed between the fall and recovery of his pursuer, the wretched fugitive had already greatly increased the distance that separated them. A cry of savage rage and disappointment burst from the lips of the gigantic warrior; and concentrating all his remaining strength and speed into one final effort, he bounded and leapt like a deer of the forest whence he came. The opportunity for recapture, however, had been lost in his fall, for already the pursued was within a few feet of the high road, and on the point of turning the extremity of the bridge. One only resource was now left: the warrior suddenly checked himself in his course, and remained stationary; then raising and dropping his glittering weapon several times in a balancing position, he waited until the pursued had gained the highest point of the open bridge. At that moment the glittering steel, aimed with singular accuracy and precision, ran whistling through the air, and with such velocity of movement as to be almost invisible to the eyes of those who attempted to follow it in its threatening course. All expected to see it enter into the brain against which it had been directed; but the fugitive had marked the movement in time to save himself by stooping low to the earth, while the weapon, passing over him, entered with a deadly and crashing sound into the brain of the weltering corpse. This danger passed, he sprang once more to his feet, nor paused again in his flight until, faint and exhausted, he sank without motion under the very bayonets of the firing party.

A new direction was now given to the interest of the assembled and distinct crowds that had witnessed these startling incidents. Scarcely had the wretched man gained the protection of the soldiery, when a shriek divided the air, so wild, so piercing, and so unearthly, that even the warrior of the Fleur de lis seemed to lose sight of his victim, in the harrowing interest produced by that dreadful scream. All turned their eyes for a moment in the quarter whence it proceeded; when presently, from behind the groups of Canadians crowning the slope, was seen flying, with the rapidity of thought, one who resembled rather a spectre than a being of earth;—it was the wife of Halloway. Her long fair hair was wild and streaming—her feet, and legs, and arms were naked—and one solitary and scanty garment displayed rather than concealed the symmetry of her delicate person. She flew to the fatal bridge, threw herself on the body of her bleeding husband, and imprinting her warm kisses on his bloody lips, for a moment or two presented the image of one whose reason has fled for ever. Suddenly she started from the earth; her face, her hands, and her garment so saturated with the blood of her husband, that a feeling of horror crept throughout the veins of all who beheld her. She stood upon the coffin, and across the corpse—raised her eyes and hands imploringly to Heaven—and then, in accents wilder even than her words, uttered an imprecation that sounded like the prophetic warning of some unholy spirit.

"Inhuman murderer!" she exclaimed, in tones that almost paralysed the ears on which it fell, "if there be a God of justice and of truth, he will avenge this devilish deed. Yes, Colonel de Haldimar, a prophetic voice whispers to my soul, that even as I have seen perish before my eyes all I loved on earth, without mercy and without hope, so even shall you witness the destruction of your accursed race. Here—here—here," and she pointed downwards, with singular energy of action, to the corpse of her husband, "here shall their blood flow till every vestige of his own is washed away, and oh, if there be spared one branch of thy detested family, may it be only that they may be reserved for some death too horrible to be conceived!"

Overcome by the frantic energy with which she had uttered these appalling words, she sank backwards, and fell, uttering another shriek, into the arms of the warrior of the Fleur de lis, who bore off his prize in triumph, and fled, with nearly the same expedition he had previously manifested, in the direction of the forest, before any one could recover sufficiently from the effect of the scene to think even of interfering.

CHAPTER XI.

It was on the evening of that day, so fertile in melancholy incident, to which the previous pages have been devoted, that the drawbridge of Detroit was, for the third time since the investment of the garrison, lowered; not, as previously, with a disregard of the intimation that might be given to those without by the sullen and echoing rattle of its ponderous chains, but with a caution attesting how much secrecy of purpose was sought to be preserved. There was, however, no array of armed men within the walls, that denoted an expedition of a hostile character. Overcome with the harassing duties of the day, the chief portion of the troops had retired to rest, and a few groups of the guard alone were to be seen walking up and down in front of their post, apparently with a view to check the influence of midnight drowsiness, but, in reality, to witness the result of certain preparations going on by torchlight in the centre of the barrack square.

In the midst of an anxious group of officers, comprising nearly all of that rank within the fort, stood two individuals, attired in a costume having nothing in common with the gay and martial habiliments of the former. They were tall, handsome young men, whose native elegance of carriage was but imperfectly hidden under an equipment evidently adopted for, and otherwise fully answering, the purpose of disguise. A blue cotton shell jacket, closely fitting to the person, trousers of the same material, a pair of strong deer-skin moccasins, and a coloured handkerchief tied loosely round the collar of a checked shirt, the whole surmounted by a rough blanket coat, formed the principal portion of their garb. Each, moreover, wore a false queue of about nine inches in length, the effect of which was completely to change the character of the countenance, and lend to the features a Canadian-like expression. A red worsted cap, resembling a bonnet de nuit, was thrown carelessly over the side of the head, which could, at any moment, when deeper disguise should be deemed necessary, command the additional protection of the rude hood that fell back upon the shoulders from the collar of the coat to which it was attached. Into a broad belt, that encircled the jacket of each, were thrust a brace of pistols and a strong dagger; the whole so disposed, however, as to be invisible when the outer garment was closed: this, again, was confined by a rude sash of worsted of different colours, not unlike, in texture and quality, what is worn by our sergeants at the present day. They were otherwise armed, however, and in a less secret manner. Across the right shoulder of each was thrown a belt of worsted also, to which were attached a rude powder horn and shot pouch, with a few straggling bullets, placed there as if rather by accident than design. Each held carelessly in his left hand, and with its butt resting on the earth, a long gun; completing an appearance, the attainment of which had, in all probability, been sedulously sought,—that of a Canadian duck-hunter.

A metamorphosis so ludicrously operated in the usually elegant costume of two young English officers,—for such they were,—might have been expected to afford scope to the pleasantry of their companions, and to call forth those sallies which the intimacy of friendship and the freemasonry of the profession would have fully justified. But the events that had occurred in such rapid succession, since the preceding midnight, were still painfully impressed on the recollection of all, and some there were who looked as if they never would smile again; neither laugh nor jeering, therefore, escaped the lips of one of the surrounding group. Every countenance wore a cast of thought,—a character of abstraction, ill suited to the indulgence of levity; and the little conversation that passed between them was in a low and serious tone. It was evident some powerful and absorbing dread existed in the mind of each, inducing him rather to indulge in communion with his own thoughts and impressions, than to communicate them to others. Even the governor himself had, for a moment, put off his usual distance, to assume an air of unfeigned concern, and it might be dejection, contrasting strongly with his habitual haughtiness. Hitherto he had been walking to and fro, a little apart from the group, and with a hurriedness and indecision of movement that betrayed to all the extreme agitation of his mind. For once, however, he appeared to be, if not insensible to observation, indifferent to whatever comments might be formed or expressed by those who witnessed his emotion. He was at length interrupted by the adjutant, who communicated something in a low voice.

"Let him be brought up, Mr. Lawson," was the reply. Then advancing into the heart of the group, and addressing the two adventurers, he enquired, in a tone that startled from its singular mildness, "if they were provided with every thing they required."

An affirmative reply was given, when the governor, taking the taller of the young men aside, conversed with him earnestly, and in a tone of affection strangely blended with despondency. The interview, however, was short, for Mr. Lawson now made his appearance, conducting an individual who has already been introduced to our readers. It was the Canadian of the Fleur de lis. The adjutant placed a small wooden crucifix in the hands of the governor.

"François," said the latter, impressively, "you know the terms on which I have consented to spare your life. Swear, then, by this cross; that you will be faithful to your trust; that neither treachery nor evasion shall be practised; and that you will, to the utmost of your power, aid in conveying these gentlemen to their destination. Kneel and swear it."

"I do swear it!" fervently repeated the subergiste, kneeling and imprinting his lips with becoming reverence on the symbol of martyrdom. "I swear to do dat I shall engage, and may de bon Dieu have mercy to my soul as I shall fulfil my oat."

"Amen," pronounced the governor, "and may Heaven deal by you even as you deal by us. Bear in mind, moreover, that as your treachery will be punished, so also shall your fidelity be rewarded. But the night wears apace, and ye have much to do." Then turning to the young officers who were to be his companions,—"God bless you both; may your enterprise be successful! I fear," offering his hand to the younger, "I have spoken harshly to you, but at a moment like the present you will no longer cherish a recollection of the unpleasant past."

The only answer was a cordial return of his own pressure. The Canadian in his turn now announced the necessity for instant departure, when the young men, following his example, threw their long guns carelessly over the left shoulder. Low, rapid, and fervent adieus were uttered on both sides; and although the hands of the separating parties met only in a short and hurried grasp, there was an expression in the touch of each that spoke to their several hearts long after the separation had actually taken place.

"Stay one moment!" exclaimed a voice, as the little party now moved towards the gate-way; "ye are both gallantly enough provided without, but have forgotten there is something quite as necessary to sustain the inward man. Duck shooting, you know, is wet work. The last lips that were moistened from this," he proceeded, as the younger of the disguised men threw the strap of the proffered canteen over his shoulder, "were those of poor Ellen Halloway."

The mention of that name, so heedlessly pronounced by the brave but inconsiderate Eskine, produced a startling effect on the taller of the departing officers. He struck his brow violently with his hand, uttered a faint groan, and bending his head upon his chest, stood in an attitude expressive of the deep suffering of his mind. The governor, too, appeared agitated: and sounds like those of suppressed sobs came from one who lingered at the side of him who had accepted the offer of the canteen. The remainder of the officers preserved a deep and mournful silence.

"It is times dat we should start," again observed the Canadian, "or we shall be taken by de daylight before we can clear de river."

This intimation once more aroused the slumbering energies of the taller officer. Again he drew up his commanding figure, extended his hand to the governor in silence, and turning abruptly round, hastened to follow close in the footsteps of his conductor.

"You will not forget all I have said to you," whispered the voice of one who had reserved his parting for the last, and who now held the hand of the younger adventurer closely clasped in his own. "Think, oh, think how much depends on the event of your dangerous enterprise."

"When you behold me again," was the reply, "it will be with smiles on my lip and gladness in my heart; for if we fail, there is that within me, which whispers I shall never see you more. But keep up your spirits and hope for the best. We embark under cheerless auspices, it is true; but let us trust to Providence for success in so good a cause,—God bless you!"

In the next minute he had joined his companions; who, with light and noiseless tread, were already pursuing their way along the military road that led to the eastern extremity of the town. Soon afterwards, the heavy chains of the drawbridge were heard grating on the ear, in despite of the evident caution used in restoring it to its wonted position, and all again was still.

It had at first been suggested their course should be held in an angular direction across the cleared country alluded to in our last chapter, in order to avoid all chance of recognition in the town; but as this might have led them into more dangerous contact with some of the outlying parties of Indians, who were known to prowl around the fort at night, this plan had been abandoned for the more circuitous and safe passage by the village. Through this our little party now pursued their way, and without encountering aught to impede their progress. The simple mannered inhabitants had long since retired to rest, and neither light nor sound denoted the existence of man or beast within its products. At length they reached that part of the road which turned off abruptly in the direction of the Fleur de lis. The rude hut threw its dark shadows across their path, but all was still and deathlike as in the village they had just quitted. Presently, however, as they drew nearer, they beheld, reflected from one of the upper windows, a faint light that fell upon the ground immediately in front of the auberge; and, at intervals, the figure of a human being approaching and receding from it as if in the act of pacing the apartment.

An instinctive feeling of danger rose at the same moment to the hearts of the young officers; and each, obeying the same impulse, unfastened one of the large horn buttons of his blanket coat, and thrust his right hand into the opening.

"François, recollect your oath," hastily aspired the elder as he grasped the hand of their conductor rather in supplication than in threat; "if there be aught to harm us here, your own life will most assuredly pay the forfeit of your faith."

"It is nothing but a woman's," calmly returned the Canadian; "it is my Babette who is sorry at my loss. But I shall come and tell you directly."

He then stole gently round the corner of the hut, leaving his anxious companions in the rear of the little building, and completely veiled in the obscurity produced by the mingling shadows of the hut itself, and a few tall pear trees that overhung the paling of the orchard at some yards from the spot on which they stood.

They waited some minutes to hear the result of the Canadian's admittance into his dwelling; but although each with suppressed breathing sought to catch those sounds of welcome with which a daughter might be supposed to greet a parent so unexpectedly restored, they listened in vain. At length, however, while the ears of both were on the rack to drink in the tones of a human voice, a faint scream floated on the hushed air, and all again was still.

"Good!" whispered the elder of the officers; "that scream is sweeter to my ear than the softest accents of woman's love. It is evident the ordinary tones of speech cannot find their way to us here from the front of the hut. The faintness of yon cry, which was unquestionably that of a female, is a convincing proof of it."

"Hist!" urged his companion, in the same almost inaudible whisper, "what sound was that?"

Both again listened attentively, when the noise was repeated. It came from the orchard, and resembled the sound produced by the faint crash of rotten sticks and leaves under the cautious but unavoidably rending tread of a human foot. At intervals it ceased, as if the person treading, alarmed at his own noise, was apprehensive of betraying his approach; and then recommenced, only to be checked in the same manner. Finally it ceased altogether. For upwards of five minutes the young men continued to listen for a renewal of the sound, but nothing was now audible, save the short and fitful gusts of a rising wind among the trees of the orchard.

"It must have been some wild animal in search of its prey," again whispered the younger officer; "had it been a man, we should have heard him leap the paling before this."

"By Heaven, we are betrayed,—here he is," quickly rejoined the other, in the same low tone. "Keep close to the hut, and stand behind me. If my dagger fail, you must try your own. But fire not, on your life, unless there be more than two, for the report of a pistol will be the destruction of ourselves and all that are dear to us." Each with uplifted arm now stood ready to strike, even while his heart throbbed with a sense of danger, that had far more than the mere dread of personal suffering or death to stimulate to exertion in self-defence. Footsteps were now distinctly heard stealing round that part of the hut which bordered on the road; and the young men turned from the orchard, to which their attention had previously been directed, towards the new quarter whence they were intruded upon.

It was fortunate this mode of approach had been selected. That part of the hut which rested on the road was so exposed as to throw the outline of objects into strong relief, whereas in the direction of the thickly wooded orchard all was impenetrable gloom. Had the intruder stolen unannounced upon the alarmed but determined officers by the latter route, the dagger of the first would in all probability have been plunged to its hilt in his bosom. As it was, each had sufficient presence of mind to distinguish, as it now doubled the corner of the hut, and reposed upon the road, the stout square-set figure of the Canadian. The daggers were instantly restored to their sheaths, and each, for the first time since the departure of their companion, respired freely. "It is quite well," whispered the latter as he approached. "It was my poor Babette, who thought I was gone to be killed. She screamed so loud, as if she had seen my ghost. But we must wait a few minutes in de house, and you shall see how glad my girl is to see me once again."

"Why this delay, François? why not start directly?" urged the taller officer; "we shall never clear the river in time; and if the dawn catches us in the waters of the Detroit we are lost for ever."

"But you see I am not quite prepared yet," was the answer. "I have many things to get ready for de canoe, which I have not use for a long time. But you shall not wait ten minutes, if you do not like. Here is a good fire, and Babette shall give you some thing to eat while I get it all ready."

The young men hesitated. The delay of the Canadian, who had so repeatedly urged the necessity for expedition while in the fort, had, to say the least of it, an appearance of incongruity. Still it was evident, if disposed to harm them he had full opportunity to do so without much risk of effectual opposition from themselves. Under all circumstances, therefore, it was advisable rather to appear to confide implicitly in his truth, than, by manifesting suspicion, to pique his self-love, and neutralise whatever favourable intentions he might cherish in their behalf. In this mode of conduct they were confirmed, by a recollection of the sacredness attached by the religion of their conductor to the oath so solemnly pledged on the symbol of the cross, and by a conviction of the danger of observation to which they stood exposed, if, as they had apprehended, it was actually a human footstep they had heard in the orchard. This last recollection suggested a remark.

"We heard a strange sound within the orchard, while waiting here for your return," said the taller officer; "it was like the footstep of a man treading cautiously over rotten leaves and branches. How do you account for it?"

"Oh, it was my pig," replied the Canadian, without manifesting the slightest uneasiness at the information. "They run about in de orchard for de apples what blows down wid de wind."

"It could not be a pig we heard," pursued his questioner; "but another thing, François, before we consent to enter the hut,—how will you account to your daughter for our presence? and what suspicion may she not form at seeing two armed strangers in company with you at this unreasonable hour?"

"I have tell her," replied the Canadian, "dat I have bring two friends, who go wid me in de canoe to shoot de ducks for two tree days. You know, sir, I go always in de fall to kill de ducks wid my friends, and she will not tink it strange."

"You have managed well, my brave fellow; and now we follow you in confidence. But in the name of Heaven, use all possible despatch, and if money will lend a spur to your actions, you shall have plenty of it when our enterprise has been accomplished."

Our adventurers followed their conductor in the track by which he had so recently rejoined them. As they turned the corner of the hut, the younger, who brought up the rear, fancied he again heard a sound in the direction of the orchard, resembling that of one lightly leaping to the ground. A gust of wind, however, passing rapidly at the moment through the dense foliage, led him to believe it might have been produced by the sudden fall of one of the heavy fruits it had detached in its course. Unwilling to excite new and unnecessary suspicion in his companion, he confined the circumstance to his own breast, and followed into the hut.

After ascending a flight of about a dozen rude steps, they found themselves in a small room, furnished with no other ceiling than the sloping roof itself, and lighted by an unwieldy iron lamp, placed on a heavy oak table, near the only window with which the apartment was provided. This latter had suffered much from the influence of time and tempest; and owing to the difficulty of procuring glass in so remote a region, had been patched with slips of paper in various parts. The two corner and lower panes of the bottom sash were out altogether, and pine shingles, such as are used even at the present day for covering the roofs of dwelling houses, had been fitted into the squares, excluding air and light at the same time. The centre pane of this tier was, however, clear and free from flaw of every description. Opposite to the window blazed a cheerful wood fire, recently supplied with fuel; and at one of the inner corners of the room was placed a low uncurtained bed, that exhibited marks of having been lain in since it was last made. On a chair at its side were heaped a few dark-looking garments, the precise nature of which were not distinguishable at a cursory and distant glance.

Such were the more remarkable features of the apartment into which our adventurers were now ushered. Both looked cautiously around on entering, as if expecting to find it tenanted by spirits as daring as their own; but, with the exception of the daughter of their conductor, whose moist black eyes expressed, as much by tears as by smiles, the joy she felt at this unexpected return of her parent, no living object met their enquiring glance. The Canadian placed a couple of rush-bottomed chairs near the fire, invited his companions to seat themselves until he had completed his preparation for departure, and then, desiring Babette to hasten supper for the young hunters, quitted the room and descended the stairs.

CHAPTER XII.

The position of the young men was one of embarrassment; for while the daughter, who was busied in executing the command of her father, remained in the room, it was impossible they could converse together without betraying the secret of their country, and, as a result of this, the falsehood of the character under which they appeared. Long residence in the country had, it is true, rendered the patois of that class of people whom they persecuted familiar to one, but the other spoke only the pure and native language of which it was a corruption. It might have occurred to them at a cooler moment, and under less critical circumstances, that, even if their disguise had been penetrated, it was unlikely a female, manifesting so much lively affection for her parent, would have done ought to injure those with whom he had evidently connected himself. But the importance attached to their entire security from danger left them but little room for reflections of a calming character, while a doubt of that security remained.

One singularity struck them both. They had expected the young woman, urged by a natural curiosity, would have commenced a conversation, even if they did not; and he who spoke the patois was prepared to sustain it as well as his anxious and overcharged spirit would enable him; and as he was aware the morning had furnished sufficient incident of fearful interest, he had naturally looked for a verbal re-enactment of the harrowing and dreadful scene. To their surprise, however, they both remarked that, far from evincing a desire to enter into conversation, the young woman scarcely ever looked at them, but lingered constantly near the table, and facing the window. Still, to avoid an appearance of singularity on their own parts, as far as possible, the elder of the officers motioned to his companion, who, following his example, took a small pipe and some tobacco from a compartment in his shot pouch, and commenced puffing the wreathing smoke from his lips—an occupation, more than any other, seeming to justify their silence.

The elder officer sat with his back to the window, and immediately in front of the fire; his companion, at a corner of the rude hearth, and in such a manner that, without turning his head, he could command every part of the room at a glance. In the corner facing him stood the bed already described. A faint ray of fire-light fell on some minute object glittering in the chair, the contents of which were heaped up in disorder. Urged by that wayward curiosity, which is sometimes excited, even under circumstances of the greatest danger and otherwise absorbing interest, the young man kicked the hickory log that lay nearest to it with his moccasined foot, and produced a bright crackling flame, the reflection of which was thrown entirely upon the object of his gaze; it was a large metal button, on which the number of his regiment was distinctly visible. Unable to check his desire to know further, he left his seat, to examine the contents of the chair. As he moved across the room, he fancied he heard a light sound from without; his companion, also, seemed to manifest a similar impression by an almost imperceptible start; but the noise was so momentary, and so fanciful, neither felt it worth his while to pause upon the circumstance. The young officer now raised the garments from the chair: they consisted of a small grey great-coat, and trousers, a waistcoat of coarse white cloth, a pair of worsted stockings, and the half-boots of a boy; the whole forming the drum-boy's equipment worn by the wretched wife of Halloway when borne senseless into the hut on that fatal morning. Hastily quitting a dress that called up so many dreadful recollections, and turning to his companion with a look that denoted apprehension, lest he too should have beheld these melancholy remembrances of the harrowing scene, the young officer hastened to resume his seat. In the act of so doing, his eye fell upon the window, at which the female still lingered. Had a blast from Heaven struck his sight, the terror of his soul could not have been greater. He felt his cheek to pale, and his hair to bristle beneath his cap, while the checked blood crept slowly and coldly, as if its very function had been paralysed; still he had presence of mind sufficient not to falter in his step, or to betray, by any extraordinary movement, that his eye had rested on any thing hateful to behold.

His companion had emptied his first pipe, and was in the act of refilling it, when he resumed his seat. He was evidently impatient at the delay of the Canadian, and already were his lips ready to give utterance to his disappointment, when he felt his foot significantly pressed by that of his friend. An instinctive sense of something fearful that was to ensue, but still demanding caution on his part, prevented him from turning hastily round to know the cause. Satisfied, however, there was danger, though not of an instantaneous character, he put his pipe gently by, and stealing his hand under his coat, again grasped the hilt of his dagger. At length he slowly and partially turned his head, while his eyes enquiringly demanded of his friend the cause of this alarm. Partly to aid in concealing his increasing paleness, and partly with a view to render it a medium for the conveyance of subdued sound, the hand of the latter was raised to his face in such a manner that the motion of his lips could not be distinguished from behind.

"We are betrayed," he scarcely breathed. "If you can command yourself, turn and look at the window; but for God's sake arm yourself with resolution, or look not at all: first draw the hood over your head, and without any appearance of design. Our only chance of safety lies in this,—that the Canadian may still be true, and that our disguise may not be penetrated."

In despite of his native courage,—and this had often been put to honourable proof,—he, thus mysteriously addressed, felt his heart to throb violently. There was something so appalling in the countenance of his friend—something so alarming in the very caution he had recommended—that a vague dread of the horrible reality rushed at once to his mind, and for a moment his own cheek became ashy pale, and his breathing painfully oppressed. It was the natural weakness of the physical man, over which the moral faculties, had, for an instant, lost their directing power. Speedily recovering himself, the young man prepared to encounter the alarming object which had already so greatly intimidated his friend. Carefully drawing the blanket hood over his head, he rose from his seat, and, with the energetic movement of one who has formed some desperate determination, turned his back to the fire-place, and threw his eyes rapidly and eagerly upon the window. They fell only on the rude patchwork of which it was principally composed. The female had quitted the room.

"You must have been deceived," he whispered, keeping his eye still bent upon the window, and with so imperceptible a movement of the lips that sound alone could have betrayed he was speaking,—“I see nothing to justify your alarm. Look again.”

The younger officer once more directed his glance towards the window, and with a shuddering of the whole person, as he recollected what had met his eye when he last looked upon it. "It is no longer there, indeed," he returned in the same scarcely audible tone. "Yet I could not be mistaken; it was between those two corner squares of wood in the lower sash."

"Perhaps it was merely a reflection produced by the lamp on the centre pane," rejoined his friend, still keeping his eye riveted on the suspicious point. "Impossible! but I will examine the window from the spot on which I stood when I first beheld it."

Again he quitted his seat, and carelessly crossed the room. As he returned he threw his glance upon the pane, when, to his infinite horror and surprise, the same frightful vision presented itself.

"God of heaven!" he exclaimed aloud, and unable longer to check the ebullition of his feelings,—“what means this?—Is my brain turned? and am I the sport of my own delusive fancy—Do you not see it now?”

No answer was returned. His friend stood mute and motionless, with his left hand grasping his gun, and his right thrust into the waist of his coat. His eye grew upon the window, and his chest heaved, and his cheek paled and flushed alternately with the subdued emotion of his heart. A human face was placed close to the unbleached glass, and every feature was distinctly revealed by the lamp that still lay upon the table. The glaring eye was fixed on the taller of the officers; but though the expression was unfathomably guileful, there was nothing that denoted any thing like a recognition of the party.

The brightness of the wood fire had so far subsided as to throw the interior of the room into partial obscurity, and under the disguise of his hood it was impossible for one without to distinguish the features of the taller officer. The younger, who was scarcely an object of attention, passed comparatively unnoticed.

Fatigued and dimmed with the long and eager tension of its nerves, the eye of the latter now began to fail him. For a moment he closed it; and when again it fell upon the window; it encountered nothing but the clear and glittering pane. For upwards of a minute he and his friend still continued to rivet their gaze, but the face was no longer visible.

Why is it that what is called the "human face divine," is sometimes gifted with a power to paralyse, that the most loathsome reptile in the creation cannot attain? Had a cougar of the American forest, roaring for prey, appeared at that window, ready to burst the fragile barrier, and fasten its talons in their hearts, its presence would not have struck such sickness to the soul of our adventurers as did that human face. It is, that man, naturally fierce and inexorable, is alone the enemy of his own species. The solution of this problem—this glorious paradox in nature, we leave to profounder philosophers to resolve. Sufficient for us be it to know, and to deplore that it is so.

Footsteps were now heard upon the stairs; and the officers, aroused to a full sense of their danger, hastily and silently prepared themselves for the encounter. "Drop a bullet into your gun," whispered the elder, setting the example himself. "We may be obliged to have recourse to it at last. Yet make no show of hostility unless circumstances satisfy us we are betrayed; then, indeed, all that remains for us will be to sell our lives as dearly as we can. Hist! he is here."

The door opened! and at the entrance, which was already filled up in the imaginations of the young men with a terrible and alarming figure, appeared one whose return had been anxiously and long desired. It was a relief, indeed, to their gallant but excited hearts to behold another than the form they had expected; and although, for the moment, they knew not whether the Canadian came in hostility or in friendship, each quitted the attitude of caution into which he had thrown himself, and met him midway in his passage through the room. There was nothing in the expression of his naturally open and good-humoured countenance to denote he was at all aware of the causes for alarm that had operated so powerfully on themselves. He announced with a frank look and unflinching voice every thing was in readiness for their departure.

The officers hesitated; and the taller fixed his eyes upon those of mine host, as if his gaze would have penetrated to the innermost recesses of his heart. Could this be a refinement of his treachery? and was he really ignorant of the existence of the danger which threatened them? Was it not more probable his object was to disarm their fears, that they might be given unprepared and, therefore, unresisting victims to the ferocity of their enemies? Aware as he was, that they were both well provided with arms, and fully determined to use them with effect, might not his aim be to decoy them to destruction without, lest the blood spilt under his roof, in the desperation of their defence, should hereafter attest against him, and expose him to the punishment he would so richly merit? Distracted by these doubts, the young men scarcely knew what to think or how to act; and anxious as they had previously been to quit the hut, they now considered the moment of their doing so would be that of their destruction. The importance of the enterprise on which they were embarked was such as to sink all personal considerations. If they had felt the influence of intimidation on their spirits, it arose less from any apprehension of consequences to themselves, than from the recollection of the dearer interests involved in their perfect security from discovery.

"François," feelingly urged the taller officer, again adverting to his vow, "you recollect the oath you solemnly pledged upon the cross of your Saviour. Tell me, then, as you hope for mercy, have you taken that oath only that you might the more securely betray us to our enemies? What connection have you with them at this moment? and who is he who stood looking through that window not ten minutes since?"

"As I shall hope for mercy in my God," exclaimed the Canadian with unfeigned astonishment, "I have not seen anybody. But what for do you think so? It is not just. I have given my oath to serve you, and I shall do it."

There was candour both in the tone and countenance of the man as he uttered these words, half in reproach, half in justification; and the officers no longer doubted.

"You must forgive our suspicions at a moment like the present," soothingly observed the younger; "yet, François, your daughter saw and exchanged signals with the person we mean. She left the room soon after he made his appearance. What has become of her?"

The Canadian gave a sudden start, looked hastily round, and seemed to perceive for the first time the girl was absent. He then put a finger to his lip to enjoin silence, advanced to the table, and extinguished the light. Desiring his companions, in a low whisper, to tread cautiously and follow, he now led the way with almost noiseless step to the entrance of the hut. At the threshold of the door were placed a large well-filled sack, a light mast and sail, and half a dozen paddles. The latter burden he divided between the officers, on whose shoulders he carefully balanced them. The sack he threw across his own; and, without expressing even a regret that an opportunity of bidding adieu to his child was denied him, hastily skirted the paling of the orchard until, at the further extremity, he had gained the high road. The heavens were obscured by passing clouds driven rapidly by the wind, during the short pauses of which our adventurers anxiously and frequently turned to listen if they were pursued. Save the rustling of the trees that lined the road, and the slight dashing of the waters on the beach, however, no sound was distinguishable. At length they gained the point whence they were to start. It was the fatal bridge, the events connected with which were yet so painfully fresh in their recollection.

"Stop one minute here," whispered the Canadian, throwing his sack upon the sand near the mouth of the lesser river; "my canoe is chained about twenty yards up the bridge. I shall come to you directly." Then cautioning the officers to keep themselves concealed under the bridge, he moved hastily under the arch, and disappeared in the dark shadow which it threw across the rivulet.

The extremities of the bridge rested on the banks of the little river in such a manner as to leave a narrow passage along the sands immediately under the declination of the arch. In accordance with the caution of their conductor, the officers had placed themselves under it; and with their backs slightly bent forward to meet the curvature of the bridge, so that no ray of light could pass between their bodies and the fabric itself, now awaited the arrival of the vessel on which their only hope depended. We shall not attempt to describe their feelings on finding themselves, at that lone hour of the night, immediately under a spot rendered fearfully memorable by the tragic occurrences of the morning. The terrible pursuit of the fugitive, the execution of the soldier, the curse and prophecy of his maniac wife, and, above all, the forcible abduction and threatened espousal of that unhappy woman by the formidable being who seemed to have identified himself with the evils with which they stood menaced,—all rushed with rapid tracery on the mind, and excited the imagination, until each, filled with a sentiment not unalloyed to superstitious awe, feared to whisper forth his thoughts, lest in so doing he should invoke the presence of those who had principally figured in the harrowing and revolting scene.

"Did you not hear a noise?" at length whispered the elder, as he leaned himself forward, and bent his head to the sand, to catch more distinctly a repetition of the sound.

"I did; there again! It is upon the bridge, and not unlike the step of one endeavouring to tread lightly. It may be some wild beast, however."

"We must not be taken by surprise," returned his companion. "If it be a man, the wary tread indicates consciousness of our presence. If an animal, there can be no harm in setting our fears at rest." Cautiously stealing from his lurking-place, the young officer emerged into the open sands, and in a few measured noiseless strides gained the extremity of the bridge. The dark shadow of something upon its centre caught his eye, and a low sound like that of a dog lapping met his ear. While his gaze yet lingered on the shapeless object, endeavouring to give it a character, the clouds which had so long obscured it passed momentarily from before the moon, and disclosed the appalling truth. It was a wolf-dog, tapping up from the earth, in which they were encrusted, the blood and brains of the unfortunate Frank Halloway.

Sick and faint at the disgusting sight, the young man rested his elbow on the railing that passed along the edge of the bridge, and, leaning his head on his hand for a moment, forgot the risk of exposure he incurred, in the intensity of the sorrow that assailed his soul. His heart and imagination were already far from the spot on which he stood, when he felt an iron hand upon his shoulder. He turned, shuddering with an instinctive knowledge of his yet unseen visitant, and beheld standing over him the terrible warrior of the Fleur de lis.

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed the savage, in a low triumphant tone, "the place of our meeting is well timed, though somewhat singular, it must be confessed. Nay," he fiercely added, grasping as in a vice the arm that was already lifted to strike him, "force me not to annihilate you on the spot. Ha! hear you the cry of my wolf-dog?" as that animal now set up a low but fearful howl; "it is for your blood he asks, but your hour is not yet come."

"No, by heaven, is it not!" exclaimed a voice; a rapid and rushing sweep was heard through the air for an instant, and then a report like a stunning blow. The warrior released his grasp—placed his hand upon his tomahawk, but without strength to remove it from his belt tottered a pace or two backwards—and then fell, uttering a cry of mingled pain and disappointment, at his length upon the earth. "Quick, quick to our cover!" exclaimed the young officer, as a loud shout was now heard from the forest in reply to the yell of the fallen warrior. "If François come not, we are lost: the howl of that wolf-dog alone will betray us, even if his master should be beyond all chance of recovery."

"Desperate diseases require desperate remedies," was the reply; "there is little glory in destroying a helpless enemy, but the necessity is urgent, and we must leave nothing to chance." As he spoke, he knelt upon the huge form of the senseless warrior, whose scalping knife he drew from its sheath, and striking a firm and steady blow, quitted not the weapon until he felt his hand reposing on the chest of his enemy. The howl of the wolf-dog, whose eyes glared like two burning coals through the surrounding gloom, was now exchanged to a fierce and snappish bark. He made a leap at the officer while in the act of rising from the body; but his fangs fastened only in the chest of the shaggy coat, which he wrung with the strength and fury characteristic of his peculiar species. This new and ferocious attack was fraught with danger little inferior to that which they had just escaped, and required the utmost promptitude of action. The young man seized the brute behind the neck in a firm and vigorous grasp, while he stooped upon the motionless form over which this novel struggle was maintained, and succeeded in making himself once more master of the scalping knife. Half choked by the hand that unflinchingly grappled with him, the savage animal quitted his hold and struggled violently to free himself. This was the critical moment. The officer drew the heavy sharp blade, from the handle to the point, across the throat of the infuriated beast, with a force that divided the principal artery. He made a desperate leap upwards, spouting his blood over his destroyer, and then fell gasping across the body of his master. A low growl, intermingled with faint attempts to bark, which the rapidly ebbing life rendered more and more indistinct, succeeded; and at length nothing but a gurgling sound was distinguishable.

Meanwhile the anxious and harassed officers had regained their place of concealment under the bridge, where they listened with suppressed breathing for the slightest sound to indicate the approach of the canoe. At intervals they fancied they could hear a noise resembling the rippling of water against the prow of a light vessel, but the swelling cries of a band of Indians, becoming at every instant more distinct, were too unceasingly kept up to admit of their judging with accuracy.

They now began to give themselves up for lost, and many and bitter were the curses they inwardly bestowed on the Canadian, when the outline of a human form was seen advancing along the sands, and a dark object upon the water. It was their conductor, dragging the canoe along, with all the strength and activity of which he was capable.

What the devil have you been about all this time, François?" exclaimed the taller officer, as he bounded to meet him. "Quick, quick, or we shall be too late. Hear you not the blood-hounds on their scent?" Then seizing the chain in his hand, with a powerful effort he sent the canoe flying through the arch to the very entrance of the river. The burdens that had been deposited on the sands were hastily flung in, the officers stepping lightly after. The Canadian took the helm, directing the frail vessel almost noiselessly through the water, and with such velocity, that when the cry of the disappointed savages was heard resounding from the bridge, it had already gained the centre of the Detroit.

CHAPTER XIII.

Two days had succeeded the departure of the officers from the fort, but unproductive of any event of importance. About daybreak, however, on the morning of the third, the harassed garrison were once more summoned to arms, by an alarm from the sentinels planted in rear of the works; a body of Indians they had traced and lost at intervals, as they wound along the skirt of the forest, in their progress from their encampment, were at length developing themselves in force near the bomb-proof. With a readiness which long experience and watchfulness had rendered in some degree habitual to them, the troops flew to their respective posts; while a few of the senior officers, among whom was the governor, hastened to the ramparts to reconnoitre the strength and purpose of their enemies. It was evident the views of these latter were not immediately hostile; for neither were they in their war paint, nor were their arms of a description to carry intimidation to a disciplined and fortified soldiery. Bows, arrows, tomahawks, war clubs, spears, and scalping knives, constituted their warlike equipments, but neither rifle nor re-arms of any kind were discernible. Several of the leaders, distinguishable by a certain haughty carriage and commanding gesticulation, were collected within the elevated bomb-proof, apparently holding a short but important conference apart from their people, most of whom stood or lay in picturesque attitudes around the ruin. These also had a directing spirit. A tall and noble looking warrior, wearing a deer skin hunting frock closely girded around his loins, appeared to command the deference of his colleagues, claiming profound attention when he spoke himself, and manifesting his assent or dissent to the apparently expressed opinions of the lesser chiefs merely by a slight movement of the head.

"There he is indeed!" exclaimed Captain Erskine, speaking as one who communes with his own thoughts, while he kept his telescope levelled on the form of the last warrior: "looking just as noble as when, three years ago, he opposed himself to the progress of the first English detachment that had ever penetrated to this part of the world. What a pity such a fine fellow should be so desperate and determined an enemy!"

"True: you were with Major Rogers on that expedition," observed the governor, "I have often heard him speak of it. You had many difficulties to contend against, if I recollect." "We had indeed, sir," returned the frank-hearted Erskine, dropping the glass from his eye. "So many, in fact, that more than once, in the course of our progress through the wilderness, did I wish myself at head-quarters with my company. Never shall I forget the proud and determined expression of Pontac's countenance, when he told Rogers, in his figurative language, 'he stood in the path in which he travelled.'"

"Thank heaven, he at least stands not in the path in which others travel," musingly rejoined the governor: "But what sudden movement is that within the ruin?"

"The Indians are preparing to show a white flag," shouted an artillery man from his station in one of the embrasures below.

The governor and his officers received this intelligence without surprise: the former took the glass from Captain Erskine, and coolly raised it to his eye. The consultation had ceased; and the several chiefs, with the exception of their leader and two others, were now seen quitting the bomb-proof to join their respective tribes. One of those who remained, sprang upon an elevated fragment of the ruin, and uttered a prolonged cry, the purport of which,—and it was fully understood from its peculiar nature,—was to claim attention from the fort. He then received from the hands of the other chief a long spear; to the end of which was attached a piece of white linen. This he waved several times above his head; then stuck the barb of the spear firmly into the projecting fragment. Quitting his elevated station, he next stood at the side of the Ottawa chief, who had already assumed the air and attitude of one waiting to observe in what manner his signal would be received.

"A flag of truce in all its bearings, by Jupiter!" remarked Captain Erskine. "Pontac seems to have acquired a few lessons since we first met."

"This is evidently the suggestion of some European," observed Major Blackwater; "for how should he understand any thing of the nature of a white flag? Some of these vile spies have put him up to this."

"True enough, Blackwater; and they appear to have found an intelligent pupil," observed Captain Wentworth. "I was curious to know how he would make the attempt to approach us; but certainly never once dreamt of his having recourse to so civilised a method. Their plot works well, no doubt; still we have the counter-plot to oppose to it."

"We must foil them with their own weapons," remarked the governor, "even if it be only with a view to gain time. Wentworth, desire one of your bombardiers to hoist the large French flag on the staff." The order was promptly obeyed. The Indians made a simultaneous movement expressive of their satisfaction; and in the course of a minute, the tall warrior, accompanied by nearly a dozen inferior chiefs, was seen slowly advancing across the common, towards the group of officers.

"What generous confidence the fellow has for an Indian!" observed Captain Erskine, who could not dissemble his admiration of the warrior. "He steps as firmly and as proudly within reach of our muskets, as if he was leading in the war-dance."

"How strange," mused Captain Blessington, "that one who meditates so deep a treachery, should have no apprehension of it in others!"

"It is a compliment to the honour of our flag," observed the governor, "which it must be our interest to encourage. If, as you say, Erskine, the man is really endowed with generosity, the result of this affair will assuredly call it forth."

"If it prove otherwise, sir," was the reply, "we must only attribute his perseverance to the influence which that terrible warrior of the Fleur de lis is said to exercise over his better feelings. By the by, I see nothing of him among this flag of truce party. It could scarcely be called a violation of faith to cut off such a rascally renegade. Were he of the number of those advancing, and Valletot's rifle within my reach, I know not what use I might not be tempted to make of the last."

Poor Erskine was singularly infelicitous in touching, and ever unconsciously, on a subject sure to give pain to more than one of his brother officers. A cloud passed over the brow of the governor, but it was one that originated more in sorrow than in anger. Neither had he time to linger on the painful recollections hastily and confusedly called up by the allusion made to this formidable and mysterious being, for the attention of all was now absorbed by the approaching Indians. With a bold and confident carriage the fierce Pontec moved at the head of his little party, nor hesitated one moment in his course, until he got near the brink of the ditch, and stood face to face with the governor, at a distance that gave both parties not only the facility of tracing the expression of each other's features, but of conversing without effort. There he made a sudden stand, and thrusting his spear into the earth, assumed an attitude as devoid of apprehension as if he had been in the heart of his own encampment.

"My father has understood my sign," said the haughty chief. "The warriors of a dozen tribes are far behind the path the Ottawa has just travelled; but when the red skin comes unarmed, the hand of the Saganaw is tied behind his back."

"The strong hold of the Saganaw is his safeguard," replied the governor, adopting the language of the Indian. "When the enemies of his great father come in strength, he knows how to dispose them; but when a warrior throws himself unarmed into his power, he respects his confidence, and his arms hang rusting at his side."

"The talk of my father is big," replied the warrior, with a scornful expression that seemed to doubt the fact of so much indifference as to himself; but when it is a great chief who directs the nations, and that chief his sworn enemy, the temptation to the Saganaw may be strong."

"The Saganaw is without fear," emphatically rejoined the governor; "he is strong in his own honour; and he would rather die under the tomahawk of the red skin, than procure a peace by an act of treachery."

The Indian paused; cold, calm looks of intelligence passed between him and his followers, and a few indistinct and guttural sentences were exchanged among themselves.

"But our father asks not why our mocassins have brushed the dew from off the common," resumed the chief; "and yet it is long since the Saganaw and the red skin have spoken to each other, except through the war whoop. My father must wonder to see the great chief of the Ottawas without the hatchet in his hand."

"The hatchet often wounds those who use it unskillfully," calmly returned the governor. "The Saganaw is not blind. The Ottawas and the other tribes find the war paint heavy on their skins. They see that my young men are not to be conquered, and they have sent the great head of all the nations to sue for peace."

In spite of the habitual reserve and self-possession of his race, the haughty warrior could not repress a movement of impatience at the bold and taunting language of his enemy, and for a moment there was a fire in his eye that told how willingly he would have washed away the insult in his blood. The same low guttural exclamations that had previously escaped their lips, marked the sense entertained of the remark by his companions.

"My father is right," pursued the chief, resuming his self-command; "the Ottawas, and the other tribes, ask for peace, but not because they are afraid of war. When they strike the hatchet into the war post, they leave it there until their enemies ask them to take it out."

"Why come they now, then, to ask for peace?" was the cool demand. The warrior hesitated, evidently at a loss to give a reply that could reconcile the palpable contradiction of his words. "The rich furs of our forests have become many," he at length observed, "since we first took up the hatchet against the Saganaw; and every bullet we keep for our enemies is a loss to our trade. We once exchanged furs with the children of our father of the pale flag. They gave us, in return, guns, blankets, powder, ball, and all that the red man requires in the hunting season. These are all expended; and my young men would deal with the Saganaw as they did with the French."

"Good; the red skins would make peace; and although the arm of the Saganaw is strong, he will not turn a deaf ear to their desire."

"All the strong holds of the Saganaw, except two, have fallen before the great chief of the Ottawas!" proudly returned the Indian, with a look of mingled scorn and defiance. "They, too, thought themselves beyond the reach of our tomahawks; but they were deceived. In less than a single moon nine of them have fallen, and the tents of my young warriors are darkened with their scalps; but this is past. If the red skin asks for peace, it is because he is tired of seeing the blood of the Saganaw on his tomahawk. Does my father hear?"

"We will listen to the great chief of the Ottawas, and hear what he has to say," returned the governor, who, as well as the officers at his side, could with difficulty conceal their disgust and sorrow at the dreadful intolerance thus imparted of the fates of their companions. "But peace," he pursued with dignity, "can only be made in the council room, and under the sacred pledge of the calumet. The great chief has a wampum belt on his shoulder, and a calumet in his hand. His aged warriors, too, are at his side. What says the Ottawa? Will he enter? If so, the gate of the Saganaw shall be open to him." The warrior started; and for a moment the confidence that had hitherto distinguished him seemed to give place to an apprehension of meditated treachery. He, however, speedily recovered himself, and observed emphatically, "It is the great head of all the nations whom my father invites to the council seat. Were he to remain in the hands of the Saganaw, his young men would lose their strength. They would bury the hatchet for ever in despair, and hide their faces in the laps of their women."

"Does the Ottawa chief see the pale flag on the strong hold of his enemies. While that continues to fly, he is safe as if he were under the cover of his own wigwam. If the Saganaw could use guile like the fox," (and this was said with marked emphasis), "what should prevent him from cutting off the Ottawa and his chiefs, even where they now stand?" A half smile of derision passed over the dark cheek of the Indian. "If the arm of an Ottawa is strong," he said, "his foot is not less swift. The short guns of the chiefs of the Saganaw" (pointing to the pistols of the officers) "could not reach us; and before the voice of our father could be raised, or his eye turned, to call his warriors to his side, the Ottawa would be already far on his way to the forest."

"The great chief of the Ottawas shall judge better of the Saganaw," returned the governor. "He shall see that his young men are ever watchful at their posts:—Up, men, and show yourselves." A second or two sufficed to bring the whole of Captain Erskine's company, who had been lying flat on their faces, to their feet on the rampart. The Indians were evidently taken by surprise, though they evinced no fear. The low and guttural "ugh!" was the only expression they gave to their astonishment, not unmingled with admiration.

But, although the chiefs preserved their presence of mind, the sudden appearance of the soldiers had excited alarm among their warriors, who, grouped in and around the bomb-proof, were watching every movement of the conferring parties, with an interest proportioned to the risk they conceived their head men had incurred in venturing under the very walls of their enemies. Fierce yells were uttered; and more than a hundred dusky warriors, brandishing their tomahawks in air, leaped along the skirt of the common, evidently only awaiting the signal of their great chief, to advance and cover his retreat. At the command of the governor, however, the men had again suddenly disappeared from the surface of the rampart; so that when the Indians finally perceived their leader stood unharmed and unmolested, on the spot he had previously occupied, the excitement died away, and they once more assumed their attitude of profound attention.

"What thinks the great chief of the Ottawas now?" asked the governor;—"did he imagine that the young white men lie sleeping like beavers in their dams, when the hunter sets his traps to catch them?—did he imagine that they foresee not the designs of their enemies? and that they are not always on the watch to prevent them?"

"My father is a great warrior," returned the Indian; "and if his arm is full of strength, his head is full of wisdom. The chiefs will no longer hesitate;—they will enter the strong hold of the Saganaw, and sit with him in the council." He next addressed a few words, and in a language not understood by those upon the walls, to one of the younger of the Indians. The latter acknowledged his sense and approbation of what was said to him by an assent and expressive "ugh!" which came from his chest without any apparent emotion of the lips, much in the manner of a modern ventriloquist. He then hastened, with rapid and lengthened boundings, across the common towards his band. After the lapse of a minute or two from reaching them, another simultaneous cry arose, differing in expression from any that had hitherto been heard. It was one denoting submission to the will, and compliance with some conveyed desire, of their superior.

"Is the gate of the Saganaw open?" asked the latter, as soon as his ear had been greeted with the cry we have just named. "The Ottawa and the other great chiefs are ready;—their hearts are bold, and they throw themselves into the hands of the Saganaw without fear."

"The Ottawa chief knows the path," drily rejoined the governor: "when he comes in peace, it is ever open to him; but when his young men press it with the tomahawk in their hands, the big thunder is roused to anger, and they are scattered away like the leaves of the forest in the storm. Even now," he pursued, as the little band of Indians moved slowly round the walls, "the gate of the Saganaw opens for the Ottawa and the other chiefs."

"Let the most vigilant caution be used every where along the works, but especially in the rear," continued the governor, addressing Captain Blessington, on whom the duty of the day had devolved. "We are safe, while their chiefs are with us; but still it will be necessary to watch the forest closely. We cannot be too much on our guard. The men had better remain concealed, every twentieth file only standing up to form a look-out chain. If any movement of a suspicious nature be observed, let it be communicated by the discharge of a single musket, that the drawbridge may be raised on the instant." With the delivery of these brief instructions he quitted the rampart with the majority of his officers. Meanwhile, hasty preparations had been made in the mess-room to receive the chiefs. The tables had been removed, and a number of clean rush mats, manufactured after the Indian manner, into various figures and devices, spread carefully upon the floor. At the further end from the entrance was placed a small table and chair, covered with scarlet cloth. This was considerably elevated above the surface of the floor, and intended for the governor. On either side of the room near these, were ranged a number of chairs for the accommodation of the inferior officers.

Major Blackwater received the chiefs at the gate. With a firm, proud step, rendered more confident by his very unwillingness to betray any thing like fear, he tall, and, as Captain Erskine had justly designated him, the noble-looking Pontec trod the yielding planks that might in the next moment cut him off from his people for ever. The other chiefs, following the example of their leader, evinced the same easy fearlessness of demeanour, nor glanced once behind them to see if there was any thing to justify the apprehension of hidden danger.

The Ottawa was evidently mortified at not being received by the governor in person. "My father is not here!" he said fiercely to the major:—"how is this? The Ottawa and the other chiefs are kings of all their tribes. The head of one great people should be received only by the head of another great people!"

"Our father sits in the council-hall," returned the major. "He has taken his seat that he may receive the warriors with becoming honour. But I am the second chief, and our father has sent me to receive them." To the proud spirit of the Indian this explanation scarcely sufficed. For a moment he seemed to struggle, as if endeavouring to stifle his keen sense of an affront put upon him. At length he nodded his head haughtily and condescendingly, in token of assent; and gathering up his noble form, and swelling out his chest, as if with a view to strike terror as well as admiration into the hearts of those by whom he expected to be surrounded, stalked majestically forward at the head of his confederates.

An indifferent observer, or one ignorant of these people, would have been at fault; but those who understood the workings of an Indian's spirit could not have been deceived by the tranquil exterior of these men. The rapid, keen, and lively glance—the suppressed sneer of exultation—the half start of surprise—the low, guttural, and almost inaudible “ugh!”—all these indicated the eagerness with which, at one shy but compendious view, they embraced the whole interior of a fort which it was of such vital importance to their future interests they should become possessed of, yet which they had so long and so unsuccessfully attempted to subdue. As they advanced into the square, they looked around, expecting to behold the full array of their enemies; but, to their astonishment, not a soldier was to be seen. A few women and children only, in whom curiosity had overcome a natural loathing and repugnance to the savages, were peeping from the windows of the block-houses. Even at a moment like the present, the fierce instinct of these latter was not to be controlled. One of the children, terrified at the wild appearance of the warriors, screamed violently, and clung to the bosom of its mother for protection. Fired at the sound, a young chief raised his hand to his lips, and was about to peal forth his terrible war whoop in the very centre of the fort, when the eye of the Ottawa suddenly arrested him.

CHAPTER XIV.

There were few forms of courtesy observed by the warriors towards the English officers on entering the council room. Pontac, who had collected all his native haughtiness into one proud expression of look and figure, strode in without taking the slightest notice even of the governor. The other chiefs imitated his example, and all took their seats upon the matting in the order prescribed by their rank among the tribes, and their experience in council. The Ottawa chief sat at the near extremity of the room, and immediately facing the governor. A profound silence was observed for some minutes after the Indians had seated themselves, during which they proceeded to fill their pipes. The handle of that of the Ottawa chief was decorated with numerous feathers fancifully disposed.

“This is well,” at length observed the governor. “It is long since the great chiefs of the nations have smoked the sweet grass in the council hall of the Saganaw. What have they to say, that their young men may have peace to hunt the beaver, and to leave the print of their moccasins in the country of the buffalo?—What says the Ottawa chief?”

“The Ottawa chief is a great warrior,” returned the other, haughtily; and again repudiating, in the indomitableness of his pride, the very views that a more artful policy had first led him to avow. “He has already said that, within a single moon, nine of the strong holds of the Saganaw have fallen into his hands, and that the scalps of the white men fill the tents of his warriors. If the red skins wish for peace, it is because they are sick with spilling the blood of their enemies. Does my father hear?”

“The Ottawa has been cunning, like the fox,” calmly returned the governor. “He went with deceit upon his lips, and said to the great chiefs of the strong holds of the Saganaw,—‘You have no more forts upon the lakes; they have all fallen before the red skins: they gave themselves into our hands; and we spared their lives, and sent them down to the great towns near the salt lake.’ But this was false: the chiefs of the Saganaw believing what was said to them, gave up their strong holds; but their lives were not spared, and the grass of the Canadas is yet moist with their blood. Does the Ottawa hear?”

A amazement and stupefaction sat for a moment on the features of the Indians. The fact was as had been stated; and yet, so completely had the several forts been cut off from all communication, it was deemed almost impossible one could have received tidings of the fate of the other, unless conveyed through the Indians themselves.

“The spies of the Saganaw have been very quick to escape the vigilance of the red skins,” at length replied the Ottawa; “yet they have returned with a lie upon their lips. I swear by the Great Spirit, that nine of the strong holds of the Saganaw have been destroyed. How could the Ottawa go with deceit upon his lips, when his words were truth?”

“When the red skins said so to the warriors of the last forts they took, they said true; but when they went to the first, and said that all the rest had fallen, they used deceit. A great nation should overcome their enemies like warriors, and not seek to beguile them with their tongues under the edge of the scalping knife!”

“Why did the Saganaw come into the country of the red skins?” haughtily demanded the chief. “Why did they take our hunting grounds from us? Why have they strong places encircling the country of the Indians, like a belt of wampum round the waist of a warrior?”

“This is not true,” rejoined the governor. “It was not the Saganaw, but the warriors of the pale flag, who first came and took away the hunting grounds, and built the strong places. The great father of the Saganaw had beaten the great father of the pale flag quite out of the Canadas, and he sent his young men to take their place and to make peace with the red skins, and to trade with them, and to call them brothers.”

“The Saganaw was false,” retorted the Indian. “When a chief of the Saganaw came for the first time with his warriors into the country of the Ottawas, the chief of the Ottawas stood in his path, and asked him why, and from whom, he came? That chief was a bold warrior, and his heart was open, and the Ottawa liked him; and when he said he came to be friendly with the red skins, the Ottawa believed him, and he shook him by the hand, and said to his young men, ‘Touch not the life of a Saganaw; for their chief is the friend of the Ottawa chief, and his young men shall be the friends of the red warriors.’ Look,” he proceeded, marking his sense of the discovery by another of those ejaculatory “ughs!” so expressive of surprise in an Indian, “at the right hand of my father I see a chief,” pointing to Captain Erskine, “who came with those of the Saganaw who first entered the country of the Detroit;—ask that chief if what the Ottawa says is not true. When the Saganaw said he came only to remove the warriors of the pale flag, that he might be friendly and trade with the red skins, the Ottawa received the belt of wampum he offered, and smoked the pipe of peace with him, and he made his men bring bags of parched corn to his warriors who wanted food, and he sent to all the nations on the lakes, and said to them, ‘The Saganaw must pass unhurt to the strong hold on the Detroit.’ But for the Ottawas, not a Saganaw would have escaped; for the nations were thirsting for their blood, and the knives of the warriors were eager to open their scalps. Ask the chief who sits at the right hand of my father,” he again energetically repeated, “if what the Ottawa says is not true.”

“What the Ottawa says is true,” rejoined the governor; “for the chief who sits on my right hand has often said that, but for the Ottawas, the small number of the warriors of the Saganaw must have been cut off; and his heart is big with kindness to the Ottawas for what he did. But if the great chief meant to be friendly, why did he declare war after smoking the pipe of peace with the Saganaw? Why did he destroy the wigwams of the settlers, and carry off the scalps even of their weak women and children? All this has the Ottawa done; and yet he says that he wished to be friendly with my young men. But the Saganaw is not a fool. He knows the Ottawa chief had no will of his own. On the right hand of the Ottawa sits the great chief of the Delawares, and on his left the great chief of the Shawanees. They have long been the sworn enemies of the Saganaw; and they came from the rivers that run near the salt lake to stir up the red skins of the Detroit to war. They whispered wicked words in the ear of the Ottawa chief, and he determined to take up the bloody hatchet. This is a shame to a great warrior. The Ottawa was a king over all the tribes in the country of the fresh lakes, and yet he weakly took council like a woman from another.”

“My father lies!” fiercely retorted the warrior, half springing to his feet, and involuntarily putting his hand upon his tomahawk. “If the settlers of the Saganaw have fallen,” he resumed in a calmer tone, while he again sank upon his mat, “it is because they did not keep their faith with the red skins. When they came weak, and were not yet secure in their strong holds, their tongues were smooth and full of soft words; but when they became strong under the protection of their thunder, they no longer treated the red skins as their friends, and they laughed at them for letting them come into their country. “But,” he pursued, elevating his voice, “the Ottawa is a great chief, and he will be respected.” Then adverting in bitterness to the influence supposed to be exercised over him—“What my father has said is false. The Shawanees and the Delawares are great nations; but the Ottawas are greater than any, and their chiefs are full of wisdom. The Shawanees and the Delawares had no talk with the Ottawa chief to make him do what his own wisdom did not tell him.”

“Then, if the talk came not from the Shawanees and the Delawares, it came from the spies of the warriors of the pale flag. The great father of the French was angry with the great father of the Saganaw, because he conquered his warriors in many battles; and he sent wicked men to whisper lies of the Saganaw into the ears of the red skins, and to make them take up the hatchet against them. There is a tall spy at this moment in the camp of the red skins,” he pursued with earnestness, and yet paling as he spoke. “It is said he is the bosom friend of the great chief of the Ottawas. But I will not believe it. The head of a great nation would not be the friend of a spy—of one who is baser than a dog. His people would despise him; and they would say, ‘Our chief is not fit to sit in council, or to make war; for he is led by the word of a pale face who is without honour.’”

The swarthy cheek of the Indian reddened, and his eye kindled into fire. “There is no spy, but a great warrior in the camp of the Ottawas,” he fiercely replied. “Though he came from the country that lies beyond the salt lake, he is now a chief of the red skins, and his arm is mighty, and his heart is big. Would my father know why he has become a chief of the Ottawas?” he pursued with scornful exultation. “When the strong holds of the Saganaw fell, the tomahawk of the ‘white warrior’ drank more blood than that of a red skin, and his tent is hung round with poles bending under the weight of the scalps he has taken. When the great chief of the Ottawas dies, the pale face will lead his warriors, and take the first seat in the council. The Ottawa chief is his friend.”

“If the pale face be the friend of the Ottawa,” pursued the governor, in the hope of obtaining some particular intelligence in regard to this terrible and mysterious being, “why is he not here to sit in council with the chiefs? Perhaps,” he proceeded tauntingly, as he fancied he perceived a disinclination on the part of the Indian to account for the absence of the warrior, “the pale face is not worthy to take his place among the head men of the council. His arm may be strong like that of a warrior, but his head may be weak like that of a woman; or, perhaps, he is ashamed to show himself before the pale faces, who have turned him out of their tribe.”

“My father lies!” again unceremoniously retorted the warrior. “If the friend of the Ottawa is not here, it is because his voice cannot speak. Does my father recollect the bridge on which he killed his young warrior? Does he recollect the terrible chase of the pale face by the friend of the Ottawa? Ugh!” he continued, as his attention was now diverted to another object of interest, “that pale face was swifter than any runner among the red skins, and for his fleetness he deserved to live to be a great hunter in the Canadas; but fear broke his heart—fear of the friend of the Ottawa chief. The red skins saw him fall at the feet of the Saganaw without life, and they saw the young warriors bear him off in their arms. Is not the Ottawa right?” The Indian paused, threw his eye rapidly along the room, and then, fixing it on the governor, seemed to wait with deep but suppressed interest for his reply.

“Peace to the bones of a brave warrior!” seriously and evasively returned the governor: “the pale face is no longer in the land of the Canadas, and the young warriors of the Saganaw are sorry for his loss; but what would the Ottawa say of the bridge? and what has the pale warrior, the friend of the Ottawa, to do with it?”

A gleam of satisfaction pervaded the countenance of the Indian, as he eagerly bent his ear to receive the assurance that the fugitive was no more; but when allusion was again made to the strange warrior, his brow became overcast, and he replied with mingled haughtiness and anger,—“Does my father ask? He has dogs of spies among the settlers of the pale flag, but the tomahawk of the red skins will find them out, and they shall perish even as the Saganaw themselves. Two nights ago, when the warriors of the Ottawas were returning from their scout upon the common, they heard the voice of Onondato, the great wolf-dog of the friend of the Ottawa chief. The voice came from the bridge where the Saganaw killed his young warrior, and it called upon the red skins for assistance. My young men gave their war cry, and ran like wild deer to destroy the enemies of their chief; but when they came the spies had fled, and the voice of Onondato was low and weak as that of a new fawn; and when the warriors came to the other end of the bridge, they found the pale chief lying across the road and covered over with blood. They thought he was dead, and their cry was terrible; for the pale warrior is a great chief, and the Ottawas love him; but when they looked again, they saw that the blood was the blood of Onondato, whose throat the spies of the Saganaw had cut, that he might not hunt them and give them to the tomahawk of the red skins."

Frequent glances, expressive of their deep interest in the announcement of this intelligence, passed between the governor and his officers. It was clear the party who had encountered the terrible warrior of the Fleur de lis were not spies (for none were employed by the garrison), but their adventurous companions who had so recently quitted them. This was put beyond all doubt by the night, the hour, and the not less important fact of the locality; for it was from the bridge described by the Indian, near which the Canadian had stated his canoe to be chained, they were to embark on their perilous and uncertain enterprise. The question of their own escape from danger in this unlooked for collision with so powerful and ferocious an enemy, and of the fidelity of the Canadian, still remained involved in doubt, which it might be imprudent, if not dangerous, to seek to have resolved by any direct remark on the subject to the keen and observant warrior. The governor removed this difficulty by artfully observing,—"The great chief of the Ottawas has said they were the spies of the Saganaw who killed the pale warrior. His young men have found them, then; or how could he know they were spies?"

"Is there a warrior among the Saganaw who dares to show himself in the path of the red skins, unless he come in strength and surrounded by his thunder?" was the sneering demand. "But my father is wrong if he supposes the friend of the Ottawa is killed. No," he pursued fiercely, "the dogs of spies could not kill him; they were afraid to face so terrible a warrior. They came behind him in the dark, and they struck him on the head like cowards and foxes as they were. The warrior of the pale face, and the friend of the Ottawa chief, is sick, but not dead. He lies without motion in his tent, and his voice cannot speak to his friend to tell him who were his enemies, that he may bring their scalps to hang up within his wigwam. But the great chief will soon be well, and his arm will be stronger than ever to spill the blood of the Saganaw as he has done before."

"The talk of the Ottawa chief is strange," returned the governor, emphatically and with dignity. "He says he comes to smoke the pipe of peace with the Saganaw, and yet he talks of spilling their blood as if it was water from the lake. What does the Ottawa mean?" "Ugh!" exclaimed the Indian, in his surprise. "My father is right, but the Ottawa and the Saganaw have not yet smoked together. When they have, the hatchet will be buried for ever. Until then, they are still enemies."

During this long and important colloquy of the leading parties, the strictest silence had been preserved by the remainder of the council. The inferior chiefs had continued deliberately puffing the smoke from their curled lips, as they sat cross-legged on their mats, and nodding their heads at intervals in confirmation of the occasional appeal made by the rapid glance of the Ottawa, and uttering their guttural "Ugh!" whenever any observation of the parlant parties touched their feelings, or called forth their surprise. The officers had been no less silent and attentive listeners, to a conversation on the issue of which hung so many dear and paramount interests. A pause in the conference gave them an opportunity of commenting in a low tone on the communication made, in the strong excitement of his pride, by the Ottawa chief, in regard to the terrible warrior of the Fleur de lis; who, it was evident, swayed the councils of the Indians, and consequently exercised an influence over the ultimate destinies of the English, which it was impossible to contemplate without alarm. It was evident to all, from whatsoever cause it might arise, this man cherished a rancour towards certain individuals in the fort, inducing an anxiety in its reduction scarcely equalled by that entertained on the part of the Indians themselves. Beyond this, however, all was mystery and doubt; nor had any clue been given to enable them to arrive even at a well founded apprehension of the motives which had given birth to the vindictiveness of purpose, so universally ascribed to him even by the savages themselves.

The chiefs also availed themselves of this pause in the conversation of the principals, to sustain a low and animated discussion. Those of the Shawnee and Delaware nations were especially earnest; and, as they spoke across the Ottawa, betrayed, by their vehemence of gesture, the action of some strong feeling upon their minds, the precise nature of which could not be ascertained from their speech at the opposite extremity of the room. The Ottawa did not deign to join in their conversation, but sat smoking his pipe in all the calm and forbidding dignity of a proud Indian warrior conscious of his own importance.

"Does the great chief of the Ottawas, then, seek for peace in his heart at length?" resumed the governor; "or is he come to the strong hold of Detroit, as he went to the other strong holds, with deceit on his lips?" The Indian slowly removed the pipe from his mouth, fixed his keen eye searchingly on that of the questioner for nearly a minute, and then briefly and haughtily said, "The Ottawa chief has spoken."

"And do the great chiefs of the Shawnees, and the great chiefs of the Delawares, and the great chiefs of the other nations, ask for peace also?" demanded the governor. "If so, let them speak for themselves, and for their warriors."

We will not trespass on the reader by a transcript of the declarations of the inferior chiefs. Each in his turn avowed motives similar to those of the Ottawa for wishing the hatchet might be buried for ever, and that their young men should mingle once more in confidence, not only with the English troops, but with the settlers, who would again be brought into the country at the cessation of hostilities. When each had spoken, the Ottawa passed the pipe of ceremony, with which he was provided, to the governor. The latter put it to his lips, and commenced smoking. The Indians keenly, and half furtively, watched the act; and looks of deep intelligence, that escaped not the notice of the equally anxious and observant officers, passed among them.

"The pipe of the great chief of the Ottawas smokes well," calmly remarked the governor; "but the Ottawa chief, in his hurry to come and ask for peace, has made a mistake. The pipe and all its ornaments are red like blood: it is the pipe of war, and not the pipe of peace. The great chief of the Ottawas will be angry with himself; he has entered the strong hold of the Saganaw, and sat in the council, without doing any good for his young men. The Ottawa must come again."

A deep but subdued expression of disappointment passed over the features of the chiefs. They watched the countenances of the officers, to see whether the substitution of one pipe for the other had been attributed, in their estimation, to accident or design. There was nothing, however, to indicate the slightest doubt of their sincerity.

"My father is right," replied the Indian, with an appearance of embarrassment, which, whether natural or feigned, had nothing suspicious in it. "The great chief of the Ottawas has been foolish, like an old woman. The young chiefs of his tribe will laugh at him for this. But the Ottawa chief will come again, and the other chiefs with him, for, as my father sees, they all wish for peace; and that my father may know all the nations wish for peace, as well as their head men, the warriors of the Ottawa, and of the Shawnee, and of the Delaware, shall play at ball upon the common, to amuse his young men, while the chiefs sit in council with the chiefs of the Saganaw. The red skins shall come naked, and without their rifles and their tomahawks; and even the squaws of the warriors shall come upon the common, to show the Saganaw they may be without fear. Does my father hear?"

"The Ottawa chief says well," returned the governor; "but will the pale friend of the Ottawa come also to take his seat in the council hall? The great chief has said the pale warrior has become the second chief among the Ottawas; and that when he is dead, the pale warrior will lead the Ottawas, and take the first seat in the council. He, too, should smoke the pipe of peace with the Saganaw, that they may know he is no longer their enemy."

The Indian hesitated, uttering merely his quick ejaculatory "Ugh!" in expression of his surprise at so unexpected a requisition. "The pale warrior, the friend of the Ottawa, is very sick," he at length said; "but if the Great Spirit should give him back his voice before the chiefs come again to the council, the pale face will come too. If my father does not see him then, he will know the friend of the Ottawa chief is very sick."

The governor deemed it prudent not to press the question too closely, lest in so doing he should excite suspicion, and defeat his own object. "When will the Ottawa and the other chiefs come again?" he asked; "and when will their warriors play at ball upon the common, that the Saganaw may see them and be amused?" "When the sun has travelled so many times," replied Pontecac, holding up three fingers of his left hand. "Then will the Ottawa and the other chiefs bring their young warriors and their women."

"It is too soon," was the reply; "the Saganaw must have time to collect their presents, that they may give them to the young warriors who are swiftest in the race, and the most active at the ball. The great chief of the Ottawas, too, must let the settlers of the pale flag, who are the friends of the red skins, bring in food for the Saganaw, that a great feast may be given to the chiefs, and to the warriors, and that the Saganaw may make peace with the Ottawas and the other nations as becomes a great people. In twice so many days," holding up three of his fingers in imitation of the Indian, "the Saganaw will be ready to receive the chiefs in council, that they may smoke the pipe of peace, and bury the hatchet for ever. What says the great chief of the Ottawas?"

"It is good," was the reply of the Indian, his eye lighting up with deep and exulting expression. "The settlers of the pale flag shall bring food to the Saganaw. The Ottawa chief will send them, and he will desire his young men not to prevent them. In so many days, then," indicating with his fingers, "the great chiefs will sit again in council with the Saganaw, and the Ottawa chief will not be a fool to bring the pipe he does not want."

With this assurance the conference terminated. Pontecac raised his tall frame from the mat on which he had been squatted, nodded condescendingly to the governor, and strode haughtily into the square or area of the fort. The other chiefs followed his example; and to Major Blackwater was again assigned the duty of accompanying them without the works. The glance of the savages, and that of Pontecac in particular, was less wary than at their entrance. Each seemed to embrace every object on which the eye could rest, as if to fix its position indelibly in his memory. The young chief, who had been so suddenly and opportunely checked while in the very act of peeling forth his terrible war whoop, again looked up at the windows of the block-house, in quest of those whom his savage instinct had already devoted in intention to his tomahawk, but they were no longer there. Such was the silence that reigned every where, the fort appeared to be tenanted only by the few men of the guard, who lingered near their stations, attentively watching the Indians, as they passed towards the gate. A very few minutes sufficed to bring the latter once more in the midst of their warriors, whom, for a few moments, they harangued earnestly, when the whole body again moved off in the direction of their encampment.

CHAPTER V.

The week that intervened between the visit of the chiefs and the day appointed for their second meeting in council, was passed by the garrison in perfect freedom from alarm, although, as usual, in diligent watchfulness and preparations for casualties. In conformity with his promise, the Indian had despatched many of the Canadian settlers, with such provisions as the country then afforded, to the governor, and these, happy to obtain the gold of the troops in return for what they could conveniently spare, were not slow in availing themselves of the permission. Dried bear's meat, venison, and Indian corn, composed the substance of these supplies, which were in sufficient abundance to produce a six weeks' increase to the stock of the garrison. Hitherto they had been subsisting, in a great degree, upon salt provisions; the food furtively supplied by the Canadians being necessarily, from their dread of detection, on so limited a scale, that a very small portion of the troops had been enabled to profit by it. This, therefore, was an important and unexpected benefit, derived from the filling in of the garrison with the professed views of the savages; and one which, perhaps, few officers would, like Colonel de Haldimar, have possessed the forethought to have secured. But although it served to relieve the animal wants of the men, there was little to remove his moral inquietude. Discouraged by the sanguinary character of the warfare in which they seemed doomed to be for ever engaged, and harassed by constant watchings,—seldom taking off their clothes for weeks together,—the men had gradually been losing their energy of spirit, in the contemplation of the almost irremediable evils by which they were beset; and looked forward with sad and disheartening conviction to a fate, that all things tended to prove to them was unavoidable, however the period of its consummation might be protracted. Among the officers, this dejection, although proceeding from a different cause, was no less prevalent; and notwithstanding they sought to disguise it before their men, when left to themselves, they gave unlimited rein to a despondency hourly acquiring strength, as the day fixed on for the second council with the Indians drew near.

At length came that terrible and eventful day, and, as if in mockery of those who saw beauty in its golden beams, arrayed in all the gorgeous softness of its autumnal glory. Sad and heavy were the hearts of many within that far distant and isolated fort, as they rose, at the first glimmering of light above the horizon, to prepare for the several duties assigned them. All felt the influence of a feeling that laid prostrate the moral energies even of the boldest: but there was one young officer in particular, who exhibited a dejection, degenerating almost into stupor; and more than once, when he received an order from his superior, hesitated as one who either heard not, or, in attempting to perform it, mistook the purport of his instructions, and executed some entirely different duty. The countenance of this officer, whose attenuated person otherwise bore traces of languor and debility, but too plainly marked the abstractedness and terror of his mind, while the set stiff features and contracted muscles of the face contributed to give an expression of vacuity, that one who knew him not might have interpreted unfavourably. Several times, during the inspection of his company at the early parade, he was seen to raise his head, and throw forward his ear, as if expecting to catch the echo of some horrible and appalling cry, until the men themselves remarked, and commented, by interchange of looks, on the singular conduct of their officer, whose thoughts had evidently no connection with the duty he was performing, or the spot on which he stood.

When this customary inspection had been accomplished,—how imperfectly, has been seen,—and the men dismissed from their ranks, the same young officer was observed, by one who followed his every movement with interest, to ascend that part of the rampart which commanded an unbroken view of the country westward, from the point where the encampment of the Indians was supposed to lie, down to the bridge on which the terrible tragedy of Halloway's death had been so recently enacted. Unconscious of the presence of two sentinels, who moved to and fro near their respective posts, on either side of him, the young officer folded his arms, and gazed in that direction for some minutes, with his whole soul riveted on the scene. Then, as if overcome by recollections called up by that on which he gazed, he covered his eyes hurriedly with his hands, and betrayed, by the convulsed movement of his slender form, he was weeping bitterly. This paroxysm past, he uncovered his face, sank with one knee upon the ground, and, upraising his clasped hands, as if in appeal to his God, seemed to pray deeply and fervently. In this attitude he continued for some moments, when he became sensible of the approach of an intruder. He raised himself from his knee, turned, and beheld one whose countenance was stamped with a dejection scarcely inferior to his own. It was Captain Blessington.

"Charles, my dear Charles!" exclaimed the latter hurriedly, as he laid his hand upon the shoulder of the emaciated De Haldimar, "consider you are not alone. For God's sake, check this weakness! There are men observing you on every side, and your strange manner has already been the subject of remark in the company."

"When the heart is sick, like mine," replied the youth, in a tone of fearful despondency, "it is alike reckless of forms, and careless of appearances. I trust, however," and here spoke the soldier, "there are few within this fort who will believe me less courageous, because I have been seen to bend my knee in supplication to my God. I did not think that you, Blessington, would have been the first to condemn the act."

"I condemn it, Charles! you mistake me, indeed you do," feelingly returned his captain, secretly pained at the mild reproach contained in the concluding sentence; "but there are two things to be considered. In the first instance, the men, who are yet in ignorance of the great evils with which we are threatened, may mistake the cause of your agitation; you were in tears just now, Charles, and the sentinels must have remarked it as well as myself. I would not have them to believe that one of their officers was affected by the anticipation of coming disaster, in a way their own hearts are incapable of estimating. You understand me, Charles? I would not have them too much discouraged by an example that may become infectious."

"I do understand you, Blessington," and a forced and sickly smile played for a moment over the wan yet handsome features of the young officer; "you would not have me appear a weeping coward in their eyes."

"Nay, dear Charles, I did not say it."
"But you meant it, Blessington; yet, think not,"—and he warmly pressed the hand of his captain,—“think not, I repeat, I take your hint in any other than the friendly light in which it was intended. That I have been no coward, however, I hope I have given proof more than once before the men, most of whom have known me from my very cradle; yet, whatever they may think, is to me, at this moment, a matter of utter indifference. Blessington,” and again the tears rolled from his fixed eyes over his cheek, while he pointed with his finger to the western horizon, “I have neither thought nor feeling for myself; my whole heart lies buried there. Oh, God of Heaven!” he pursued, after a pause, and again raising his eyes in supplication, “avert the dreadful destiny that awaits my beloved sister.”

"Charles, Charles, if only for that sister's sake, then, calm an agitation which, if thus indulged in, will assuredly destroy you. All will yet be well. The delay obtained by your father has been sufficient for the purpose proposed. Let us hope for the best: if we are deceived in our expectation, it will then be time enough to indulge in a grief, which could scarcely be exceeded, were the fearful misgivings of your mind to be realised before your eyes."

"Blessington," returned the young officer,—and his features exhibited the liveliest image of despair,—“all hope has long since been extinct within my breast. See you yon theatre of death?” he mournfully pursued, pointing to the fatal bridge, which was thrown into full relief against the placid bosom of the Detroit: “recollect you the scene that was acted on it? As for me, it is ever present to my mind,—it haunts me in my thoughts by day, and in my dreams by night. I shall never forget it while memory is left to curse me with the power of retrospection. On the very spot on which I now stand was I borne in a chair, to witness the dreadful punishment; you see the stone at my feet, I marked it by that. I saw you conduct Halloway to the centre of the bridge; I beheld him kneel to receive his death; I saw, too, the terrible race for life, that interrupted the proceedings; I marked the sudden upspring of Halloway to his feet upon the coffin, and the exulting waving of his hand, as he seemed to recognise the rivals for mastery in that race. Then was heard the fatal volley, and I saw the death-struggle of him who had saved my brother's life. I could have died, too, at that moment; and would to Providence I had! but it was otherwise decreed. My aching interest was, for a moment, diverted by the fearful chase now renewed upon the height; and, in common with those around me, I watched the efforts of the pursuer and the pursued with painful earnestness and doubt as to the final result. Ah, Blessington, why was not this all? The terrible shriek, uttered at the moment when the fugitive fell, apparently dead, at the feet of the firing party, reached us even here. I felt as if my heart must have burst, for I knew it to be the shriek of poor Ellen Halloway,—the suffering wife,—the broken-hearted woman who had so recently in all the wild abandonment of her grief, wetted my pillow, and even my cheek, with her burning tears, while supplicating an intercession with my father for mercy, which I knew it would be utterly fruitless to promise. The discovery of her exchange of clothes with one of the drum boys of the grenadiers was made soon after you left the fort. I saw her leap upon the coffin, and, standing over the body of her unhappy husband, raise her hands to heaven in adjuration, and my heart died within me. I recollected the words she had spoken on a previous occasion, during the first examination of Halloway, and I felt it to be the prophetic denunciation, then threatened, that she was now uttering on all the race of De Haldimar. I saw no more, Blessington. Sick, dizzy, and with every faculty of my mind annihilated, I turned away from the horrid scene, and was again borne to my room."

Captain Blessington was deeply affected; for there was a solemnity in the voice of the young officer that carried conviction to the heart.

The attention of both was diverted by the report of a musket from the rear of the fort. Presently afterwards, the word was passed along the chain of sentinels upon the ramparts, that the Indians were issuing in force from the forest upon the common near the bomb-proof. Then was heard, as the sentinel at the gate delivered the password, the heavy roll of the drum summoning to arms.

"Ha! here already!" said Captain Blessington, as, glancing towards the forest, he beheld the skirt of the wood now alive with dusky human forms: "Pontiac's visit is earlier than we had been taught to expect; but we are as well prepared to receive him now, as later; and, in fact, the sooner the interview is terminated, the sooner we shall know what we have to depend upon. Come, Charles, we must join the company, and let me entreat you to evince less despondency before the men. It is hard, I know, to sustain an artificial character under such disheartening circumstances; still, for example's sake, it must be done."

"What I can I will do, Blessington," rejoined the youth, as they both moved from the ramparts; "but the task is, in truth, one to which I find myself wholly unequal. How do I know that, even at this moment, my defenceless, terrified, and innocent sister may not be invoking the name and arm of her brother to save her from destruction?"

"Trust in Providence, Charles. Even although our worst apprehensions be realised, as I fervently trust they will not, your sister may be spared. The Canadian could not have been unfaithful, or we should have learnt something of his treachery from the Indians. Another week will confirm us in the truth or fallacy of our impressions. Until then, let us arm our hearts with hope. Trust me, we shall yet see the laughing eyes of Clara fill with tears of affection, as I recount to her all her too sensitive and too desponding brother has suffered for her sake."

De Haldimar made no reply. He deeply felt the kind intention of his captain, but was far from cherishing the hope that had been recommended. He sighed heavily, pressed the arm, on which he leaned, in gratitude for the motive, and moved silently with his friend to join their company below the rampart.

CHAPTER XVI.

Meanwhile the white flag had again been raised by the Indians upon the bomb-proof; and this having been readily met by a corresponding signal from the fort, a numerous band of savages now issued from the cover with which their dark forms had hitherto been identified, and spread themselves far and near upon the common. On this occasion they were without arms, offensive or defensive, of any kind, if we may except the knife which was always carried at the girdle, and which constituted a part rather of their necessary dress than of their warlike equipment. These warriors might have been about five hundred in number, and were composed chiefly of picked men from the nations of the Ottawas, the Delawares, and the Shawanees; each race being distinctly recognisable from the others by certain peculiarities of form and feature which individualised, if we may so term it, the several tribes. Their only covering was the legging before described, composed in some instances of cloth, but principally of smoked deer-skin, and the flap that passed through the girdle around the loins, by which the straps attached to the leggings were secured. Their bodies, necks, and arms were, with the exception of a few slight ornaments, entirely naked; and even the blanket, that served them as a couch by night and a covering by day, had, with one single exception, been dispensed with, apparently with a view to avoid any thing like encumbrance in their approaching sport. Each individual was provided with a stout sapling of about three feet in length, curved, and flattened at the root extremity, like that used at the Irish hurdle; which game, in fact, the manner of ball-playing among the Indians in every way resembled.

Interspersed among these warriors were a nearly equal number of squaws. These were to be seen lounging carelessly about in small groups, and were of all ages; from the hoary-headed, shrivelled-up hag, whose eyes still sparkled with a fire that her lank and attenuated frame denied, to the young girl of twelve, whose dark and glowing cheek, rounded bust, and penetrating glance, bore striking evidence of the precociousness of Indian beauty. These latter looked with evident interest on the sports of the younger warriors, who, throwing down their hurdles, either vied with each other in the short but incredibly swift foot-race, or indulged themselves in wrestling and leaping; while their companions, abandoned to the full security they felt to be attached to the white flag waving on the fort, lay at their lazy length upon the sward, ostensibly following the movements of the several competitors in these sports, but in reality with heart and eye directed solely to the fortification that lay beyond. Each of these females, in addition to the moccasins, or petticoat, which in one solid square of broad-cloth was tightly wrapped around the loins, also carried a blanket loosely thrown around the person, but closely confined over the shoulders in front, and reaching below the knee. There was an air of constraint in their movements, which accorded ill with the occasion of festivity for which they were assembled; and it was remarkable, whether it arose from deference to those to whom they were slaves, as well as wives and daughters, or from whatever other cause it might be, none of them ventured to realine themselves upon the sword in imitation of the warriors.

When it had been made known to the governor that the Indians had begun to develop themselves in force upon the common unarmed, yet redolent with the spirit that was to direct their meditated sports, the soldiers were dismissed from their respective companies to the ramparts; where they were now to be seen, not drawn up in formidable and hostile array, but collected together in careless groups, and simply in their side-arms. This reciprocation of confidence on the part of the garrison was acknowledged by the Indians by marks of approbation, expressed as much by the sudden and classic disposition of their fine forms into attitudes strikingly illustrative of their admiration and pleasure, as by the interjectional sounds that passed from one to the other of the throng. From the increased alacrity with which they now lent themselves to the preparatory and inferior amusements of the day, it was evident their satisfaction was complete.

Hitherto the principal chiefs had, as on the previous occasion, occupied the bomb-proof; and now, as then, they appeared to be deliberating among themselves, but evidently in a more energetic and serious manner. At length they separated, when Pontec, accompanied by the chiefs who had attended him on the former day, once more led in the direction of the fort. The moment of his advance was the signal for the commencement of the principal game. In an instant those of the warriors who lay reclining on the sword sprang to their feet, while the wrestlers and racers resumed their hurdles, and prepared themselves for the trial of mingled skill and swiftness. At first they formed a dense group in the centre of the common; and then, diverging in two equal files both to the right and to the left of the immediate centre, where the large ball was placed, formed an open chain, extending from the skirt of the forest to the commencement of the village. On the one side were ranged the Delawares and the Shawanees, and on the other the more numerous nation of the Ottawas. The women of these several tribes, apparently much interested in the issue of an amusement in which the manliness and activity of their respective friends were staked, had gradually and imperceptibly gained the front of the fort, where they were now huddled in groups, at about twenty paces from the draw-bridge, and bending eagerly forward to command the movements of the ball-players.

In his circuit round the walls, Pontec was seen to remark the confiding appearance of the unarmed soldiery with a satisfaction that was not sought to be disguised; and from the manner in which he threw his glance along each face of the rampart, it was evident his object was to embrace the numerical strength collected there. It was moreover observed, when he passed the groups of squaws on his way to the gate, he addressed some words in a strange tongue to the elder matrons of each.

Once more the dark warriors were received at the gate, by Major Blackwater; and, as with firm but elastic tread, they moved across the square, each threw his fierce eyes rapidly and anxiously around, and with less of concealment in his manner than had been manifested on the former occasion. On every hand the same air of nakedness and desertion met their gaze. Not even a soldier of the guard was to be seen; and when they cast their eyes upwards to the windows of the block-houses, they were found to be tenanted as the area through which they passed. A gleam of fierce satisfaction pervaded the swarthy countenances of the Indians; and the features of Pontec, in particular, expressed the deepest exultation. Instead of leading his party, he now brought up the rear; and when arrived in the centre of the fort, he, without any visible cause for the accident, stumbled, and fell to the earth. The other chiefs for a moment lost sight of their ordinary gravity, and marked their sense of the circumstance by a prolonged sound, partaking of the mingled character of a laugh and a yell. Startled at the cry, Major Blackwater, who was in front, turned to ascertain the cause. At that moment Pontec sprang lightly again to his feet, responding to the yell of his confederates by another even more startling, fierce, and prolonged than their own. He then stalked proudly to the head of the party, and even preceded Major Blackwater into the council room.

In this rude theatre of conference some changes had been made since their recent visit, which escaped not the observation of the quick-sighted chiefs. Their mats lay in the position they had previously occupied, and the chairs of the officers were placed as before, but the room itself had been considerably enlarged. The slight partition terminating the interior extremity of the mess-room, and dividing it from that of one of the officers, had been removed; and midway through this, extending entirely across, was drawn a curtain of scarlet cloth, against which the imposing figure of the governor, elevated as his seat was above those of the other officers, was thrown into strong relief. There was another change, that escaped not the observation of the Indians, and that was, not more than one half of the officers who had been present at the first conference being now in the room. Of these latter, one had, moreover, been sent away by the governor the moment the chiefs were ushered in.

"Ugh!" ejaculated the proud leader, as he took his seat unceremoniously, and yet not without reluctance, upon the mat. "The council-room of my father, is bigger than when the Ottawa was here before, yet the number of his chiefs is not so many."

"The great chief of the Ottawas knows that the Saganaw has promised the red skins a feast," returned the governor. "Were he to leave it to his young warriors to provide it, he would not be able to receive the Ottawa like a great chief, and to make peace with him as he could wish."

"My father has a great deal of cloth, red, like the blood of a pale face," pursued the Indian, rather in demand than in observation, as he pointed with his finger to the opposite end of the room. "When the Ottawa was here last, he did not see it."

"The great chief of the Ottawas knows that the great father of the Saganaw has a big heart to make presents to the red skins. The cloth the Ottawa sees there is sufficient to make leggings for the chiefs of all the nations."

Apparently satisfied with this reply, the fierce Indian uttered one of his strong guttural and assentient "ughs," and then commenced filling the pipe of peace, correct on the present occasion in all its ornaments, which was handed to him by the Delaware chief. It was remarked by the officers this operation took up an unusually long portion of his time, and that he frequently turned his ear, like a horse stirred by the huntsman's horn, with quick and irrepressible eagerness towards the door.

"The pale warrior, the friend of the Ottawa chief, is not here," said the governor, as he glanced his eye along the semicircle of Indians. "How is this? Is his voice still sick, that he cannot come; or has the great chief of the Ottawas forgotten to tell him?"

"The voice of the pale warrior is still sick, and he cannot speak," replied the Indian. "The Ottawa chief is very sorry; for the tongue of his friend the pale face is full of wisdom."

Scarcely had the last words escaped his lips, when a wild shrill cry from without the fort rang on the ears of the assembled council, and caused a momentary commotion among the officers. It arose from a single voice, and that voice could not be mistaken by any who had heard it once before. A second or two, during which the officers and chiefs kept their eyes intently fixed on each other, passed anxiously away, and then nearer to the gate, apparently on the very drawbridge itself, was pealed forth the wild and deafening yell of a legion of devilish voices. At that sound, the Ottawa and the other chiefs sprang to their feet, and their own fierce cry responded to that yet vibrating on the ears of all. Already were their gleaming tomahawks brandished wildly over their heads, and Pontec had even bounded a pace forward to reach the governor with the deadly weapon, when at the sudden stamping of the foot of the latter upon the floor, the scarlet cloth in the rear was thrown aside, and twenty soldiers, their eyes glancing along the barrels of their levelled muskets, met the startled gaze of the astonished Indians.

An instant was enough to satisfy the keen chief of the true state of the case. The calm composed mien of the officers, not one of whom had even attempted to quit his seat, amid the din by which his ears were so alarmingly assailed,—the triumphant, yet dignified, and even severe expression of the governor's countenance; and, above all, the unexpected presence of the prepared soldiery,—all these at once assured him of the discovery of his treachery, and the danger that awaited him. The necessity for an immediate attempt to join his warriors without, was now obvious to the Ottawa; and scarcely had he conceived the idea before it was sought to be executed. In a single spring he gained the door of the mess-room, and, followed eagerly and tumultuously by the other chiefs, to whose departure no opposition was offered, in the next moment stood on the steps of the piazza that ran along the front of the building whence he had issued.

The surprise of the Indians on reaching this point was now too powerful to be dissembled; and, incapable either of advancing or receding, they remained gazing on the scene before them with an air of mingled stupefaction, rage, and alarm. Scarcely ten minutes had elapsed since they had proudly strode through the naked area of the fort, and yet, even in that short space of time, its appearance had been entirely changed. Not a part was there now of the surrounding buildings that was not redolent with human life, and hostile preparation. Through every window of the officers' low rooms, was to be seen the dark and frowning muzzle of a field-piece, bearing upon the gateway; and behind these were artillerymen, holding their lighted matches, supported again by files of bayonets, that glittered in their rear. In the block-houses the same formidable array of field-pieces and muskets was visible; while from the four angles of the square, as many heavy guns, that had been artfully masked at the entrance of the chiefs, seemed ready to sweep away every thing that should come before them. The guard-room near the gate presented the same hostile front. The doors of this, as well as of the other buildings, had been firmly secured within; but from every window affording cover to the troops, gleamed a line of bayonets rising above the threatening field-pieces, pointed, at a distance of little more than twelve feet, directly upon the gateway. In addition to his musket, each man of the guard moreover held a hand grenade, provided with a short fuse that could be ignited in a moment from the matches of the gunners, and with immediate effect. The soldiers in the block-houses were similarly provided.

Almost magic as was the change thus suddenly effected in the appearance of the garrison, it was not the most interesting feature in the exciting scene. Choking up the gateway, in which they were completely wedged, and crowding the drawbridge, a dense mass of dusky Indians were to be seen casting their fierce glances around; yet paralysed in their movements by the unlooked-for display of a resisting force, threatening instant annihilation to those who should attempt either to advance or to recede. Never, perhaps, was astonishment and disappointment more forcibly depicted on the human countenance, than as they were now exhibited by these men, who had already, in imagination, secured to themselves an easy conquest. They were the warriors who had so recently been engaged in the manly yet innocent exercise of the ball; but, instead of the harmless hurdle, each now carried a short gun in one hand and a gleaming tomahawk in the other. After the first general yelling heard in the council-room, not a sound was uttered. Their burst of rage and triumph had evidently been checked by the unexpected manner of their reception, and they now stood on the spot on which the further advance of each had been arrested, so silent and motionless, that, but for the rolling of their dark eyes, as they keenly measured the insurmountable barriers that were opposed to their progress, they might almost have been taken for a wild group of statuary.

Conspicuous at the head of these was he who wore the blanket; a tall warrior, on whom rested the startled eye of every officer and soldier who was so situated as to behold him. His face was painted black as death; and as he stood under the arch of the gateway, with his white turbaned head towering far above those of his companions, this formidable and mysterious enemy might have been likened to the spirit of darkness presiding over his terrible legions.

In order to account for the extraordinary appearance of the Indians, armed in every way for death, at a moment when neither gun nor tomahawk was apparently within miles of their reach, it will be necessary to revert to the first entrance of the chiefs into the fort. The fall of Pontec had been the effect of design; and the yell pealed forth by him, on recovering his feet, as if in taunting reply to the laugh of his comrades, was in reality a signal intended for the guidance of the Indians without. These, now following up their game with increasing spirit, at once changed the direction of their line, bringing the ball nearer to the fort. In their eagerness to effect this object, they had overlooked the gradual secession of the unarmed troops, spectators of their sport, from the ramparts, until scarcely more than twenty stragglers were left. As they neared the gate, the squaws broke up their several groups, and, forming a line on either hand of the road leading to the drawbridge, appeared to separate solely with a view not to impede the action of the players. For an instant a dense group collected around the ball, which had been driven to within a hundred yards of the gate, and fifty hurdles were crossed in their endeavours to secure it, when the warrior, who formed the solitary exception to the multitude, in his blanket covering, and who had been lingering in the extreme rear of the party, came rapidly up to the spot where the well-affected struggle was maintained. At his approach, the hurdles of the other players were withdrawn, when, at a single blow from his powerful arm, the ball was seen flying into the air in an oblique direction, and was for a moment lost altogether to the view. When it again met the eye, it was descending perpendicularly into the very centre of the fort.

With the fleetness of thought now commenced a race that had ostensibly for its object the recovery of the lost ball; and in which, he who had driven it with such resistless force, outstripped them all. Their course lay between the two lines of squaws; and scarcely had the head of the bounding Indians reached the opposite extremity of those lines, when the women suddenly threw back their blankets, and disclosed each a short gun and a tomahawk. To throw away their hurdles and seize upon these, was the work of an instant. Already, in imagination, was the fort their own; and, such was the peculiar exultation of the black and turbaned warrior, when he felt the planks of the drawbridge bending beneath his feet, all the ferocious joy of his soul was pealed forth in the terrible cry which, rapidly succeeded by that of the other Indians, had resounded so fearfully through the council room. What their disappointment was, when, on gaining the interior, they found the garrison prepared for their reception, has already been shown.

"Secure that traitor, men!" exclaimed the governor, advancing into the square, and pointing to the black warrior, whose quick eye was now glancing on every side, to discover some available point in the formidable defences of the troops.

A laugh of scorn and derision escaped the lips of the warrior. "Is there a man—are there are ten men, even with Governor de Haldimar at their head, who will be bold enough to attempt it?" he asked. "Nay!" he pursued, stepping boldly a pace or two in front of the wondering savages,—“here I stand singly, and defy your whole garrison!”

A sudden movement among the soldiers in the guard-room announced they were preparing to execute the order of their chief. The eye of the black warrior sparkled with ferocious pleasure; and he made a gesture to his followers, which was replied to by the sudden tension of their hitherto relaxed forms into attitudes of expectance and preparation.

"Stay, men; quit not your cover for your lives!" commanded the governor, in a loud deep voice:—"keep the barricades fast, and move not."

A cloud of anger and disappointment passed over the features of the black warrior. It was evident the object of his bravado was to draw the troops from their defences, that they might be so mingled with their enemies as to render the cannon useless, unless friends and foes (which was by no means probable) should alike be sacrificed. The governor had penetrated the design in time to prevent the mischief.

In a moment of uncontrollable rage, the savage warrior aimed his tomahawk at the head of the governor. The latter stepped lightly aside, and the steel sank with such force into one of the posts supporting the piazza, that the quivering handle snapped close off at its head. At that moment, a single shot, fired from the guard-house, was drowned in the yell of approbation which burst from the lips of the dark crowd. The turban of the warrior was, however, seen flying through the air, carried away by the force of the bullet which had torn it from his head. He himself was unharmed.

"A narrow escape for us both, Colonel de Haldimar," he observed, as soon as the yell had subsided, and with an air of the most perfect unconcern. "Had my tomahawk obeyed the first impulse of my heart, I should have cursed myself and died: as it is, I have reason to avoid all useless exposure of my own life, at present. A second bullet may be better directed; and to die, robbed of my revenge, would ill answer the purpose of a life devoted to its attainment. Remember my pledge!"

At the hasty command of the governor, a hundred muskets were raised to the shoulders of his men; but, before a single eye could glance along the barrel, the formidable and active warrior had bounded over the heads of the nearest Indians into a small space that was left unoccupied; when, stooping suddenly to the earth, he disappeared altogether from the view of his enemies. A slight movement in the centre of the numerous band crowding the gateway, and extending even beyond the bridge, was now discernible: it was like the waving of a field of standing corn, through which some animal rapidly winds its tortuous course, bending aside as the object advances, and closing again when it has passed. After the lapse of a minute, the terrible warrior was seen to spring again to his feet, far in the rear of the band; and then, uttering a force shout of exultation, to make good his retreat towards the forest.

Meanwhile, Pontecac and the other chiefs of the council continued rooted to the piazza on which they had rushed at the unexpected display of the armed men behind the scarlet curtain. The loud "Waugh" that burst from the lips of all, on finding themselves thus foiled in their schemes of massacre, had been succeeded, the instant afterwards, by feelings of personal apprehension, which each, however, had collectedness enough to disguise. Once the Ottawa made a movement as if he would have cleared the space that kept him from his warriors; but the emphatical pointing of the finger of Colonel de Haldimar to the levelled muskets of the men in the block-houses prevented him, and the attempt was not repeated. It was remarked by the officers, who also stood on the piazza, close behind the chiefs, when the black warrior threw his tomahawk at the governor, a shade of displeasure passed over the features of the Ottawa; and that, when he found the daring attempt was not retaliated on his people, his countenance had been momentarily lighted up with a satisfied expression, apparently marking his sense of the forbearance so unexpectedly shown.

"What says the great chief of the Ottawas now?" asked the governor, calmly, and breaking a profound silence that had succeeded to the last fierce yell of the formidable being just departed. "Was the Saganaw not right, when he said the Ottawa came with guile in his heart, and with a lie upon his lips? But the Saganaw is not a fool, and he can read the thoughts of his enemies upon their faces, and long before their lips have spoken."

"Ugh!" ejaculated the Indian; "my father is a great chief, and his head is full of wisdom. Had he been feeble, like the other chiefs of the Saganaw, the strong hold of the Detroit must have fallen, and the red skins would have danced their war dance round the scalps of his young men, even in the council room where they came to talk of peace."

"Does the great chief of the Ottawas see the big thunder of the Saganaw?" pursued the governor: "if not, let him open his eyes and look. The Saganaw has but to move his lips, and swifter than the lightning would the pale faces sweep away the warriors of the Ottawa, even where they now stand: in less time than the Saganaw is now speaking, would they mow them down like the grass of the prairie."

"Ugh!" again exclaimed the chief, with mixed doggedness and fierceness: "if what my father says is true, why does he not pour out his anger upon the red skins?"

"Let the great chief of the Ottawas listen," replied the governor with dignity. "When the great chiefs of all the nations that are in league with the Ottawas came last to the council, the Saganaw knew that they carried deceit in their hearts, and that they never meant to smoke the pipe of peace, or to bury the hatchet in the ground. The Saganaw might have kept them prisoners, that their warriors might be without a head; but he had given his word to the great chief of the Ottawas, and the word of a Saganaw is never broken. Even now, while both the chiefs and the warriors are in his power, he will not slay them, for he wishes to show the Ottawa the desire of the Saganaw is to be friendly with the red skins, and not to destroy them. Wicked men from the Canadas have whispered lies in the ear of the Ottawa; but a great chief should judge for himself, and take council only from the wisdom of his own heart. The Ottawa and his warriors may go," he resumed, after a short pause; "the path by which they came is again open to them. Let them depart in peace; the big thunder of the Saganaw shall not harm them."

The countenance of the Indian, who had clearly seen the danger of his position, wore an expression of surprise which could not be dissembled: low exclamations passed between him and his companions; and, then pointing to the tomahawk that lay half buried in the wood, he said, doubtfully,—

"It was the pale face, the friend of the great chief of the Ottawas, who struck the hatchet at my father. The Ottawa is not a fool to believe the Saganaw can sleep without revenge."

"The great chief of the Ottawas shall know us better," was the reply. "The young warriors of the Saganaw might destroy their enemies where they now stand, but they seek not their blood. When the Ottawa chief takes council from his own heart, and not from the lips of a cowardly dog of a pale face, who strikes his tomahawk and then flies, his wisdom will tell him to make peace with the Saganaw, whose warriors are without treachery, even as they are without fear."

Another of those deep interjectional "ughs" escaped the chest of the proud Indian.

"What my father says is good," he returned; "but the pale face is a great warrior, and the Ottawa chief is his friend." The Ottawa will go."

He then addressed a few sentences, in a tongue unknown to the officers, to the swarthy and anxious crowd in front. These were answered by a low, sullen, yet assentient grunt, from the united band, who now turned, though with justifiable caution and distrust, and recrossed the drawbridge without hindrance from the troops. Pontecac waited until the last Indian had departed, and then making a movement to the governor, which, with all its haughtiness, was meant to mark his sense of the forbearance and good faith that had been manifested, once more stalked proudly and calmly across the area, followed by the remainder of the chiefs. The officers who were with the governor ascended to the ramparts, to follow their movements; and it was not before their report had been made that the Indians were immersing once more into the heart of the forest, the troops were withdrawn from their formidable defences, and the gate of the fort again firmly secured.*

CHAPTER XVII.

While the reader is left to pause over the rapid succession of incidents resulting from the mysterious entrance of the warrior of the Fleur de lis into the English fort, be it our task to explain the circumstances connected with the singular disappearance of Captain de Haldimar, and the melancholy murder of his unfortunate servant.

It will be recollected that the ill-fated Halloway, in the course of his defence before the court martial, distinctly stated the voice of the individual who had approached his post, calling on the name of Captain de Haldimar, on the night of the alarm, to have been that of a female, and that the language in which they subsequently conversed was that of the Ottawa Indians. This was strictly the fact; and the only error into which the unfortunate soldier had fallen, had reference merely to the character and motives of the party. He had naturally imagined, as he had stated, it was some young female of the village, whose attachment for his officer had driven to the desperate determination of seeking an interview; nor was this impression at all weakened by the subsequent discourse of the parties in the Indian tongue, with which it was well known, most of the Canadians, both male and female, were more or less conversant. The subject of that short, low, and hurried conference was, indeed, one that well warranted the singular intrusion; and, in the declaration of Halloway, we have already seen the importance and anxiety attached by the young officer to the communication. Without waiting to repeat the motives assigned for his departure, and the prayers and expostulations to which he had recourse to overcome the determination and sense of duty of the unfortunate sentinel, let us pass at once to the moment when, after having cleared the ditch, conjointly with his faithful follower, in the manner already shown, Captain de Haldimar first stood side by side with his midnight visitant.

The night, it has elsewhere been observed, was clear and starry, so that objects upon the common, such as the rude stump that here and there raised its dark low head above the surface, might be dimly seen in the distance. To obviate the danger of discovery by the sentinels, appeared to be the first study of the female; for, when Captain de Haldimar, followed by his servant, had reached the spot on which she stood, she put the forefinger of one hand to her lips, and with the other pointed to his booted foot. A corresponding signal showed that the lightness of the material offered little risk of betrayal. Donehan, however, was made to doff his heavy ammunition shoes; and, with this precaution, they all stole hastily along, under the shadows of the projecting ramparts, until they had gained the extreme rear. Here the female suddenly raised her tall figure from the stooping position in which she, as well as her companions, had performed the dangerous circuit; and, placing her finger once more significantly on her lips, led in the direction of the bomb-proof, unperceived by the sentinels, most of whom, it is probable, had, up to the moment of the alarm subsequently given, been too much overcome by previous watching and excitement to have kept the most vigilant look out.

Arrived at the skirt of the forest, the little party drew up within the shadow of the ruin, and a short and earnest dialogue ensued, in Indian, between the female and the officer. This was succeeded by a command from the latter to his servant, who, after a momentary but respectful expostulation, which, however, was utterly lost on him to whom it was addressed, proceeded to divest himself of his humble apparel, assuming in exchange the more elegant uniform of his superior. Donellan, who was also of the grenadiers, was remarkable for the resemblance he bore, in figure, to Captain de Haldimar; wanting, it is true, the grace and freedom of movement of the latter, but still presenting an outline which, in an attitude of profound repose, might, as it subsequently did, have set even those who were most intimate with the officer at fault.

"This is well," observed the female, as the young man proceeded to induct himself in the grey coat of his servant, having previously drawn the glazed hat close over his waving and redundant hair; "if the Saganaw is ready, Oucanasta will go."

"Sure, and your honour does not mane to lave me behind!" exclaimed the anxious soldier, as his captain now recommended him to stand closely concealed near the ruin until his return. "Who knows what ambuscade the she-devil may lave your honour into; and thin who will you have to bring you out of it?"

"No, Donellan, it must not be: I first intended it, as you may perceive by my bringing you out; but the expedition on which I am going is of the utmost importance to us all, and too much precaution cannot be taken. I fear no ambuscade, for I can depend on the fidelity of my guide; but the presence of a third person would only embarrass, without assisting me in the least. You must remain behind; the woman insists upon it, and there is no more to be said."

"To ould Nick with the ugly winch, for her pains!" half muttered the disappointed soldier to himself. "I wish it may be as your honour says; but my mind misgives me sadly that evil will come of this. Has your honour secured the pistols?"

"They are here," returned his captain, placing a hand on either chest. "And now, Donellan, mark me: I know nothing that can detain me longer than an hour; at least the woman assures me, and I believe her, that I may be back then; but it is well to guard against accidents. You must continue here for the hour, and for the hour only. If I come not then, return to the fort without delay, for the rope must be removed, and the gate secured, before Halloway is relieved. The keys you will find in the pocket of my uniform: when you have done with them, let them be hung up in their proper place in the guard-room. My father must not know either that Halloway suffered me to pass the gate, or that you accompanied me."

"Lord love us! your honour talks as if you niver would return, g'ving such a heap of orders!" exclaimed the startled man; "but if I go back alone, as I trust in heaven I shall not, how am I to account for being dressed in your honour's rigmintals?"

"I tell you, Donellan," impatiently returned the officer, "that I shall be back; but I only wish to guard against accidents. The instant you get into the fort, you will take off my clothes and resume your own. Who the devil is to see you in the uniform, unless it be Halloway?"

"If the Saganaw would not see the earth red with the blood of his race, he will go," interrupted the female. "Oucanasta can feel the breath of the morning fresh upon her cheek, and the council of the chiefs must be begun."

"The Saganaw is ready, and Oucanasta shall lead the way," hastily returned the officer. "One word more, Donellan," and he pressed the hand of his domestic kindly: "should I not return, you must, without committing Halloway or yourself, cause my father to be apprised that the Indians meditate a deep and treacherous plan to get possession of the fort. What that plan is, I know not yet myself, neither does this woman know; but she says that I shall hear it discussed unseen, even in the heart of their own encampment. All you have to do is to acquaint my father with the existence of danger. And now be cautious: above all things, keep close under the shadow of the bomb-proof; for there are scouts constantly prowling about the common, and the glittering of the uniform in the starlight may betray you."

"But why may I not follow your honour?" again urged the faithful soldier; "and where is the use of my remaining here to count the stars, and hear the 'all's well!' from the fort, when I could be so much better employed in guarding your honour from harm? What sort of protection can that Indian woman afford, who is of the race of our bitterest enemies, them cursed Ottawas, and your honour venturing, too, like a spy into the very heart of the blood-hounds? Ah, Captain de Haldimar, for the love of God, do not trust yourself alone with her, or I am sure I shall never see your honour again!"

The last words (unhappily too prophetic) fell only on the ear of him who uttered them. The female and the officer had already disappeared round an abrupt angle of the bomb-proof; and the soldier, as directed by his master, now drew up his tall figure against the ruin, where he continued for a period immovable, as if he had been planted there in his ordinary character of sentinel, listening, until they eventually died away in distance, to the receding footsteps of his master; and then ruminating on the several apprehensions that crowded on his mind, in regard to the probable issue of his adventurous project.

Meanwhile, Captain de Haldimar and his guide trod the mazes of the forest, with an expedition that proved the latter to be well acquainted with its bearings. On quitting the bomb-proof, she had struck into a narrow winding path, less seen than felt in the deep gloom pervading the wood, and with light steps bounded over obstacles that lay strewn in their course, emitting scarcely more sound than would have been produced by the slimy crawl of its native rattlesnake. Not so, however, with the less experienced tread of her companion. Wanting the pliancy of movement given to it by the light moccasin, the booted foot of the young officer, despite of all his precaution, fell heavily to the ground, producing such a rustling among the dried leaves, that, had an Indian ear been lurking any where around, his approach must inevitably have been betrayed. More than once, too, neglecting to follow the injunction of his companion, who moved in a stooping posture, with her head bent over her chest, his hat was caught in the closely matted branches, and fell sullenly and heavily to the earth, evidently much to the discomfiture of his guide.

At length they stood on the verge of a dark and precipitous ravine, the abrupt sides of which were studded with underwood, so completely interwoven that all passage appeared impracticable. What, however, seemed an insurmountable obstacle, proved, in reality, an inestimable advantage; for it was by clinging to this, in imitation of the example set him by his companion, the young officer was prevented from rolling into an abyss, the depth of which was lost in the profound obscurity that pervaded the scene. Through the bed of this dark dell rolled a narrow stream, so imperceptible to the eye in the "living darkness," and so noiseless in its course, that it was not until warned by his companion he stood on the very brink of it, Captain de Haldimar was made sensible of its existence. Both cleared it at a single bound, in which the activity of the female was not the least conspicuous, and, clambering up the opposite steep, secured their footing, by the aid of the same underwood that had assisted them in their descent.

On gaining the other summit, which was not done without detaching several loose stones from their sandy bed, they again fell into the path, which had been lost sight of in traversing the ravine. They had proceeded along this about half a mile, when the female suddenly stopped, and pointing to a dim and lurid atmosphere that now began to show itself between the thin foliage, whispered that in the opening beyond stood the encampment of the Indians. She then seated herself on the trunk of a fallen tree, that lay at the side of the almost invisible path they had hitherto pursued, and motioning to her companion to unboot himself, proceeded to unlace the fastenings of her moccasins.

"The foot of the Saganaw must fall like the night dew on the prairie," she observed; "the car of the red skin is quicker than the lightning, and he will know that a pale face is near, if he hear but his tread upon a blade of grass."

The young officer had, at the first suggestion of his guide, divested himself of his boots, prepared to perform the remainder of the journey merely in his stockings, but his companion now threw herself on her knees before him, and, without further ceremony, proceeded to draw over his foot one of the moccasins she had just relinquished.

"The feet of the Saganaw are soft as those of a young child," she remarked, in a voice of commiseration; "but the moccasins of Oucanasta shall protect them from the thorns of the forest."

This was too un-European,—too much reversing the established order of things, to be borne patiently. As if he had felt the dignity of his manhood offended by the proposal, the officer drew his foot hastily back, declaring, as he sprang from the log, he did not care for the thorns, and could not think of depriving a female, who must be much more sensible of pain than himself.

Oucanasta, however, was not to be outdone in politeness. She calmly reseated herself on the log, drew her right foot over her left knee, caught one of the hands of her companion, and placing it upon the naked sole, desired him to feel how impervious to attack of every description was that indurated portion of the lower limb.

This practical argument was not without its weight, and had more effect in deciding the officer than a volume of remonstrance. When Captain de Haldimar had passed his unwilling hand over the foot of Oucanasta, which, whatever her face might have been, was certainly any thing but delicate, and encountered numerous ragged excrescences and raspy callosities that set all symmetry at defiance, a wonderful revolution came over his feelings; and secretly determining the moccasins would be equally well placed on his own feet, he no longer offered any opposition.

This important point arranged, the officer once more followed his guide in silence. Gradually the forest, as they advanced, became lighter with the lurid atmosphere before alluded to; and at length, through the trees, could be indistinctly seen the Indian fires from which it proceeded. The young man was now desired by his conductress to use the utmost circumspection in making the circuit of the wood, in order to gain a position immediately opposite to the point where the path they had hitherto pursued terminated in the opening. This, indeed, was the most dangerous and critical part of the undertaking. A false step, or the crackling of a decayed branch beneath the foot, would have been sufficient to betray proximity, in which case his doom was sealed.

Fortunate did he now deem himself in having yielded to the counsel of his guide. Had he retained his unbending boot, it must have crushed whatever it pressed; whereas, the pliant moccasin, yielding to the obstacles it encountered, enabled him to pass noiselessly over them. Still, while exempt from danger on this score, another, scarcely less perplexing, became at every instant more obvious; for, as they drew nearer to the point which the female sought to gain, the dim light of the half-slumbering fires fell so immediately upon their path, that had a single human eye been turned in that direction, their discovery was inevitable. It was with a beating heart, to which mere personal fear, however, was a stranger, that Captain de Haldimar performed this concluding stage of his adventurous course; but, at a moment when he considered detection unavoidable, and was arming himself with resolution to meet the event, the female suddenly halted, placing, in the act, the trunk of an enormous beech between her companion and the dusky forms within, whose very breathing could be heard by the anxious officer. Without uttering a word, she took his hand, and, drawing him gently forward, disappeared altogether from his view. The young man followed, and in the next moment found himself in the bowels of the tree itself; into which, on the side of the encampment, both light and sound were admitted by a small aperture formed by the natural decay of the wood.

The Indian pressed her lips to the ear of her companion, and rather breathed than said,—"The Saganaw will see and hear every thing from this in safety; and what he hears let him treasure in his heart. Oucanasta must go. When the council is over she will return, and lead him back to his warriors."

With this brief intimation she departed, and so noiselessly, that the young officer was not aware of her absence until some minutes of silence had satisfied him she must be gone. His first care then was to survey, through the aperture that lay in a level with his eye, the character of the scene before him. The small plain, in which lay the encampment of the Indians, was a sort of oasis of the forest, girt round with a rude belt of underwood, and somewhat elevated, so as to present the appearance of a mound, constructed on the first principles of art. This was thickly, although irregularly studded with tents, some of which were formed of large coarse mats thrown over poles disposed in a conical shape, while others were more rudely composed of the leafy branches of the forest.

Within these, groups of human forms lay wrapped in their blankets, stretched at their lazy length. Others, with their feet placed close to the dying embers of their fires, diverged like so many radii from their centre, and lay motionless in sleep, as if life and consciousness were wholly extinct. Here and there was to be seen a solitary warrior securing, with admirable neatness, and with delicate ligatures formed of the sinew of the deer, the guiding feather, or fashioning the bony barb of his long arrow; while others, with the same warlike spirit in view, employed themselves in cutting and greasing small patches of smoked deer-skin, which were to secure and give a more certain direction to the murderous ballet. Among the warriors were interspersed many women, some of whom might be seen supporting in their laps the heavy heads of their unconscious helpmates, while they occupied themselves, by the firelight, in parting the long black matted hair, and maintaining a destructive warfare against the pigmy inhabitants of that dark region. These signs of life and activity in the body of the camp generally were, however, but few and occasional; but, at the spot where Captain de Haldimar stood concealed, the scene was different. At a few yards from the trees stood a sort of shed, composed of tall poles placed upright in the earth, and supporting a roof formed simply of rude boughs, the foliage of which had been withered by time. This simple edifice might be about fifty feet in circumference. In the centre blazed a large fire that had been newly fed, and around this were assembled a band of swarthy warriors, some twenty or thirty in number, who, by their proud, calm, and thoughtful bearing, might at once be known to be chiefs.

The faces of most of these were familiar to the young officer, who speedily recognised them for the principals of the various tribes Pontecac had leagued in arms against his enemies. That chief himself, ever remarkable for his haughty eye and commanding gesture, was of the number of those present; and, a little aloof from his inferiors, sat, with his feet stretched towards the fire, and half reclining on his side in an attitude of indolence; yet with his mind evidently engrossed by deep and absorbing thought. From some observations that distinctly met his ear, Captain de Haldimar gathered, the party were only awaiting the arrival of an important character, without whose presence the leading chief was unwilling the conference should begin. The period of the officer's concealment had just been long enough to enable him to fix all these particulars in his mind, when suddenly the faint report of a distant rifle was heard echoing throughout the wood. This was instantly succeeded by a second, that sounded more sharply on the ear; and then followed a long and piercing cry that brought every warrior, even of those who slept, quickly to his feet.

An anxious interval of some minutes passed away in the fixed and listening attitudes, which the chiefs especially had assumed, when a noise resembling that of some animal forcing its way rapidly through the rustling branches, was faintly heard in the direction in which the shots had been fired. This gradually increased as it evidently approached the encampment, and then, distinctly, could be heard the light yet unguarded boundings of a human foot. At every moment the rustling of the underwood, rapidly divided by the approaching form, became more audible; and so closely did the intruder press upon the point in which Captain de Haldimar was concealed, that that officer, fancying he had been betrayed, turned hastily round, and, grasping one of the pistols he had secreted in his chest, prepared himself for a last and deadly encounter. An instant or two was sufficient to re-assure him. The form glided hastily past, brushing the tawny with its garments in its course, and clearing, at a single bound, the belt of underwood that divided the encampment from the tall forest, stood suddenly among the group of anxious and expectant chiefs.

This individual, a man of tall stature, was powerfully made. He wore a jerkin, or hunting-coat of leather; and his arms were, a rifle which had every appearance of having just been discharged, a tomahawk reeking with blood, and a scalping knife, which, in the hurry of some recent service it had been made to perform, had missed its sheath, and was thrust naked into the belt that encircled his loins. His countenance wore an expression of malignant triumph; and as his eye fell on the assembled throng, its self-satisfied and exulting glance seemed to give them to understand he came not without credentials to recommend him to their notice. Captain de Haldimar was particularly struck by the air of bold daring and almost insolent recklessness pervading every movement of this man: and it was difficult to say whether the haughtiness of bearing peculiar to Pontecac himself, was not exceeded by that of this herculean warrior.

By the body of chiefs his appearance had been greeted with a mere general grunt of approbation; but the countenance of the leader expressed a more personal interest. All seemed to expect he had something of moment to communicate; but as it was not consistent with the dignity of Indian etiquette to enquire, they waited calmly until it should please their new associate to enter on the history of his exploits. In pursuance of an invitation from Pontecac, he now took his seat on the right hand of that chief, and immediately facing the tree, from which Captain de Haldimar, strongly excited both by the reports of the shots that had been fired, and the sight of the bloody tomahawk of the recently arrived Indian, gazed earnestly and anxiously on the swarthy throng.

Glancing once more triumphantly round the circle, who sat smoking their pipes in calm and deliberative silence, the latter now observed the eye of a young chief, who sat opposite to him, intently riveted on his left shoulder. He raised his hand to the part, withdrew it, looked at it, and found it wet with blood. A slight start of surprise betrayed his own unconsciousness of the accident; yet, secretly vexed at the discovery which had been made, and urged probably by one of his wayward fits, he demanded haughtily and insultingly of the young chief, if that was the first time he had ever looked on the blood of a warrior.

"Does my brother feel pain?" was the taunting reply. "If he is come to us with a trophy, it is not without being dearly bought. The Saganaw has spilt his blood."

"The weapons of the Saganaw, like those of the smooth face of the Ottawa, are without sting," angrily retorted the other. "They only prick the skin like a thorn; but when Wacosta drinks the blood of his enemy," and he glanced his eye fiercely at the young man, "it is the blood next his heart."

"My brother has always big words upon his lips," returned the young chief, with a scornful sneer at the implied threat against himself. "But where are his proofs?"

For a moment the eye of the party thus challenged kindled into flame, while his lips were firmly compressed together; and as he half bent himself forward, to scan with greater earnestness the features of his questioner, his right hand sank to his left side, tightly grasping the handle of his scalping-knife. The action was but momentary. Again he drew himself up, puffed the smoke deliberately from his bloody tomahawk, and, thrusting his right hand into his bosom, drew leisurely forth a reeking scalp, which he tossed insolently across the fire into the lap of the young chief. A loud and general "ugh!" testified the approbation of the assembled group, at the unequivocal answer thus given to the demand of the youth. The eye of the huge warrior sparkled with a deep and ferocious exultation.

"What says the smooth face of the Ottawa now?" he demanded, in the same insolent strain. "Does it make his heart sick to look upon the scalp of a great chief?"

The young man quietly turned the horrid trophy over several times in his hand, examining it attentively in every part. Then tossing it back with contemptuous coolness to its owner, he replied,—

"The eyes of my brother are weak with age. He is not cunning, like a red skin. The Ottawa has often seen the Saganaw in their fort, and he knows their chiefs have fine hair like women; but this is like the bristles of the fox. My brother has not slain a great chief, but a common warrior."

A flush of irrepressible and threatening anger passed over the features of the vast savage.

"Is it for a boy," he fiercely asked, "whose eyes know not yet the colour of blood, to judge of the enemies that fall by the tomahawk of Wacosta? but a great warrior never boasts of actions that he does not achieve. It is the son of the great chief of the Saganaw whom he has slain. If the smooth face doubts it, and has courage to venture, even at night, within a hundred yards of the fort, he will see a Saganaw without a scalp; and he will know that Saganaw by his dress—the dress," he pursued, with a low emphatic laugh, "that Oucanasta, the sister of the smooth face, loved so much to look upon."

Quicker than thought was the upspringing of the young Indian to his feet. With a cheek glowing, an eye flashing, and his gleaming tomahawk whirling rapidly round his head, he cleared at a single bound the fire that separated him from his insulter. The formidable man who had thus wantonly provoked the attack, was equally prompt in meeting it. At the first movement of the youth, he too had leapt to his feet, and brandished the terrible weapon that served in the double capacity of pipe and hatchet. A fierce yell escaped the lips of each, as they thus met in close and hostile collision, and the scene for the moment promised to be one of the most tragic character; but before either could find an available point on which to rest his formidable weapon, Pontecac himself had thrown his person between them, and in a voice of thunder commanded the instant abandonment of their purpose. Exasperated even as they now mutually were, the influence of that authority, for which the great chief of the Ottawas was well known, was not without due effect on the combatants. His anger was principally directed against the assailant, on whom the tones of his reproving voice produced a change the intimidation of his powerful opponent could never have effected. The young chief dropped the point of his tomahawk; bowed his head in submission, and then resuming his seat, sat during the remainder of the night with his arms folded, and his head bent in silence over his chest.

"Our brother has done well," said Pontecac, glancing approvingly at him who had exhibited the reeking trophy, and whom he evidently favoured. "He is a great chief, and his words are truth. We heard the report of his rifle, and we also heard the cry that told he had borne away the scalp of an enemy. But we will think of this to-morrow. Let us now commence our talk."

Our readers will readily imagine the feelings of Captain de Haldimar during this short but exciting scene. From the account given by the warrior, there could be no doubt the murdered man was the unhappy Donellan; who, probably, neglecting the caution given him, had exposed himself to the murderous aim of this fierce being, who was apparently a scout sent for the purpose of watching the movements of the garrison. The direction of the firing, the allusion made to the regimentals, nay, the scalp itself, which he knew from the short crop to be that of a soldier, and fancied he recognised from its colour to be that of his servant, formed but too conclusive evidence of the fact; and, bitterly and deeply, as he gazed on this melancholy proof of the man's sacrifice of life to his interest, did he repent that he had made him the companion of his adventure, or that, having done so, he had not either brought him away altogether, or sent him instantly back to the fort. Commiseration for the fate of the unfortunate Donellan naturally induced a spirit of personal hostility towards his destroyer; and it was with feelings strongly excited in favour of him whom he now discovered to be the brother of his guide, that he saw him spring fiercely to the attack of his gigantic opponent. There was an activity about the young chief amply commensurate with the great physical power of his adversary; while the manner in which he wielded his tomahawk, proved him to be any thing but the novice in the use of the formidable weapon the other had represented him. It was with a feeling of disappointment, therefore, which the peculiarity of his own position could not overcome, he saw Pontecac interpose himself between the parties.

Presently, however, a subject of deeper and more absorbing interest than even the fate of his unhappy follower engrossed every faculty of his mind, and riveted both eye and ear in painful tension to the aperture in his hiding-place. The chiefs had resumed their places, and the silence of a few minutes had succeeded to the fierce affray of the warriors, when Pontecac, in a calm and deliberate voice, proceeded to state he had summoned all the heads of the nations together, to hear a plan he had to offer for the reduction of the last remaining forts of their enemies, Michilimackinac and Detroit. He pointed out the tediousness of the warfare in which they were engaged; the desertion of the hunting-grounds by their warriors; and their consequent deficiency in all those articles of European traffic which they were formerly in the habit of receiving in exchange for their furs. He dwelt on the beneficial results that would accrue to them all in the event of the reduction of those two important fortresses; since, in that case, they would be enabled to make such terms with the English as would secure to them considerable advantages; while, instead of being treated with the indignity of a conquered people, they would be enabled to command respect from the imposing attitude this final crowning of their successes would enable them to assume. He stated that the prudence and vigilance of the commanders of these two unreduced fortresses were likely long to baffle, as had hitherto been the case, every open attempt at their capture; and admitted he had little expectation of terrifying them into a surrender by the same artifice that had succeeded with the forts on the Ohio and the lower lakes. The plan, however, which he had to propose, was one he felt assured would be attended with success. He would disclose that plan, and the great chiefs should give it the advantage of their deliberation.

Captain de Haldimar was on the rack. The chief had gradually dropped his voice as he explained his plan, until at length it became so low, that undistinguishable sounds alone reached the ear of the excited officer. For a moment he despaired of making himself fully master of the important secret; but in the course of the deliberation that ensued, the blanks left unsupplied in the discourse of the leader were abundantly filled up. It was what the reader has already seen. The necessities of the Indians were to be urged as a motive for their being tired of hostilities. A peace was to be solicited; a council held; a ball-playing among the warriors proposed, as a mark of their own sincerity and confidence during that council; and when the garrison, lulled into security, should be thrown entirely off their guard, the warriors were to seize their guns and tomahawks, with which (the former cut short, for the better concealment of their purpose) their women would be provided, rush in, under pretext of regaining their lost ball, when a universal massacre of men, women, and children was to ensue, until nothing wearing the garb of a Saganaw should be left.

It would be tedious to follow the chief through all the minor ramifications of his subtle plan. Suffice it they were of a nature to throw the most wary off his guard; and so admirably arranged was every part, so certain did it appear their enemies must give into the snare, that the oldest chiefs testified their approbation with a vivacity of manner and expression little wont to characterise the deliberative meetings of these reserved people. But deepest of all was the approval of the tall warrior who had so recently arrived. To him had the discourse of the leader been principally directed, as one whose counsel and experience were especially wanting to confirm him in his purpose. He was the last who spoke; but, when he did, it was with a force—an energy—that must have sunk every objection, even if the plan had not been so perfect and unexceptionable in its concoction as to have precluded a possibility of all negative argument. During the delivery of his animated speech, his swarthy countenance kindled into fierce and rapidly varying expression. A thousand dark and complicated passions evidently struggled at his heart; and as he dwelt leisurely and emphatically on the sacrifice of human life that must inevitably attend the adoption of the proposed measure, his eye grew larger, his chest expanded, nay, his very nostril appeared to dilate with unfathomably guileful exultation. Captain de Haldimar thought he had never gazed on any thing, wearing the human shape, half so atrociously savage.

Long before the council was terminated, the inferior warriors, who had been so suddenly aroused from their slumbering attitudes, had again retired to their tents, and stretched their lazy length before the embers of their fires. The weary chiefs now prepared to follow their example. They emptied the ashes from the bowls of their pipe-tomahawks, replaced them carefully at their side, rose, and retired to their respective tents. Pontecac and the tall warrior alone remained. For a time they conversed earnestly together. The former listened attentively to some observations made to him by his companion, in the course of which, the words "chief of the Saganaw—fort—spy—enemy," and two or three others equally unconnected, were alone audible to the ear of him who so attentively sought to catch the slightest sound. He then thrust his hand under his hunting-coat, and, as if in confirmation of what he had been stating, exhibited a coil of rope and the glossy boot of an English officer. Pontecac uttered one of his sharp ejaculating "ughs!" and then rising quickly from his seat, followed by his companion, soon disappeared in the heart of the encampment.

CHAPTER XVIII.

How shall we attempt to paint all that passed through the mind of Captain de Haldimar during this important conference of the fierce chiefs?—where find language to convey the cold and thrilling horror with which he listened to the calm discussion of a plan, the object of which was the massacre, not only of a host of beings endeared to him by long communionship of service, but of those who were wedded to his heart by the dearer ties of affection and kindred? As Pontecac had justly observed, the English garrisons, strong in their own defences, were little likely to be speedily reduced, while their enemies confined themselves to overt acts of hostility; but, against their insidious professions of amity who could oppose a sufficient caution? His father, the young officer was aware, had all along manifested a spirit of conciliation towards the Indians, which, if followed up by the government generally, must have had the effect of preventing the cruel and sanguinary war that had so recently desolated this remote part of the British possessions. How likely, therefore, was it, having this object always in view, he should give in to the present wily stratagem, where such plausible motives for the abandonment of their hostile purpose were urged by the perfidious chiefs! From the few hasty hints already given him by his guide,—that kind being, who evidently sought to be the saviour of the devoted garrisons,—he had gathered that a deep and artful plan was to be submitted to the chiefs by their leader; but little did he imagine it was of the finished nature it now proved to be. Any other than the present attempt, the vigilance and prudence of his experienced father, he felt, would have rendered abortive; but there was so much speciousness in the pleas that were to be advanced in furtherance of their assumed object, he could not but admit the almost certainty of their influence, even on him.

Sick and discouraged as he was at the horrible perspective thus forced on his mental view, the young officer had not, for some moments, presence of mind to reflect that the danger of the garrison existed only so long as he should be absent from it. At length, however, the cheering recollection came, and with it the mantling rush of blood, to his faint heart. But, short was the consoling hope: again he felt dismay in every fibre of his frame; for he now reflected, that although his opportune discovery of the meditated scheme would save one fort, there was no guardian angel to extend, as in this instance, its protecting influence to the other; and within that other there breathed those who were dearer far to him than his own existence;—beings, whose lives were far more precious to him than any even in the garrison of which he was a member. His sister Clara, whom he loved with a love little inferior to that of his younger brother; and one, even more dearly loved than Clara,—Madeline de Haldimar, his cousin and affianced bride,—were both inmates of Michillimackinac, which was commanded by the father of the latter, a major in the — regiment. With Madeline de Haldimar he had long since exchanged his vows of affection; and their nuptials, which were to have taken place about the period when the present war broke out, had only been suspended because all communication between the two posts had been entirely cut off by the enemy.

Captain de Haldimar had none of the natural weakness and timidity of character which belonged to the gentler and more sensitive Charles. Sanguine and full of enterprise, he seldom met evils half way; but when they did come, he sought to master them by the firmness and collectedness with which he opposed his mind to their infliction. If his heart was now racked with the most acute suffering—his reason incapacitated from exercising its calm deliberative power, the seeming contradiction arose not from any deficiency in his character, but was attributable wholly to the extraordinary circumstances of the moment.

It was a part of the profound plan of the Ottawa chief, that it should be essayed on the two forts on the same day; and it was a suggestion of the murderer of poor Donellan, that a parley should be obtained, through the medium of a white flag, the nature of which he explained to them, as it was understood among their enemies. If invited to the council, then they were to enter, or not, as circumstances might induce; but, in any case, they were to go unprovided with the pipe of peace, since this could not be smoked without violating every thing held most sacred among themselves. The red, or war pipe, was to be substituted as if by accident; and, for the success of the deception, they were to presume on the ignorance of their enemies. This, however, was not important, since the period of their first parley was to be the moment chosen for the arrangement of a future council, and the proposal of a ball-playing upon the common. Three days were to be named as the interval between the first conference of Pontecac with the governor and the definitive council which was to ensue; during which, however, it was so arranged, that, before the lip of a red skin should touch the pipe of peace, the ball-players should rush in and massacre the unprepared soldiery, while the chiefs despatched the officers in council.

It was the proximity of the period allotted for the execution of their cruel scheme that mainly contributed to the dismay of Captain de Haldimar. The very next day was appointed for carrying into effect the first part of the Indian plan: and how was it possible that a messenger, even admitting he should elude the vigilance of the enemy, could reach the distant post of Michillimackinac within the short period on which hung the destiny of that devoted fortress. In the midst of the confused and distracting images that now crowded on his brain, came at length one thought, redolent with the brightest colourings of hope. On his return to the garrison, the treachery of the Indians being made known, the governor might so far, and with a view of gaining time, give in to the plan of his enemies, as to obtain such delay as would afford the chance of communication between the forts. The attempt, on the part of those who should be selected for this purpose, would, it is true, be a desperate one: still it must be made; and, with such incentives to exertion as he had, how willingly would he propose his own services!

The more he dwelt on this mode of defeating the subtle designs of the enemy, the more practicable did it appear. Of his own safe return to the fort he entertained not a doubt; for he knew and relied on the Indian woman, who was bound to him by a tie of gratitude, which her conduct that night evidently denoted to be superior even to the interests of her race. Moreover, as he had approached the encampment unnoticed while the chiefs were yet awake to every thing around them, how little probability was there of his return being detected while all lay wrapped in the most profound repose. It is true that, for a moment, his confidence deserted him as he recurred to the earnest dialogue of the two Indians, and the sudden display of the rope and boot, the latter of which articles he had at once recognised to be one of those he had so recently worn; but his apprehensions on that score were again speedily set to rest, when he reflected, had any suspicion existed in the minds of these men that an enemy was lurking near them, a general alarm would have been spread, and hundreds of warriors despatched to scour the forest.

The night was now rapidly waning away, and already the cold damp air of an autumnal morning was beginning to make itself felt. More than half an hour had elapsed since the departure of Pontecac and his companion, and yet Oucanasta came not. With a sense of the approach of day came new and discouraging thoughts, and, for some minutes, the mind of the young officer became petrified with horror, as he reflected on the bare possibility of his escape being intercepted. The more he lingered on this apprehension, the more bewildered were his ideas; and already in horrible perspective, he beheld the destruction of his nearest and dearest friends, and the host of those who were humbler followers, and partakers in the same destiny. Absolutely terrified with the misgivings of his own heart, he, in the wildness and unconnectedness of his purpose, now resolved to make the attempt to return alone, although he knew not even the situation of the path he had so recently quitted. He had actually moved a pace forward on his desperate enterprise, when he felt a hand touching the extended arm with which he groped to find the entrance to his hiding place. The unexpected collision sent a cold shudder through his frame; and such was the excitement to which he had worked himself up, it was not without difficulty he suppressed an exclamation, that must inevitably have sealed his doom. The soft tone of Oucanasta's voice reassured him.

"The day will soon dawn," she whispered; "the Saganaw must go."

With the return of hope came the sense of all he owed to the devotedness of this kind woman. He grasped the hand that still lingered on his arm, pressed it affectionately in his own, and then placed it in silence on his throbbing heart. The breathing of Oucanasta became deeper, and the young officer fancied he could feel her trembling with agitation. Again, however, and in a tone of more subdued expression, she whispered that he must go.

There was little urging necessary to induce a prompt compliance with the hint. Cautiously emerging from his concealment, Captain de Haldimar now followed close in the rear of his guide, who took the same circuit of the forest to reach the path that led towards the fort. This they speedily gained, and then pursued their course in silence, until they at length arrived at the place where the exchange of moccasins had been made.

"Here the Saganaw may take breath," she observed, as she seated herself on the fallen tree; "the sleep of the red skin is sound, and there is no one upon the path but Oucanasta."

Anxious as he felt to secure his return to the fort, there was an implied solicitation in the tones of her to whom he owed so much, that prevented Captain de Haldimar from offering an objection, which he feared might be construed into slight.

For a moment or two the Indian remained with her arms folded, and her head bent over her chest; and then, in a low, deep, but tremulous voice, observed,—

"When the Saganaw saved Oucanasta from perishing in the angry waters, there was a girl of the pale faces with him, whose skin was like the snows of the Canadian winter, and whose hair was black like the fur of the squirrel. Oucanasta saw," she pursued, dropping her voice yet lower, "that the Saganaw was loved by the pale girl, and her own heart was very sick, for the Saganaw had saved her life, and she loved him too. But she knew she was very foolish, and that an Indian girl could never be the wife of a handsome chief of the Saganaw; and she prayed to the Great Spirit of the red skins to give her strength to overcome her feelings; but the Great Spirit was angry with her, and would not hear her." She paused a moment, and then abruptly demanded, "Where is that pale girl now?"

Captain de Haldimar had often been rallied, not only by his brother officers, but even by his sister and Madeline de Haldimar herself, on the conquest he had evidently made of the heart of this Indian girl. The event to which she had alluded had taken place several months previous to the breaking out of hostilities. Oucanasta was directing her frail bark, one evening, along the shores of the Detroit, when a gust of wind upset the canoe, and left its pilot struggling amid the waves. Captain de Haldimar, who happened to be on the bank at the moment with his sister and cousin, was an eye-witness of her danger, and instantly flew down the steep to her assistance. Being an excellent swimmer, he was not long in gaining the spot, where, exhausted with the exertion she had made, and encumbered with her awkward moccasins, the poor girl was already on the point of perishing. But for his timely assistance, indeed, she must have sunk to the bottom; and, since that period, the grateful being had been remarked for the strong but unexpressed attachment she felt for her deliverer. This, however, was the first moment Captain de Haldimar became acquainted with the extent of feelings, the avowal of which not a little startled and surprised, and even annoyed him. The last question, however, suggested a thought that kindled every fibre of his being into expectancy.—Oucanasta might be the saviour of those he loved; and he felt that, if time were but afforded her, she would. He rose from the log, dropped on one knee before the Indian, seized both her hands with eagerness, and then in tones of earnest supplication whispered,—

"Oucanasta is right: the pale girl with the skin like snow, and hair like the fur of the squirrel, is the bride of the Saganaw. Long before he saved the life of Oucanasta, he knew and loved that pale girl. She is dearer to the Saganaw than his own blood; but she is in the fort beyond the great lake, and the tomahawks of the red skins will destroy her; for the warriors of that fort have no one to tell them of their danger. What says the red girl? will she go and save the lives of the sister and the wife of the Saganaw?"

The breathing of the Indian became deeper; and Captain de Haldimar fancied she sighed heavily, as she replied,—

"Oucanasta is but a weak woman, and her feet are not swift like those of a runner among the red skins; but what the Saganaw asks, for his sake she will try. When she has seen him safe to his own fort, she will go and prepare herself for the journey. The pale girl shall lay her head on the bosom of the Saganaw, and Oucanasta will try to rejoice in her happiness."

In the fervour of his gratitude, the young officer caught the drooping form of the generous Indian wildly to his heart; his lips pressed hers, and during the kiss that followed, the heart of the latter bounded and thrilled, as if it would have passed from her own into the bosom of her companion.

Never was a kiss less premeditated, less unchaste. Gratitude, not passion, had called it forth; and had Madeline de Haldimar been near at the moment, the feeling that had impelled the seeming infidelity to herself would have been regarded as an additional claim on her affection. On the whole, however, it was a most unfortunate and ill-timed kiss, and, as is often the case under such circumstances, led to the downfall of the woman. In the vivacity of his embrace, Captain de Haldimar had drawn his guide so far forward upon the log, that she lost her balance, and fell with a heavy and reverberating crash among the leaves and dried sticks that were strewed thickly around.

Scarcely a second elapsed when the forest was alive with human yells, that fell achingly on the ears of both; and bounding warriors were heard on every hand, rapidly dividing the dense underwood they encountered in their pursuit. Quick as thought the Indian had regained her feet. She grasped the hand of her companion; and hurrying, though not without caution, along the path, again stood on the brow of the ravine through which they had previously passed.

"The Saganaw must go alone," she whispered. "The red skins are close upon our trail, but they will find only an Indian woman, when they expect a pale face. Oucanasta will save her friend."

Captain de Haldimar did as he was desired. Clinging to the bushes that lined the face of the precipitous descent, he managed once more to gain the bed of the ravine. For a moment he paused to listen to the sounds of his pursuers, whose footsteps were now audible on the eminence he had just quitted; and then, gathering himself up for the leap that was to enable him to clear the rivulet, he threw himself heavily forward. His feet alighted upon an elevated and yielding substance, that gave way with a crashing sound that echoed far and near throughout the forest, and he felt himself secured as if in a trap. Although despairing of escape, he groped with his hands to discover what it was that thus detained him, and found he had fallen through a bark canoe, the bottom of which had been turned upwards. The heart of the fugitive now sank within him: there could be no doubt that his retreat was intercepted. The canoe had been placed there since he last passed through the ravine: and it was evident, from the close and triumphant yell that followed the landing of the frail bark, such a result had been anticipated.

Stunned as he was by the terrific cries of the savages, and confused as were his ideas, Captain de Haldimar had still presence of mind to perceive the path itself offered him no further security. He therefore quitted it altogether, and struck, in an oblique direction, up the opposite face of the ravine. Scarcely had he gone twenty yards, when he heard the voices of several Indians conversing earnestly near the canoe he had just quitted; and presently afterwards he could distinctly hear them ascending the opposite brow of the ravine by the path he had recently congratulated himself on having abandoned. To advance or to recede was now equally impracticable; for, on every side, he was begirt by enemies, into whose hands a single false step must inevitably betray him. What would he not have given for the presence of Oucanasta, who was so capable of advising him in this difficulty! but, from the moment of his descending into the ravine, he had utterly lost sight of her.

The spot on which he now rested was covered with thick brushwood, closely interwoven at their tops, but affording sufficient space beneath for a temporary close concealment; so that, unless some Indian should touch him with his foot, there was little seeming probability of his being discovered by the eye. Under this he crept, and lay, breathless and motionless, with his head raised from the ground, and his ear on the stretch for the slightest noise. For several minutes he remained in this position, vainly seeking to catch the sound of a voice, or the fall of a footstep; but the most deathlike silence had succeeded to the fierce yellings that had so recently rent the forest. At times he fancied he could distinguish faint noises in the direction of the encampment; and so certain was he of this, he at length came to the conclusion that the Indians, either baffled in their search, had relinquished the pursuit, or, having encountered Oucanasta, had been thrown on a different scent. His first intention had been to lie concealed until the following night, when the warriors, no longer on the alert, should leave the path once more open to him; but now that the conviction of their return was strong on his mind, he changed his determination, resolving to make the best of his way to the fort with the aid of the approaching dawn. With this view he partly withdrew his body from beneath its canopy of underwood; but, scarcely had he done so, when a hundred tongues, like the baying of so many blood-hounds, again rent the air with their wild cries, which seemed to rise up from the very bowels of the earth, and close to the appalled ear of the young officer.

Scarcely conscious of what he did, Captain de Haldimar grasped one of his pistols, for he fancied he felt the hot breathing of human life upon his cheek. With a sickly sensation of fear, he turned to satisfy himself whether it was not an illusion of his heated imagination. What, however, was his dismay, when he beheld beading over him a dark and heavy form, the outline of which alone was distinguishable in the deep gloom in which the ravine remained enveloped! Desperation was in the heart of the excited officer: he cocked his pistol; but scarcely had the sharp ticking sound floated on the air, when he felt a powerful hand upon his chest; and, with as much facility as if he had been a child, was he raised by that invisible hand to his feet. A dozen warriors now sprang to the assistance of their comrade, when the whole, having disarmed and bound their prisoner, led him back in triumph to their encampment.

[CHAPTER XIX.]

The fires of the Indians were now nearly extinct; but the faint light of the fast dawning day threw a ghastly, sickly, hue over the countenances of the savages, which rendered them even more terrific in their war paint. The chiefs grouped themselves immediately around their prisoner, while the inferior warriors, forming an outer circle, stood leaning their dark forms upon their rifles, and following, with keen and watchful eye, every movement of their captive. Hitherto the unfortunate officer had been too much engrossed by his despair to pay any immediate attention to the individual who had first discovered and seized him. It was sufficient for him to know all hope of the safety of the garrison had perished with his captivity: and, with that recklessness of life which often springs from the very consciousness of inability to preserve it, he now sullenly awaited the death which he expected at each moment would be inflicted. Suddenly his ear was startled by an interrogatory, in English, from one who stood behind him.

With a movement of surprise, Captain de Haldimar turned to examine his questioner. It was the dark and ferocious warrior who had exhibited the scalp of his ill-fated servant. For a moment the officer fixed his eyes firmly and unshrinkingly on those of the savage, seeking to reconcile the contradiction that existed between his dress and features and the purity of the English he had just spoken. The other saw his drift, and, impatient of the scrutiny, again repeated, as he fiercely pulled the strong leathern thong by which the prisoner now found himself secured to his girdle,—

"Who and what are you?—whence come you?—and for what purpose are you here?" Then, as if struck by some sudden recollection, he laid his hand upon the shoulder of his victim; and, while his eye grew upon his features, he pursued, in a tone of vehemence,—"Ha! by heaven, I should know that face!—the cursed lines of the blood of De Haldimar are stamped upon that brow! But stay, one proof and I am satisfied." While he yet spoke he dashed the menial hat of his captive to the earth, put aside his hair, and then, with seditious exultation, pursued,—"It is even so. Do you recollect the battle of the plains of Abraham, Captain de Haldimar?—Recollect you the French officer who aimed so desperately at your life, and whose object was defeated by a soldier of your regiment? I am that officer; my victim escaped me then, but not for ever. The hour of vengeance is nearly now arrived, and your capture is the pledge of my success. Hark, how the death-cry of all his hated race will ring in madness on your father's ear!"

Amazement, stupefaction, and horror, filled the mind of the wretched officer at this extraordinary declaration. He perfectly recollected that the individual who had evinced so much personal hostility on the occasion alluded to, was indeed a man wearing the French uniform, although at the head of a band of savages, and of a stature and strength similar to those of him who now so fiercely avowed himself the bitter and deadly foe of all his race. If this were so, and his tone and language left little room for doubt, the doom of the ill-fated garrison was indeed irrevocably sealed. This mysterious enemy evidently possessed great influence in the councils of the Indians: and while the hot breath of his hatred continued to fan the flame of fierce hostility that had been kindled in the bosom of Pontec, whose particular friend he appeared to be, there would be no end to the atrocities that must follow. Great, however, as was the dismay of Captain de Haldimar, who, exhausted with the adventures of the night, presented a ghastly image of anxiety and fatigue, it was impossible for him to repress the feelings of indignation with which the language of this fierce man had inspired him.

"If you are in reality a French officer," he said, "and not an Englishman, as your accent would denote, the sentiments you have now avowed may well justify the belief, that you have been driven with ignominy from a service which your presence must eternally have disgraced. There is no country in Europe that would willingly claim you for its subject. Nay, even the savage race, with whom you are now connected, would, if apprised of your true nature, spurn you as a thing unworthy to herd even with their wolf-dogs."

A fierce sardonic laugh burst from the lips of the warrior, but this was so mingled with rage as to give an almost devilish expression to his features.

"Ignominy—ignominy!" he repeated, while his right hand played convulsively with the handle of his tomahawk; "is it for a De Haldimar to taunt me with ignominy? Fool!" he pursued, after a momentary pause, "you have sealed your doom." Then abruptly quitting the handle of his weapon, he thrust his hand into his bosom, and again drawing forth the reeking scalp of Donellan, he dashed it furiously in the face of his prisoner. "Not two hours since," he exclaimed, "I cheered myself with the thought that the scalp of a De Haldimar was in my pouch. Now, indeed, do I glory in my mistake. The torture will be a more fitting death for you."

Had an arm of the insulted soldier been at liberty, the offence would not have gone unavenged even there; for such was the desperation of his heart, that he felt he could have hugged the death struggle with his insolent captor, notwithstanding the fearful odds, nor quitted him until one or both should have paid the debt of fierce enmity with life. As it was he could only betray, by his flashing eye, excited look, and the impatient play of his foot upon the ground, the deep indignation that consumed his heart.

The tall savage exalted in the mortification he had awakened, and as his eye glanced insolently from head to foot along his enemy, its expression told how much he laughed at the impotence of his anger. Suddenly, however, a change passed over his features. The moccasins of the officer had evidently attracted his attention, and he now demanded, in a more serious and imperative tone,—

"Ha! what means this disguise? Who is the wretch whom I have slain, mistaking him for a nobler victim; and how comes it that an officer of the English garrison appears here in the garb of a servant? By heaven, it is so! you are come as a spy into the camp of the Indians to steal away the councils of the chiefs. Speak, what have you heard?"

With these questions returned the calm and self-possession of the officer. He at once saw the importance of his answer, on which hung not merely his own last faint chance of safety, but that also of his generous deliverer. Struggling to subdue the disgust which he felt at holding converse with this atrocious monster, he asked in turn,—

"Am I then the only one whom the warriors have overtaken in their pursuit?"

"There was a woman, the sister of that boy," and he pointed contemptuously to the young chief who had so recently assailed him, and who now, in common with his followers, stood impatiently listening to a colloquy that was unintelligible to all. "Speak truly, was she not the traitress who conducted you here?"

"Had you found me here," returned the officer, with difficulty repressing his feelings, "there might have been some ground for the assertion; but surely the councils of the chiefs could not be overheard at the distant point at which you discovered me."

"Why then were you there in this disguise?—and who is he," again holding up the bloody scalp, "whom I have despoiled of this?"

"There are few of the Ottawa Indians," returned Captain de Haldimar, "who are ignorant I once saved that young woman's life. Is it then so very extraordinary an attachment should have been the consequence? The man whom you slew was my servant. I had brought him out with me for protection during my interview with the woman, and I exchanged my uniform with him for the same purpose. There is nothing in this, however, to warrant the supposition of my being a spy."

During the delivery of these more than equivocal sentences, which, however, he felt were fully justified by circumstances, the young officer had struggled to appear calm and confident; but, despite of his exertions, his consciousness caused his cheek to colour, and his eye to twinkle, beneath the searching glance of his ferocious enemy. The latter thrust his hand into his chest, and slowly drew forth the rope he had previously exhibited to Pontac.

"Do you think me a fool, Captain de Haldimar," he observed sneeringly, "that you expect so paltry a tale to be palmed successfully on my understanding? An English officer is not very likely to run the risk of breaking his neck by having recourse to such a means of exit from a besieged garrison, merely to intrigue with an Indian woman, when there are plenty of soldiers' wives within, and that too at an hour when he knows the scouts of his enemies are prowling in the neighbourhood. Captain de Haldimar," he concluded, slowly and deliberately, "you have lied."

Despite of the hat insult, his prisoner remained calm. The very observation that had just been made afforded him a final hope of exculpation, which, if it benefited not himself, might still be of service to the generous Oucanasta.

"The onus of such language," he observed coolly and with dignity, "falls not on him to whom it is addressed, but on him who utters it. Yet one who professes to have been himself a soldier, must see in this very circumstance a proof of my innocence. Had I been sent out as a spy to reconnoitre the movements, and to overhear the councils of our enemies, the gate would have been open for my egress; but that rope is in itself an evidence I must have stolen forth unknown to the garrison."

Whether it was that the warrior had his own particular reasons for attaching truth to this statement, or that he merely pretended to do so, Captain de Haldimar saw with secret satisfaction his last argument was conclusive.

"Well, be it so," retorted the savage, while a ferocious smile passed over his swarthy features; "but, whether you have been here as a spy, or have merely ventured out in prosecution of an intrigue, it matters not. Before the sun has travelled far in the meridian you die; and the tomahawk of your father's deadly foe—of—of—of Wacosta, as I am called, shall be the first to drink your blood."

The officer made a final effort at mercy. "Who or what you are, or whence your hatred of my family, I know not," he said; "but surely I have never injured you: wherefore, then, this insatiable thirst for my blood? If you are, indeed, a Christian and a soldier, let your heart be touched with humanity, and procure my restoration to my friends. You once attempted my life in honourable combat, why not wait, then, until a fitting opportunity shall give not a bound and defenceless victim to your steel, but one whose resistance may render him a conquest worthy of your arm?"

"What! and be balked of the chance of my just revenge? Hear me, Captain de Haldimar," he pursued, in that low, quick, deep tone that told all the strong excitement of his heart:—"I have, it is true, no particular enmity to yourself, further than that you are a De Haldimar; but hell does not supply a feeling half so bitter as my enmity to your proud father: and months, nay years, have I passed in the hope of such an hour as this. For this have I forsworn my race, and become—what you now behold me—a savage both in garb and character. But this matters not," he continued, fiercely and impatiently, "your doom is sealed; and before another sun has risen, your stern father's gaze shall be blasted with the sight of the mangled carcass of his first born. Ha! ha! ha!" and he laughed low and exultingly, "even now I think I see him withering, if heart so hard can wither, beneath this proof of my undying hate."

"Fiend!—monster!—devil!" exclaimed the excited officer, now losing sight of all considerations of prudence in the deep horror inspired by his captor:—"Kill me—torture me—commit any cruelty on me, if such be your savage will; but outrage not humanity by the fulfilment of your last disgusting threat. Suffer not a father's heart to be agonised—a father's eye to be blasted—with a view of the mangled remains of him to whom he has given life."

Again the savage rudely pulled the thong that bound his prisoner to his girdle, and removing his tomahawk from his belt, and holding its sullied point close under the eye of the former, exclaimed, as he bent eagerly over him,—

"See you this, Captain de Haldimar? At the still hour of midnight, while you had abandoned your guard to revel in the arms of your Indian beauty, I stole into the fort by means of the same rope that you had used in quitting it. Unseen by the sentinels I gained your father's apartment. It was the first time we had met for twenty years, and I do believe that had the very devil presented himself in my place, he would have been received with fewer marks of horror. Oh, how that proud man's eye twinkled beneath this glittering blade! He attempted to call out, but my look paralysed his tongue, and cold drops of sweat stole rapidly down his brow and cheek. Then it was that my seared heart once more beat with the intoxication of triumph. Your father was alone and unarmed, and throughout the fort not a sound was to be heard, save the distant tread of the sentinels. I could have laid him dead at my feet at a single blow, and yet have secured my retreat. But no, that was not my object. I came to taunt him with the promise of my revenge—to tell him the hour of my triumph was approaching fast; and, ha!" he concluded, laughing hideously as he passed his large rude hand through the wavy hair of the now uncovered officer, "this is, indeed, a fair and unexpected first earnest of the full redemption of my pledge. No—no!" he continued, as if talking to himself, "he must not die. Tantalus-like, he shall have death ever apparently within his grasp; but, until all his race have perished before his eyes, he shall not attain it."

Hitherto the Indians had preserved an attitude of calm, listening to the interrogatories put to the prisoner with that wonder and curiosity with which a savage people hear a language different from their own; and marking the several emotions that were elicited in the course of the animated colloquy of the pale faces. Gradually, however, they became impatient under its duration; and many of them, in the excitement produced by the fierce manner of him who was called Wacosta, fixed their dark eyes upon the captive, while they grasped the handles of their tomahawks, as if they would have disputed with the former the privilege of dying his weapon first in his blood. When they saw the warrior hold up his menacing blade to the eye of his victim, while he passed his hand through the redundant hair, they at once inferred the sacrifice was about to be completed, and rushing furiously forward, they bounded, and leaped, and yelled, and brandished their own weapons in the most appalling manner.

Already had the unhappy officer given himself up for lost; fifty bright tomahawks were playing about his head at the same instant, and death—that death which is never without terror to the young, however brave they may be in the hour of generous conflict—seemed to have arrived at last. He raised his eyes to heaven, committing his soul to his God in the same silent prayer that he offered up for the preservation of his friends and comrades; and then bending them upon the earth, summoned all his collectedness and courage to sustain him through the trial. At the very moment, however, when he expected to feel the crashing steel within his brain, he felt himself again violently pulled by the thong that secured his hands. In the next instant he was pressed close to the chest of his vast enemy, who, with one arm encircling his prisoner, and the other brandishing his fierce blade in rapid evolutions round his head, kept the yelling band at bay, with the evident unshaken determination to maintain his sole and acknowledged right to the disposal of his captive.

For several moments the event appeared doubtful; but, notwithstanding his extreme agility in the use of a weapon, in the management of which he evinced all the dexterity of the most practised native, the odds were fearfully against Wacosta; and while his flashing eye and swelling chest betrayed his purpose rather to perish himself than suffer the infringement of his claim, it was evident that numbers must, in the end, prevail against him. On an appeal to Pontac, however, of which he now suddenly bethought himself, the authority of the latter was successfully exerted, and he was again left in the full and undisturbed possession of his prisoner.

A low and earnest conversation now ensued among the chiefs, in which, as before, Wacosta bore a principal part. When this was terminated, several Indians approached the unhappy officer, and unfasting the thong with which his hands were firmly and even painfully girt, deprived him both of coat, waistcoat and shirt. He was then bound a second time in the same manner, his body besmeared with paint, and his head so disguised as to give him the caricature semblance of an Indian warrior. When these preparations were completed, he was led to the tree in which he had been previously concealed, and there firmly secured. Meanwhile Wacosta, at the head of a numerous band of warriors, had departed once more in the direction of the fort.

With the rising of the sun now vanished all traces of the mist that had fallen since the early hours of morning, leaving the unfortunate officer ample leisure to survey the difficulties of his position. He had fancied, from the course taken by his guide the previous night, that the plain or oasis, as we have elsewhere termed it, lay in the very heart of the forest; but that route now proved to have been circuitous. The tree to which he was bound was one of a slight belt, separating the encampment from the open grounds which extended towards the river, and which was so thin and scattered on that side as to leave the clear silver waters of the Detroit visible at intervals. Oh, what would he not have given, at that cheering sight, to have had his limbs free, and his chance of life stake on the swiftness of his flight! While he had imagined himself begirt by interminable forest, he felt as one whose very thought to elude those who were, in some degree, the deities of that wild scene, must be paralysed in its first conception. But here was the vivifying picture of civilised nature. Corn fields, although trodden down and destroyed—dwelling houses, although burnt or dilapidated—told of the existence of those who were of the same race with himself; and notwithstanding these had perished even as he must perish, still there was something in the aspect of the very ruins of their habitations which, contrasted with the solemn gloom of the forest, carried a momentary and indefinite consolation to his spirit. Then there was the ripe and teeming orchard, and the low whitewashed cabin of the Canadian peasant, to whom the offices of charity, and the duties of humanity, were no strangers; and who, although the secret enemies of his country, had no motive for personal hostility towards himself. Then, on the river itself, even at that early hour, was to be seen, fastened to the long stake driven into its bed, or secured by the rude anchor of stone appended to a cable of twisted bark, the light canoe or clumsy periqua of the peasant fisherman, who, ever and anon, drew up from its deep bosom whatever tenant of these waters might chance to affix itself to the traitorous hook. It is true that his view of these objects was only occasional and indistinct; but his intimate acquaintance with the localities beyond brought every thing before Captain de Haldimar's eye; and even while he sighed to think they were for ever cut off from his reach, he already, in idea, followed the course of flight he should pursue were the power but afforded him.

From this train of painful and exciting thought the wretched captive was aroused, by a faint but continued yelling in a distant part of the forest, and in the direction that had been taken by Wacousta and his warriors. Then, after a short interval, came the loud booming of the cannon of the fort, carried on with a spirit and promptitude that told of some pressing and dangerous emergency, and fainter afterwards the sharp shrill reports of the rifles, bearing evidence the savages were already in close collision with the garrison. Various were the conjectures that passed rapidly through the mind of the young officer, during a firing that had called almost every Indian in the encampment away to the scene of action, save the two or three young Ottawas who had been left to guard his own person, and who lay upon the sward near him, with head erect and ear sharply set, listening to the startling sounds of conflict. What the motive of the hurried departure of the Indians was he knew not; but he had conjectured the object of the fierce Wacousta was to possess himself of the uniform in which his wretched servant was clothed, that no mistake might occur in his identity, when its true owner should be exhibited in it, within view of the fort, mangled and disfigured, in the manner that fierce and mysterious man had already threatened. It was exceedingly probable the body of Donellan had been mistaken for his own, and that in the anxiety of his father to prevent the Indians from carrying it off, the cannon had been directed to open upon them. But if this were the case, how were the reports of the rifles, and the fierce yellings that continued, save at intervals, to ring throughout the forest to be accounted for? The bullets of the Indians evidently could not reach the fort, and they were too wily, and attached too much value to their ammunition, to risk a shot that was not certain of carrying a wound with it. For a moment the fact itself flashed across his mind, and he attributed the fire of small arms to the attack and defence of a party that had been sent out for the purpose of securing the body, supposed to be his own; yet, if so, again how was he to account for his not hearing the report of a single musket? His ear was too well practised not to know the sharp crack of the rifle from the heavy dull discharge of the musket, and as yet the former only had been distinguishable, amid the intervals that ensued between each sullen booming of the cannon. While this impression continued on the mind of the anxious officer, he caught, with the avidity of desperation, at the faint and improbable idea that his companions might be able to penetrate to his place of concealment, and procure his liberation; but when he found the firing, instead of drawing nearer, was confined to the same spot, and even more fiercely kept up by the Indians towards the close, he again gave way to his despair, and resigning himself to his fate, no longer sought comfort in vain speculation as to its cause. His ear now caught the report of the last shell as it exploded, and then all was still and hushed, as if what he had so recently heard was but a dream.

The first intimation given him of the return of the savages was the death howl, set up by the women within the encampment. Captain de Haldimar turned his eyes, instinct with terror, towards the scene, and beheld the warriors slowly issuing from the opposite side of the forest into the plain, and bearing in silence the dead and stiffened forms of those who had been cut down by the destructive fire from the fort. Their mien was sullen and revengeful, and more than one dark and gleaming eye did he encounter turned upon him, with an expression that seemed to say a separate torture should avenge the death of each of their fallen comrades.

The early part of the morning wore away in preparation for the interment of the slain. These were placed in rows under the council shed, where they were attended by their female relatives, who composed the features and confined the limbs, while the gloomy warriors dug, within the limit of the encampment, rude graves, of a depth just sufficient to receive the body. When these were completed, the dead were deposited, with the usual superstitious ceremonies of these people, in their several receptacles, after which a mound of earth was thrown up over each, and the whole covered with round logs, so disposed as to form a tomb of semicircular shape: at the head of each grave was finally planted a pole, bearing various devices in paint, intended to illustrate the warlike achievements of the defunct parties.

Captain de Haldimar had followed the course of these proceedings with a beating heart; for too plainly had he read in the dark and threatening manner both of men and women, that the retribution about to be wreaked upon himself would be terrible indeed. Much as he clung to life, and bitterly as he mourned his early cutting off from the affections hitherto identified with his existence, his wretchedness would have been less, had he not been overwhelmed by the conviction that, with him, must perish every chance of the safety of those, the bare recollection of whom made the bitterness of death even more bitter. Harrowing as were these reflections, he felt that immediate destruction, since it could not be avoided, would be rather a blessing than otherwise. But such, evidently, was not the purpose of his relentless enemy. Every species of torment which his cruel invention could supply would, he felt convinced, be exercised upon his frame: and with this impression on his mind, it would have required sterner nerves than his, not to have shrunk from the very anticipation of so dreadful an ordeal.

It was now noon, and yet no visible preparation was making for the consummation of the sacrifice. This, Captain de Haldimar imputed to the absence of the fierce Wacousta, whom he had not seen since the return of the warriors from the skirmish. The momentary disappearance of this extraordinary and ferocious man was, however, fraught with no consolation to his unfortunate prisoner, who felt he was only engaged in taking such measures as would render not only his destruction more certain, but his preliminary sufferings more complicated and protracted. While he was thus indulging in fruitless speculation as to the motive for his absence, he fancied he heard the report of a rifle, succeeded immediately afterwards by the war-whoop, at a considerable distance, and in the direction of the river. In this impression he was confirmed, by the sudden upstarting to their feet of the young Indians to whose custody he had been committed, who now advanced to the outer edge of the belt of forest, with the apparent object of obtaining a more unconfined view of the open ground that lay beyond. The rapid gliding of spectral forms from the interior of the encampment in the same direction, denoted, moreover, that the Indians generally had heard, and were attracted by the same sound.

Presently afterwards, repeated "waughs" and "Wacousta!—Wacousta!" from those who had reached the extreme skirt of the forest, fell on the dismayed ear of the young officer. It was evident, from the peculiar tones in which these words were pronounced, that they beheld that warrior approaching them with some communication of interest; and, sick at heart, and filled with irrepressible dismay, Captain de Haldimar felt his pulse to throb more violently as each moment brought his enemy nearer to him.

A startling interest was now created among the Indians; for, as the savage warrior neared the forest, his lips peeled forth that peculiar cry which is meant to announce some intelligence of alarm. Scarcely had its echoes died away in the forest, when the whole of the warriors rushed from the encampment towards the clearing. Directed by the sound, Captain de Haldimar bent his eyes upon the thin skirt of wood that lay immediately before him, and at intervals could see the towering form of that vast warrior bounding, with incredible speed, up the sloping ground that led from the town towards the forest. A ravine lay before him but this he cleared, with a prodigious effort, at a single leap; and then, continuing his way up the slope, amid the low guttural acclamations of the warriors at his extraordinary dexterity and strength, finally gained the side of Pontecac, then leaning carelessly against a tree at a short distance from the prisoner.

A low and animated conversation now ensued between these two important personages, which at moments assumed the character of violent discussion. From what Captain de Haldimar could collect, the Ottawa chief was severely reproving his friend for the inconsiderate ardour which had led him that morning into collision with those whom it was their object to lull into security by a careful avoidance of hostility, and urging the possibility of their plan being defeated in consequence. He moreover obstinately refused the pressing request of Wacousta, in regard to some present enterprise which the latter had just suggested, the precise nature of which, however, Captain de Haldimar could not learn. Meanwhile, the rapid flitting of numerous forms to and from the encampment, arrayed in all the fierce panoply of savage warfare, while low exclamations of excitement occasionally caught his ear, led the officer to infer, strange and unusual as such an occurrence was, that either the detachment already engaged, or a second, was advancing on their position. Still, this offered little chance of security for himself; for more than once, during his long conference with Pontecac, had the fierce Wacousta bent his eye in ferocious triumph on his victim, as if he would have said,—“Come what will—whatever be the result—yon, at least, shall not escape me.” Indeed, so confident did the latter feel that the instant of attack would be the signal of his own death, that after the first momentary and instinctive cheering of his spirit, he rather regretted the circumstance of their approach; or, if he rejoiced at all, it was only because it afforded him the prospect of immediate death, instead of being exposed to all the horror of a lingering and agonising suffering from the torture.

While the chiefs were yet earnestly conversing, the alarm cry, previously uttered by Wacousta, was repeated, although in a low and subdued tone, by several of the Indians who stood on the brow of the eminence. Pontecac started suddenly to the same point; but Wacousta continued for a moment or two rooted to the spot on which he stood, with the air of one in doubt as to what course he should pursue. He then abruptly raised his head, fixed his dark and menacing eye on his captive, and was already in the act of approaching him, when the earnest and repeated demands for his presence, by the Ottawa chief, drew him once more to the outskirts of the wood.

Again Captain de Haldimar breathed freely. The presence of that fierce man had been a clog upon the vital functions of his heart; and, to be relieved from it, even at a moment like the present, when far more important interests might be supposed to occupy his mind, was a gratification, of which not even the consciousness of impending death could wholly deprive him. From the continued pressing of the Indians towards one particular point in the clearing, he now conjectured, that, from that point, the advance of the troops was visible. Anxious to obtain even a momentary view of those whom he deemed himself fated never more to mingle with in this life, he raised himself upon his feet, and stretched his neck and bent his eager glance in the direction by which Wacousta had approached; but, so closely were the dark warriors grouped among the trees, he found it impossible. Once or twice, however, he thought he could distinguish the gleaming of the English bayonets in the bright sunshine, as they seemed to flit off in a parallel line with the ravine. Oh, how his generous heart throbbed at that moment; and how ardently did he wish that he could have stood in the position of the meanest soldier in those gallant ranks! Perhaps his own brave and devoted grenadiers were of the number, burning with enthusiasm to be led against the captors or destroyers of their officer; and this thought added to his wretchedness still more.

While the unfortunate prisoner, thus strongly excited, bent his whole soul on the scene before him, he fancied he heard the approach of a cautious footstep. He turned his head as well as his confined position would admit, and beheld, close behind him, a dark Indian, whose eyes alone were visible above the blanket in which his person was completely enveloped. His right arm was uplifted, and the blade of a scalping knife glittered in his hand. A cold shudder ran through the veins of the young officer, and he closed his eyes, that he might not see the blow which he felt was about to be directed at his heart. The Indian glanced hurriedly yet cautiously around, to see if he was observed; and then, with the rapidity of thought, divided, first the thongs that secured the legs, and then those which confined the arms of the defenceless captive. When Captain de Haldimar, full of astonishment at finding himself once more at liberty, again unclosed his eyes, they fell on the not unhandsome features of the young chief, the brother of Oucanasta.

"The Saganaw is the prisoner of Wacosta," said the Indian hastily; "and Wacosta is the enemy of the young Ottawa chief. The warriors of the pale faces are there;" and he pointed directly before him. "If the Saganaw has a bold heart and a swift foot he may save his life;" and, with this intimation, he hurried away in the same cautious manner, and was in the next instant seen making a circuit to arrive at the point at which the principal strength of the Indians was collected.

The position of Captain de Haldimar had now attained its acme of interest; for on his own exertions alone depended every thing that remained to be accomplished. With wonderful presence of mind he surveyed all the difficulties of his course, while he availed himself at the same moment of whatever advantages were within his grasp. On the approach of Wacosta, the young Indians, to whose custody he had been committed, had returned to their post; but no sooner had that warrior, obeying the call of Pontec, again departed, than they once more flew to the extreme skirt of the forest, after first satisfying themselves the ligatures which confined their prisoner were secure. Either with a view of avoiding unnecessary encumbrance in their course, or through hurry and inadvertence, they had left their blankets near the foot of the tree. The first thought of the officer was to seize one of these; for, in order to gain the point whence his final effort to join the detachment must be made, it was necessary he should pass through the body of scattered Indians who stood immediately in his way; and the disguise of the blanket could alone afford him a reasonable chance of moving unnoticed among them. Secretly congratulating himself on the insulting mockery that had inducted his upper form in the disguising war-paint of his enemies, he now drew the protecting blanket close up to his eyes; and then, with every nerve braced up, every faculty of mind and body called into action, commenced his dangerous enterprise.

He had not, however, taken more than two or three steps in advance, when, to his great discomfiture and alarm, he beheld the formidable Wacosta approaching from a distance, evidently in search of his prisoner. With the quickness of thought he determined on his course. To appear to avoid him would be to excite the suspicion of the fierce warrior; and, desperate as the alternative was, he resolved to move undeviatingly forward. At each step that drew him nearer to his enemy, the beating of his heart became more violent; and had it not been for the thick coat of paint in which he was invested, the involuntary contraction of the muscles of his face must inevitably have betrayed him. Nay, even as it was, had the keen eye of the warrior fallen on him, such was the agitation of the officer, he felt he must have been discovered. Happily, however, Wacosta, who evidently took him for some inferior warrior hastening to the point where his fellows were already assembled, passed without deigning to look at him, and so close, their forms almost touched. Captain de Haldimar now quickened his pace. It was evident there was no time to be lost; for Wacosta, on finding him gone, would at once give the alarm, when a hundred warriors would be ready on the instant to intercept his flight. Taking the precaution to disguise his walk by turning in his toes after the Indian manner, he reached, with a beating heart, the first of the numerous warriors who were collected within the belt of forest, anxiously watching the movements of the detachment in the plain below. To his infinite joy he found that each was too much intent on what was passing in the distance, to heed any thing going on near themselves; and when he at length gained the extreme opening, and stood in a line with those who were the farthest advanced, without having excited a single suspicion in his course, he could scarcely believe the evidence of his senses.

Still the most difficult part of the enterprise remained to be completed. Hitherto he had moved under the friendly cover of the underwood, the advantage of which had been to conceal that part of his regimental trousers which the blanket left exposed; and if he moved forward into the clearing, the quick glance of an Indian would not be slow in detecting the difference between these and his own ruder leggings. There was no alternative now but to commence his flight from the spot on which he stood; and for this he prepared himself. At one rapid and comprehensive view he embraced the immediate localities before him. On the other side of the ravine he could now distinctly see the English troops, either planning, as he conceived, their own attack, or waiting in the hope of drawing the Indians from their cover. It was evident that to reach them the ravine must be crossed, unless the more circuitous route by the bridge, which was hid from his view by an intervening hillock, should be preferred; but as the former had been cleared by Wacosta in his ascent, and was the nearest point by which the detachment could be approached, to this did he now direct his undivided attention.

While he yet paused with indecision, at one moment fancying the time for starting was not yet arrived, and at the next that he had suffered it to pass away, the powerful and threatening voice of Wacosta was heard proclaiming the escape of his captive. Low but expressive exclamations from the warriors marked their sense of the importance of the intelligence; and many of them hastily dispersed themselves in pursuit. This was the critical moment for action: for, as the anxious officer had rather wished than expected, those Indians who had been immediately in front, and whose proximity he most dreaded, were among the number of those who dashed into the heart of the forest. Captain de Haldimar now stood alone, and full twenty paces in front of the nearest of the savages. For a moment he played with his moccasined foot, to satisfy himself of the power and flexibility of its muscles, and then committing himself to his God, dashed the blanket suddenly from his shoulders, and, with eye and heart fixed on the distant soldiery, darted down the declivity with a speed of which he had never yet believed himself capable. Scarcely, however, had his fleeing form appeared in the opening, when a tremendous and deafening yell rent the air, and a dozen wild and naked warriors followed instantly in pursuit. Attracted by that yell, the terrible Wacosta, who had been seeking his victim in a different quarter, bounded forward to the front, with an eye flashing fire, and a brow compressed into the fiercest hate; and so stupendous were his efforts, so extraordinary was his speed, that had it not been for the young Ottawa chief, who was one of the pursuing party, and who, under the pretence of assisting in the recapture of the prisoner, sought every opportunity of throwing himself before, and embarrassing the movements of his enemy, it is highly probable the latter would have succeeded. Despite of these obstacles, however, the fierce Wacosta, who had been the last to follow, soon left the foremost of his companions far behind him; and but for his sudden fall, while in the very act of seizing the arm of his prisoner, his gigantic efforts must have been crowned with the fullest success. But the reader has already seen how miraculously Captain de Haldimar, reduced to the last stage of debility, as much from inanition as from the unnatural efforts of his flight, finally accomplished his return to the detachment.

CHAPTER XX.

At the western extremity of the lake Huron, and almost washed by the waters of that pigmy ocean, stands the fort of Michillimackinac. Constructed on a smaller scale, and garrisoned by a less numerical force, the defences of this post, although less formidable than those of the Detroit, were nearly similar, at the period embraced by our story, both in matter and in manner. Unlike the latter fortress, however, it boasted none of the advantages afforded by culture; neither, indeed, was there a single spot in the immediate vicinity that was not clad in the eternal forest of these regions. It is true, that art and laborious exertion had so far supplied the deficiencies of nature as to isolate the fort, and throw it under the protecting sweep of its cannon; but, while this afforded security, it failed to produce any thing like a pleasing effect to the eye. The very site on which the fortress now stood had at one period been a portion of the wilderness that every where around was only terminated by the sands on the lake shore; and, although time and the axe of the pioneer had in some degree changed its features, still there was no trace of that blended natural scenery that so pleasingly diversified the vicinity of the sister fort. Here and there, along the imperfect clearing, and amid the dark and thickly studded stumps of the felled trees, which in themselves were sufficient to give the most lugubrious character to the scene, rose the rude log cabin of the settler; but, beyond this, cultivation appeared to have lost her power in proportion with the difficulties she had to encounter. Even the two Indian villages, L'Arbre-Croche and Chabouiga, situate about a mile from the fort, with which they formed nearly an equilateral triangle, were hid from the view of the garrison by the dark dense forest, in the heart of which they were embedded.

Lakeward the view was scarcely less monotonous; but it was not, as in the rear, that monotony which is never occasionally broken in upon by some occurrence of interest. If the eye gazed long and anxiously for the white sail of the well known armed vessel, charged at stated intervals with letters and tidings of those whom time, and distance, and danger, far from estranging, rendered more dear to the memory, and bound more closely to the heart, it was sure of being rewarded at last; and then there was no picture on which it could love to linger so well as that of the silver waves bearing that valued vessel in safety to its wonted anchorage in the offing. Moreover, the light swift bark canoes of the natives often danced joyously on its surface; and while the sight was offended at the savage, skulking among the trees of the forest, like some dark spirit moving cautiously in its course of secret destruction, and watching the moment when he might pounce unnoticed on his unprepared victim, it followed, with momentary pleasure and excitement, the activity and skill displayed by the harmless paddler, in the swift and meteor-like race that set the troubled surface of the Huron in a sheet of hissing foam. Nor was this all. When the eye turned wood-ward, it fell heavily, and without interest, upon a dim and dusky point, known to enter upon savage scenes and unexplored countries; whereas, whenever it reposed upon the lake, it was with an eagerness and energy that embraced the most vivid recollections of the past, and led the imagination buoyantly over every well-remembered scene that had previously been traversed, and which must be traversed again before the land of the European could be pressed once more. The forest, in a word, formed, as it were, the gloomy and impenetrable walls of the prison-house, and the bright lake that lay before it the only portal through which happiness and liberty could be again secured.

The principal entrance into the fort, which presented four equal sides of a square, was from the forest; but, immediately opposite to this, and behind the apartments of the commanding officer, there was another small gate that opened upon the lake shore; but which, since the investment of the place, had been kept bolted and locked, with a precaution befitting the danger to which the garrison was exposed. Still, there were periods, even now, when its sullen hinges were to be heard moaning on the midnight breeze; for it served as a medium of communication between the besieged and others who were less critically circumstanced than themselves.

The very day before the Indians commenced their simultaneous attack on the several posts of the English, the only armed vessel that had been constructed on these upper lakes, serving chiefly as a medium of communication between Detroit and Michillimackinac, had arrived with despatches and letters from the former fort. A well-concerted plan of the savages to seize her in her passage through the narrow waters of the river Sinclair had only been defeated by the vigilance of her commander; but, ever since the breaking out of the war, she had been imprisoned within the limits of the Huron. Laborious indeed was the duty of the devoted crew. Several attempts had been renewed by the Indians to surprise them; but, although their little fleets stole cautiously and noiselessly, at the still hour of midnight, to the spot where, at the last expiring rays of twilight, they had beheld her carelessly anchored, and apparently lulled into security, the subject of their search was never to be met with. No sooner were objects on the shore rendered indistinct to the eye, than the anchor was silently weighed, and, gliding wherever the breeze might choose to carry her, the light bark was made to traverse the lake, with every sail set, until dawn. None, however, were suffered to slumber in the presumed security afforded by this judicious flight. Every man was at his post; and, while a silence so profound was preserved that the noise of a falling pin might have been heard upon her decks, every thing was in readiness to repel an attack of their enemies, should the vessel, in her course, come accidentally in collision with their pigmy fleets. When morning broke, and no sign of their treacherous foes was visible, the vessel was again anchored, and the majority of the crew suffered to retire to their hammocks, while the few whose turn of duty it chanced to be, kept a vigilant look-out, that, on the slightest appearance of alarm, their slumbering comrades might again be aroused to energy and action.

Severe and harassing as had been the duty on board this vessel for many months,—at one moment exposed to the assaults of the savages, at another assailed by the hurricanes that are so prevalent and so dangerous on the American lakes,—the situation of the crew was even less enviable than that of the garrison itself. What chiefly contributed to their disquietude, was the dreadful consciousness that, however their present efforts might secure a temporary safety, the period of their fall was only protracted. A few months more must bring with them all the severity of the winter of those climes, and then, blocked up in a sea of ice,—exposed to all the rigour of cold,—all the miseries of hunger,—what effectual resistance could they oppose to the numerous bands of Indians who, availing themselves of the defenceless position of their enemies, would rush from every quarter to their destruction.

At the outset of these disheartening circumstances the officer had summoned his faithful crew together, and pointing out the danger and uncertainty of their position, stated that two chances of escape still remained to them. The first was by an attempt to accomplish the passage of the river Sinclair during some dark and boisterous night, when the Indians would be least likely to suspect such an intention: it was at this point that the efforts of their enemies were principally to be apprehended; but if, under cover of storm and darkness, they could accomplish this difficult passage, they would easily gain the Detroit, and thence pass into lake Erie, at the further extremity of which they might, favoured by Providence, effect a landing, and penetrate to the inhabited parts of the colony of New York. The other alternative was,—and he left it to themselves to determine,—to sink the vessel on the approach of winter, and throw themselves into the fort before them, there to await and share the destiny of its gallant defenders.

With the generous enthusiasm of their profession, the noble fellows had determined on the latter course. With their officer they fully coincided in opinion, that their ultimate hopes of life depended on the safe passage of the Sinclair; for it was but too obvious, that soon or late, unless some very extraordinary revolution should be effected in the intentions of the Indians, the fortress must be starved into submission. Still, as it was tolerably well supplied with provisions, this gloomy prospect was remote, and they were willing to run all chances with their friends on shore, rather than desert them in their extremity. The determination expressed by them, therefore, was, that when they could no longer keep the lake in safety, they would, if the officer permitted it, scuttle the vessel, and attempt an entrance into the fort, where they would share the fate of the troops, whatever it might chance to be.

No sooner was this resolution made known, than their young commander sought an opportunity of communicating with the garrison. This, however, was no very easy task; for, so closely was the fort hemmed in by the savages, it was impossible to introduce a messenger within its walls; and so sudden had been the cutting off of all communication between the vessel and the shore, that this thought had not even occurred to either commander to establish the most ordinary intelligence by signal. In this ultimate resource was had to an ingenious expedient. The despatches of the officer were enclosed in one of the long tin tubes in which were generally deposited the maps and charts of the schooner, and to this, after having been carefully soldered, was attached an inch rope of several hundred fathoms in length: the case was then put into one of the ship's guns, so placed as to give it the elevation of a mortar; thus prepared, advantage was taken of a temporary absence of the Indians to bring the vessel within half a mile of the shore, and when the attention of the garrison, naturally attracted by this unusual movement, was sufficiently awakened, that opportunity was chosen for the discharge of the gun; and as the quantity of powder had been proportionably reduced for the limited range, the tube was soon safely deposited within the rampart. The same means were adopted in replying; and, one end of the rope remaining attached to the schooner, all that was necessary was to solder up the tube as before, and throw it over the ramparts upon the sands, whence it was immediately pulled over her side by the watchful mariners.

As the despatch conveyed to the garrison, among other subjects of interest, bore the unwelcome intelligence that the supplies of the crew were nearly expended, an arrangement was proposed by which, at stated intervals, a more immediate communication with the former might be effected. Whenever, therefore, the wind permitted, the vessel was kept hovering in sight during the day, beneath the eyes of the savages, and on the approach of evening an unshotted gun was discharged, with a view of drawing their attention more immediately to her movements; every sail was then set, and under a cloud of canvass the course of the schooner was directed towards the source of the Sinclair, as if an attempt to accomplish that passage was to be made during the night. No sooner, however, had the darkness fairly set in, than the vessel was put about, and, beating against the wind, generally contrived to reach the offing at a stated hour, when a boat, provided with muffled oars, was sent off to the shore. This ruse had several times deceived the Indians, and it was on these occasions that the small gate to which we have alluded was opened, for the purpose of conveying the necessary supplies.

The buildings of the fort consisted chiefly of block-houses, the internal accommodations of which were fully in keeping with their rude exterior, being but indifferently provided with the most ordinary articles of comfort, and fitted up as the limited resources of that wild and remote district could supply. The best and most agreeably situated of these, if a choice could be made, was that of the commanding officer. This building rose considerably above the others, and overhanging that part of the rampart which skirted the shores of the Huron, commanded a full view of the lake, even to its extremity of frowning and belting forest.

To this block-house there were two staircases; the principal leading to the front entrance from the barrack-square, the other opening in the rear, close under the rampart, and communicating by a few rude steps with the small gate that led upon the sands. In the lower part of this building, appropriated by the commanding officer to that exclusive purpose, the official duties of his situation were usually performed; and on the ground-floor a large room, that extended from front to rear of the block-house on one side of the passage, had formerly been used as a hall of council with the Indian chiefs. The floor above this comprised both his own private apartments and those set apart for the general use of the family; but, above all, and preferable for their cheerful view over the lake, were others, which had been reserved for the exclusive accommodation of Miss de Haldimar. This upper floor consisted of two sleeping apartments, with a sitting-room, the latter extending the whole length of the block-house, and opening immediately upon the lake from the only two windows with which that side of the building was provided. The principal staircase led into one of the bed-rooms, and both of the latter communicated immediately with the sitting-room, which again, in its turn, opened, at the opposite extremity, on the narrow staircase that led to the rear of the block-house.

The furniture of this apartment, which might be taken as a fair sample of the best the country could afford, was wild, yet simple, in the extreme. Neat rush mats, of an oblong square, and fantastically put together, so as to exhibit in the weaving of the several coloured reeds both figures that were known to exist in the creation, and those which could have no being save in the imagination of their framers, served as excellent substitutes for carpets, while rush bottomed chairs, the product of Indian ingenuity also, occupied those intervals around the room that were unsupplied by the matting. Upon the walls were hung numerous specimens both of the dress and of the equipments of the savages, and mingled with these were many natural curiosities, the gifts of Indian chiefs to the commandant at various periods before the war.

Nothing could be more unlike the embellishments of a modern European boudoir than those of this apartment, which had, in some degree, been made the sanctum of its present occupants. Here was to be seen the scaly carcass of some huge serpent, extending its now harmless length from the ceiling to the floor—there an alligator, stuffed after the same fashion; and in various directions the skins of the beaver, the marten, the otter, and an infinitude of others of that genus, filled up spaces that were left unsupplied by the more ingenious specimens of Indian art. Head dresses tastefully wrought in the shape of the crowning bays of the ancients, and composed of the gorgeous feathers of the most splendid of the forest birds—bows and quivers, handsomely and even elegantly ornamented with that most tasteful of Indian decorations, the stained quill of the porcupine; war clubs of massive iron wood, their handles covered with stained horsehair and feathers, curiously mingled together—machecotis, hunting coats, mocassins, and leggings, all worked in porcupine quill, and fancifully arranged,—these, with many others, had been called into requisition to bedeck and relieve the otherwise rude and naked walls of the apartment.

Nor did the walls alone reflect back the picture of savage ingenuity, for on the various tables, the rude polish of which was hid from view by the simple covering of green baize, which moreover constituted the garniture of the windows, were to be seen other products of their art. Here stood upon an elevated stand a model of a bark canoe, filled with its complement of paddlers carved in wood and dressed in full costume; the latter executed with such singular fidelity of feature, that although the speaking figures sprung not from the experienced and classic chisel of the sculptor but from the rude scalping knife of the savage, the very tribe to which they belonged could be discovered at a glance by the European who was conversant with the features of each: then there were handsomely ornamented vessels made of the birch bark, and filled with the delicate sugars which the natives extract from the maple tree in early spring; these of all sizes, even to the most tiny that could well be imagined, were valuable rather as exquisite specimens of the neatness with which those slight vessels could be put together, stewn as they were merely with strips of the same bark, than from any intrinsic value they possessed. Covered over with fantastic figures, done either in paint, or in quill work artfully interwoven into the fibres of the bark, they presented, in their smooth and polished surface, strong evidence of the address of the savages in their preparation of this most useful and abundant produce of the country. Interspersed with these, too, were numerous stands filled with stuffed birds, some of which combined in themselves every variety and shade of dazzling plumage; and numerous rude cases contained the rarest specimens of the American butterfly, most of which were of sizes and tints that are nowhere equalled in Europe. One solitary table alone was appropriated to whatever were a transatlantic character in this wild and museum-like apartment. On this lay a Spanish guitar, a few pieces of old music, a collection of English and French books, a couple of writing desks, and, scattered over the whole, several articles of unfinished needle-work.

Such was the apartment in which Madeline and Clara de Haldimar were met at the moment we have selected for their introduction to our readers. It was the morning of that day on which the second council of the chiefs, the result of which has already been seen, was held at Detroit. The sun had risen bright and gorgeously above the adjacent forest, throwing his golden beams upon the calm glassy waters of the lake; and now, approaching rapidly towards the meridian, gradually diminished the tall bold shadows of the block-houses upon the shore. At the distance of about a mile lay the armed vessel so often alluded to; her light low hull dimly seen in the hazy atmosphere that danced upon the waters, and her attenuated masts and sloping yards, with their slight tracery cordage, recalling rather the complex and delicate ramifications of the spider's web, than the elastic yet solid machinery to which the lives of those within had so often been committed in sea and tempest. Upon the strand, and close opposite to the small gate which now stood ajar, lay one of her boats, the crew of which had abandoned her with the exception only of a single individual, apparently her cockswain, who, with the tiller under his arm, lay half extended in the stern sheets, his naked chest exposed, and his tarpaulin hat shielding his eyes from the sun while he indulged in profound repose. These were the only objects that told of human life. Every where beyond the eye rested on the faint outline of forest, that appeared like the softened tracing of a pencil at the distant junction of the waters with the horizon.

The windows that commanded this prospect were now open; and through that which was nearest to the gate, half reclined the elegant, slight form of a female, who, with an open letter in her hand, glanced her eye alternately, and with an expression of joyousness, towards the vessel that lay beyond, and the point in which the source of the Sinclair was known to lie. It was Clara de Haldimar.

Presently the vacant space at the same window was filled by another form, but of less girlish appearance—one that embraced all the full rich contour of the Medicean Venus, and a lazy languor in its movements that harmonised with the speaking outlines of the form, and without which the beauty of the whole would have been at variance and imperfect. The general expression, moreover, of a countenance which, closely analysed, could not be termed beautiful, marked a mind at once ardent in its conceptions, and steady and resolute in its silent accomplishments of purpose. She was of the middle height.

Such was the person of Madeline de Haldimar; but attractive, or rather winning, as were her womanly attributes, her principal power lay in her voice,—the beauty, nay, the voluptuousness of which nothing could surpass. It was impossible to listen to the slow, full, rich, deep, and melodious tones that fell trembling from her lips upon the ear, and not feel, aye shudder, under all their fascination on the soul. In such a voice might the Madonna of Raphael have been supposed to offer up her supplications from the gloomy precincts of the cloister. No wonder that Frederick de Haldimar loved her, and loved her with all the intense devotedness of his own glowing heart. His cousin was to him a divinity whom he worshipped in the innermost recesses of his being; and his, in return, was the only ear in which the accents of that almost superhuman voice had breathed the thrilling confession of an attachment, which its very tones announced could be deep and imperishable as the soul in which it had taken root. Often in the hours that preceded the period when they were to have been united, heart and mind and thought, in one common destiny, would he start from her side, his brain whirling with very intoxication, and then obeying another wild impulse, rush once more into her embrace; and clasping his beloved Madeline to his heart, entreat her again to pour forth all the melody of that confession in his enraptured ear. Artless and unaffected as she was generous and impassioned, the fond and noble girl never hesitated to gratify him whom alone she loved; and deep and fervent was the joy of the soldier, when he found that each passionate entreaty, far from being met with caprice, only drew from the lips of his cousin warmer and more affectionate expressions of her attachment. Such expressions, coming from any woman, must have been rapturous and soothing in the extreme; but, when they flowed from a voice whose very sound was melody, they acted on the heart of Captain de Haldimar with a potency that was as irresistible as the love itself which she inspired.

Such was the position of things just before the commencement of the Indian war. Madeline de Haldimar had been for some time on a visit to Detroit, and her marriage with her cousin was to have taken place within a few days. The unexpected arrival of intelligence from Michillimackinac that her father was dangerously ill, however, retarded the ceremony; and, up to the present period, their intercourse had been completely suspended. If Madeline de Haldimar was capable of strong attachment to her lover, the powerful ties of nature were no less deeply rooted in her heart, and commiseration and anxiety for her father now engrossed every faculty of her mind. She entreated her cousin to defer the solemnisation of their nuptials until her parent should be pronounced out of danger, and, having obtained his consent to the delay, instantly set off for Michillimackinac, accompanied by her cousin Clara, whom she had prevailed on the governor to part with until her own return. Hostilities were commenced very shortly afterwards, and, although Major de Haldimar speedily recovered from his illness, the fair cousins were compelled to share the common imprisonment of the garrison.

When Miss de Haldimar joined her more youthful cousin at the window, through which the latter was gazing thoughtfully on the scene before her, she flung her arm around her waist with the protecting manner of a mother. The mild blue eyes of Clara met those that were fastened in tenderness upon her, and a corresponding movement on her part brought the more matronly form of her cousin into close and affectionate contact with her own.

"Oh, Madeline, what a day is this!" she exclaimed; "and how often on my bended knees have I prayed to heaven that it might arrive! Our trials are ended at last, and happiness and joy are once more before us. There is the boat that is to conduct us to the vessel, which, in its turn, is to bear me to the arms of my dear father, and you to those of the lover who adores you. How beautiful does that fabric appear to me now! Never did I feel half the pleasure in surveying it I do at this moment."

"Dear, dear girl!" exclaimed Miss de Haldimar, and she pressed her closer and in silence to her heart: then, after a slight pause, during which the mantling glow upon her brow told how deeply she desired the reunion alluded to by her cousin—"that, indeed, will be an hour of happiness to us both, Clara; for irrevocably as our affections have been pledged, it would be silly in the extreme to deny that. I long most ardently to be restored to him who is already my husband. But, tell me," she concluded, with an archness of expression that caused the long-lashed eyes of her companion to sink beneath her own, "are you quite sincere in your own case? I know how deeply you love your father and your brothers, but do these alone occupy your attention? Is there not a certain friend of Charles whom you have some little curiosity to see also?"

"How silly, Madeline!" and the cheek of the young girl became suffused with a deeper glow; "you know I have never seen this friend of my brother, how then can I possibly feel more than the most ordinary interest in him? I am disposed to like him, certainly, for the mere reason that Charles does; but this is all."

"Well, Clara, I will not pretend to decide; but certain it is, this is the last letter you received from Charles, and that it contains the strongest recommendations of his friend to your notice. Equally certain is it, that scarcely a day has passed, since we have been shut up here, that you have not perused and re-perused it half a dozen times. Now, as I am confessedly one who should know something of these matters, I must be suffered to pronounce these are strong symptoms, to say the very least. Ah! Clara, that blush declares you guilty. But, who have we here? Middleton and Baynton."

The eyes of the cousins now fell upon the ramparts immediately under the window. Two officers, one apparently on duty for the day, were passing at the moment; and, as they heard their names pronounced, stopped, looked up, and saluted the young ladies with that easy freedom of manner, which, unmingled with either disrespect or effrontery, so usually characterises the address of military men.

"What a contrast, by heaven!" exclaimed he who wore the badge of duty suspended over his chest, throwing himself playfully into a theatrical attitude, expressive at once of admiration and surprise, while his eye glanced intelligently over the fair but dissimilar forms of the cousins. "Venus and Psyche in the land of the Potawatamies, by all that is magnificent! Come, Middleton, quick, out with that eternal pencil of yours, and perform your promise."

"And what may that promise be?" asked Clara, laughingly, and without adverting to the hyperbolic compliment of the dark-eyed officer who had just spoken.

"You shall hear," pursued the lively captain of the guard. "While making the tour of the ramparts just now, to visit my sentries, I saw Middleton leaning most sentimentally against one of the boxes in front, his note book in one hand and his pencil in the other. Curious to discover the subject of his abstraction, I stole cautiously behind him, and saw that he was sketching the head of a tall and rather handsome squaw, who, in the midst of a hundred others, was standing close to the gateway watching the preparations of the Indian ball players. I at once taxed him with having lost his heart; and rallying him on his bad taste in devoting his pencil to any thing that had a red skin, never combed his hair, and turned its toes in while walking, pronounced his sketch to be an absolute fright. Well, will you believe what I have to add? The man absolutely flew into a tremendous passion with me, and swore that she was a Venus, a Juno, a Minerva, a beauty of the first water in short; and finished by promising, that when I could point out any woman who was superior to her in personal attraction, he would on the instant write no less than a dozen consecutive sonnets in her praise. I now call upon him to fulfil his promise, or maintain the superiority of his Indian beauty."

Before the laughing Middleton could find time to reply to the light and unmeaning rattle of his friend, the quick low roll of a drum was heard from the front. The signal was understood by both officers, and they prepared to depart.

"This is the hour appointed for the council," said Captain Baynton, looking at his watch, "and I must be with my guard, to receive the chiefs with becoming honour. How I pity you, Middleton, who will have the infliction of one of their great big talks, as Murphy would call it, dinned into your ear for the next two hours at least! Thank heaven, my tour of duty exempts me from that; and by way of killing an hour, I think I shall go and carry on a flirtation with your Indian Minerva, alias Venus, alias Juno, while you are discussing the affairs of the nation with closed doors. But hark! there is the assembly drum again. We must be off. Come, Middleton, come. Adieu!" waving his hand to the cousins, "we shall meet at dinner."

"What an incessant talker Baynton is!" observed Miss de Haldimar, as the young men now disappeared round an angle of the rampart; "but he has reminded me of what I had nearly forgotten, and that is to give orders for dinner. My father has invited all the officers to dine with him to day, in commemoration of the peace which is being concluded. It will be the first time we shall have all met together since the commencement of this cruel war, and we must endeavour, Clara, to do honour to the feast."

"I hope," timidly observed her cousin, shuddering as she spoke, "that none of those horrid chiefs will be present, Madeline; for, without any affectation of fear whatever, I feel that I could not so far overcome my disgust as to sit at the same table with them. There was a time, it is true, when I thought nothing of these things; but, since the war, I have witnessed and heard so much of their horrid deeds, that I shall never be able to endure the sight of an Indian face again. Ah!" she concluded, turning her eyes upon the lake, while she clung more closely to the embrace of her companion; "would to heaven Madeline, that we were both at this moment gliding in yonder vessel, and in sight of my father's fort!"

CHAPTER XXI.

The eyes of Miss de Haldimar followed those of her cousin, and rested on the dark hull of the schooner, with which so many recollections of the past and anticipations of the future were associated in their minds. When they had last looked upon it, all appearance of human life had vanished from its decks; but now there was strong evidence of unusual bustle and activity. Numerous persons could be seen moving hastily to and fro, their heads just peering above the bulwarks; and presently they beheld a small boat move from the ship's side, and shoot rapidly ahead, in a direct line with the well-known bearings of the Sinclair's source. While they continued to gaze on this point, following the course of the light vessel, and forming a variety of conjectures as to the cause of a movement, especially remarkable from the circumstance of the commander being at that moment in the fort, whither he had been summoned to attend the council, another and scarcely perceptible object was dimly seen, at the distance of about half a mile in front of the boat. With the aid of a telescope, which had formed one of the principal resources of the cousins during their long imprisonment, Miss de Haldimar now perceived a dark and shapeless mass moving somewhat heavily along the lake, and in a line with the schooner and the boat. This was evidently approaching; for each moment it loomed larger upon the hazy water, increasing in bulk in the same proportion that the departing skiff became less distinct; still, it was impossible to discover, at that distance, in what manner it was propelled. Wind there was none, not as much as would have changed the course of a feather dropping through space, and, except where the dividing oars of the boatmen had agitated the waters, the whole surface of the lake was like a sea of pale and liquid gold.

At length the two dark bodies met, and the men in the boat were seen to lie upon their oars, while one in the stern seemed to be in the act of attaching a rope to the formless matter. For a few moments there was a cessation of all movement; and then again the active and sturdy rowing of the boatmen was renewed, and with an exertion of strength even more vigorous than that they had previously exhibited. Their course was now directed towards the vessel; and, as it gradually neared that fabric, the rope by which the strange looking object was secured, could be distinctly though faintly seen with the telescope. It was impossible to say whether the latter, whatever it might be, was urged by some invisible means, or merely floated in the wake of the boat; for, although the water through which it passed ran rippling and foaming from their course, this effect might have been produced by the boat which preceded it. As it now approached the vessel, it presented the appearance of a dense wood of evergreens, the overhanging branches of which descended close to the water's edge, and baffled every attempt of the cousins to discover its true character. The boat had now arrived within a hundred yards of the schooner, when a man was seen to rise from its bows, and, putting both his hands to his mouth, after the manner of sailors in hailing, to continue in that position for some moments, apparently conversing with those who were grouped along the nearest gangway. Then were observed rapid movements on the decks; and men were seen hastening aloft, and standing out upon the foremast yards. This, however, had offered no interruption to the exertions of the boatmen, who still kept plying with a vigour that set even the sailless vessel in motion, as the foaming water, thrown from their bending oar-blades, dashed angrily against her prow. Soon afterwards both the boat and her prize disappeared on the opposite side of the schooner, which, now lying with her broadside immediately on a line with the shore, completely hid them from the further view of the cousins.

"Look!—Look!" said Clara, clinging sensitively and with alarm to the almost maternal bosom against which she reposed, while she pointed with her finger to another dark mass that was moving through the lake in a circular sweep from the point of wood terminating the clearing on the right of the fort.

Miss de Haldimar threw the glass on the object to which her attention was now directed. It was evidently some furred animal, and presented all the appearance either of a large water-rat or a beaver, the latter of which it was pronounced to be as a nearer approach rendered its shape more distinct. Ever and anon, too, it disappeared altogether under the water; and, when it again came in sight, it was always several yards nearer. Its course, at first circuitous, at length took a direct line with the stern of the boat, where the sailor who was in charge still lay extended at his drowsy length, his tarpaulin hat shading his eyes, and his arms folded over his uncovered and heaving chest, while he continued to sleep as profoundly as if he had been comfortably berthed in his hammock in the middle of the Atlantic.

"What a large bold animal it is," remarked Clara, in the tone of one who wishes to be confirmed in an impression but indifferently entertained. "See how close it approaches the boat! Had that lazy sailor but his wits about him, he might easily knock it on the head with his oar. It is—it is a beaver, Madeline; I can distinguish its head even with the naked eye."

"Heaven grant it may be a beaver," answered Miss de Haldimar, in a voice so deep and full of meaning, that it made her cousin startle and turn paler even than before. "Nay, Clara, dearest, command yourself, nor give way to what may, after all, prove a groundless cause of alarm. Yet, I know not how it is, my heart misgives me sadly; for I like not the motions of this animal, which are strangely and unusually bold. But this is not all: a beaver or a rat might ruffle the mere surface of the water, yet this leaves behind it a deep and gurgling furrow, as if the element had been ploughed to its very bottom. Observe how the lake is agitated and discoloured wherever it has passed. Moreover, I dislike this sudden bustle on board the schooner, knowing, as I do, there is not an officer present to order the movements now visibly going forward. The men are evidently getting up the anchor; and see how her sails are loosened, apparently courting the breeze, as if she would fly to avoid some threatened danger. Would to heaven this council scene were over; for I do, as much as yourself, dearest Clara, distrust these cruel Indians!"

A significant gesture from her trembling cousin again drew her attention from the vessel to the boat. The animal, which now exhibited the delicate and glossy fur of the beaver, had gained the stern, and remained stationary within a foot of her quarter. Presently the sailor made a sluggish movement, turning himself heavily on his side, and with his face towards his curious and daring visitant. In the act the tarpaulin hat had fallen from his eyes, but still he awoke not. Scarcely had he settled himself in his new position, when, to the infinite horror of the excited cousins, a naked human hand was raised from beneath the surface of the lake, and placed upon the gunwale of the boat. Then rose slowly, and still covered with its ingenious disguise, first the neck, then the shoulders, and finally the form, even to the midwaist, of a dark and swarthy Indian, who, stooping low and cautiously over the sailor, now reposed the hand that had quitted the gunwale upon his form, while the other was thrust searchingly into the belt encircling his waist.

Miss de Haldimar would have called out, to apprise the unhappy man of his danger; but her voice refused its office, and her cousin was even less capable of exertion than herself. The deep throbbings of their hearts were now audible to each; for the dreadful interest they took in the scene, had excited their feelings to the most intense stretch of agony. At the very moment, however, when, with almost suspended animation, they expected to see the knife of the savage driven into the chest of the sleeping and unsuspecting sailor, the latter suddenly started up, and, instinct with the full sense of the danger by which he was menaced, in less time than we take to describe it, seized the tiller of his rudder, the only available instrument within his reach, and directing a powerful blow at the head of his amphibious enemy, laid him, without apparent life or motion, across the boat.

"Almighty God! what can this mean?" exclaimed Miss de Haldimar, as soon as she could recover her presence of mind. "There is some fearful treachery in agitation; and a cloud now hangs over all, that will soon burst with irresistible fury on our devoted heads. Clara, my love," and she conducted the almost fainting girl to a seat, "wait here until I return. The moment is critical, and my father must be apprised of what we have seen. Unless the gates of the fort be instantly closed, we are lost."

"Oh, Madeline, leave me not alone," entreated the sinking Clara. "We will go together. Perhaps I may be of service to you below."

"The thought is good; but have you strength and courage to face the dark chiefs in the council-room. If so, hasten there, and put my father on his guard, while I fly across the parade, and warn Captain Baynton of the danger."

With these words she drew the arm of her agitated cousin within her own, and, rapidly traversing the apartment, gained the bed-room which opened close upon the head of the principal staircase. Already were they descending the first steps, when a loud cry, that sent a thrill of terror through their blood, was heard from without the fort. For a moment Miss de Haldimar continued irresolute; and leaning against the rude balustrade for support, passed her hand rapidly across her brow, as if to collect her scattered energies. The necessity for prompt and immediate action was, however, evident; and she alone was capable of exertion. Speechless with alarm, and trembling in every joint, the unhappy Clara had now lost all command of her limbs; and, clinging close to the side of her cousin, by her wild looks alone betrayed consciousness had not wholly deserted her. The energy of despair lent more than woman's strength to Miss de Haldimar. She caught the fainting girl in her arms, retraced her way to the chamber, and depositing her burden on the bed, emphatically enjoined her on no account to move until her return. She then quitted the room, and rapidly descended the staircase.

For some moments all was still and hushed as the waveless air; and then again a loud chorus of shouts was heard from the ramparts of the fort. The choked breathing of the young girl became more free, and the blood rushed once more from her oppressed heart to the extremities. Never did tones of the human voice fall more gratefully on the ear of mariner cast on some desert island, than did those on that of the highly excited Clara. It was the loud laugh of the soldiery, who, collected along the line of rampart in front, were watching the progress of the ball-players. Cheered by the welcome sounds, she raised herself from the bed to satisfy her eye her ear had not deceived her. The windows of both bed-chambers looked immediately on the barrack square, and commanded a full view of the principal entrance. From that at which she now stood, the revived but still anxious girl could distinctly see all that was passing in front. The ramparts were covered with soldiers, who, armed merely with their bayonets, stood grouped in careless attitudes—some with their wives leaning on their arms—others with their children upraised, that they might the better observe the enlivening sports without—some lay indolently with their legs overhanging the works—others, assuming pugilistic attitudes, dealt their harmless blows at each other,—and all were blended together, men, women, and children, with that heedlessness of thought that told how little of distrust existed within their breasts. The soldiers of the guard, too, exhibited the same air of calm and unsuspecting confidence; some walking to and fro within the square, while the greater portion either mixed with their comrades above, or, with arms folded, legs carelessly crossed, and pipe in mouth, leant lazily against the gate, and gazed beyond the lowered drawbridge on the Indian games.

A mountain weight seemed to have been removed from the breast of Clara at this sight, as she now dropped upon her knees before the window, and raised her hands in pious acknowledgment to heaven.

"Almighty God, I thank thee," she fervently exclaimed, her eye once more lighting up, and her cheek half suffused with blushes at her late vague and idle fears; while she embraced, at a single glance, the whole of the gladdening and inspiring scene.

While her soul was yet returned whither her words had gone before, her ears were again assailed by sounds that curdled her blood, and made her spring to her feet as if stricken by a bullet through the heart, or powerfully touched by some electric fluid. It was the well-known and devilish war-cry of the savages, startling the very air through which it passed, and falling like a deadly blight upon the spirit. With a mechanical and desperate effort at courage, the unhappy girl turned her eyes below, and there met images of death in their most appalling shapes. Hurry and confusion and despair were every where visible; for a band of Indians were already in the fort, and these, fast succeeded by others, rushed like a torrent into the square, and commenced their dreadful work of butchery. Many of the terrified soldiers, without thinking of drawing their bayonets, flew down the ramparts in order to gain their respective block-houses for their muskets: but these every where met death from the crashing tomahawk, short rifle, or gleaming knife;—others who had presence of mind sufficient to avail themselves of their only weapons of defence, rushed down in the fury of desperation on the yelling fiends, resolved to sell their lives as dearly as possible; and for some minutes an obstinate contest was maintained: but the vast superiority of the Indian numbers triumphed; and although the men fought with all the fierceness of despair, forcing their way to the block-houses, their mangled corpses strewed the area in every direction. Neither was the horrid butchery confined to these. Women clinging to their husbands for protection, and, in the recklessness of their despair, impeding the efforts of the latter in their self-defence—children screaming in terror, or supplicating mercy on their bended knees—infants clasped to their parents' breasts,—all alike sunk under the un pitying steel of the blood-thirsty savages. At the guard-house the principal stand had been made; for at the first rush into the fort, the men on duty had gained their station, and, having made fast the barricades, opened their fire upon the enemy. Mixed pele-mele as they were with the Indians, many of the English were shot by their own comrades, who, in the confusion of the moment, were incapable of taking a cool and discriminating aim. These, however, were finally overcome. A band of desperate Indians rushed upon the main door, and with repeated blows from their tomahawks and massive war-clubs, succeeded in demolishing it, while others diverted the fire of those within. The door once forced, the struggle was soon over. Every man of the guard perished, and their scalpless and disfigured forms were thrown out to swell the number of those that already deluged the square with their blood.*

Even amid all the horrors of this terrific scene, the agonised Clara preserved her consciousness. The very imminence of the danger ended her with strength to embrace it under all its most disheartening aspects; and she, whose mind had been wrought up to the highest pitch of powerful excitement by the mere preliminary threatenings, was comparatively collected under the catastrophe itself. Death, certain death, to all, she saw was inevitable; and while her perception at once embraced the futility of all attempts at escape from the general doom, she snatched from despair the power to follow its gloomy details without being annihilated under their weight.

The confusion of the garrison had now reached its acme of horror. The shrieks of women and the shrill cries of children, as they severally and fruitlessly fled from the death certain to overtake them in the end,—the cursings of the soldiers, the yellings of the Indians, the reports of rifles, and the crashings of tomahawks;—these, with the stamping of human feet in the death struggle maintained in the council-room below between the chiefs and the officers, and which shook the block-house to its very foundation, all mixed up in terrible chorus together, might have called up a not inapt image of hell to the bewildered and confounding brain. And yet the sun shone in yellow lustre, and all nature smiled, and wore an air of calm, as if the accursed deed had had the sanction of heaven, and the spirits of light loved to look upon the frightful atrocities then in perpetration.

In the first distraction of her spirit, Clara had utterly lost all recollection of her cousin; but now that she had, with unnatural desperation, brought her mind to bear upon the fiercest points of the grim reality, she turned her eye every where amid the scene of death in search of the form of her beloved Madeline, whom she did not remember to have seen cross the parade in pursuance of the purpose she had named. While she yet gazed fearfully from the window, loud bursts of mingled anguish and rage, that were almost drowned in the fiercer yells with which they were blended, ascended from the ground floor of the block-house. These had hitherto been suppressed, as if the desperate attack of the chiefs on the officers had been made with closed doors. Now, however, there was an evident outburst of all parties into the passage; and there the struggle appeared to be desperately and fearfully maintained. In the midst of that chaotic scene, the loud and piercing shriek of a female rose far above the discordant yell even of the savages. There was an instant of pause, and then the crashing of a skull was heard, and the confusion was greater than before; shrieks, and groans, and curses, and supplications rent the air.

The first single shriek came from Madeline de Haldimar, and vibrated through every chord of the heart on which it sank. Scarcely conscious of what she did, Clara, quitting the window, once more gained the top of the staircase, and at the extremity of her voice called on the name of her cousin in the most piteous accents. She was answered by a loud shout from the yelling band; and presently bounding feet and screaming voices were heard ascending the stairs. The terrified girl fancied at the moment she heard a door open on the floor immediately below her, and some one dart suddenly up the flight communicating with the spot on which she stood. Without waiting to satisfy herself, she rushed with all the mechanical instinct of self-preservation back into her own apartment. As she passed the bed room window, she glanced once more hastily into the area below, and there beheld a sight that, filling her soul with despair, paralysed all further exertion. A tall savage was bearing off the apparently lifeless form of her cousin through the combatants in the square, her white dress stained all over with blood, and her beautiful hair loosened and trailing on the ground. She followed with her burning eyes until they passed the drawbridge, and finally disappeared behind the intervening rampart, and then bowing her head between her hands, and sinking upon her knees, she reposed her forehead against the sill of the window, and awaited unshrinkingly, yet in a state of inconceivable agony, the consummation of her own unhappy destiny.

The sounds of ascending feet were now heard in the passage without; and presently, while the clangour of a thousand demons seemed to ring throughout the upper part of the building, a man rushed furiously into the room. The blood of the young girl curdled in her veins. She mechanically grasped the ledge of the window on which her aching head still reposed, and with her eyes firmly closed, to shut out from view the fiend whose sight she dreaded, even more than the death which threatened her, quietly awaited the blow that was to terminate at once her misery and her life. Scarcely, however, had the feet of the intruder pressed the sanctuary of her bedchamber, when the heavy door, strongly studded with nails, was pushed rapidly to, and bolt and lock were heard sliding into their several sockets. Before Clara could raise her head to discover the cause of this movement, she felt herself firmly secured in the grasp of an encircling arm, and borne hastily through the room. An instinctive sense of something worse even than death now flashed across the mind of the unhappy girl; and while she feared to unclose her eyes, she struggled violently to disengage herself.

"Clara! dear Miss de Haldimar, do you not know me?" exclaimed her supporter, while placing her for a moment on a seat, he proceeded to secure the fastenings of the second door, that led from the bedchamber into the larger apartment.

Re-assured by the tones of a voice which, even in that dreadful moment of trial and destruction, were familiar to her ear, the trembling girl opened her eyes wildly upon her protector. A slight scream of terror marked her painful sense of the recognition. It was Captain Baynton whom she beheld: but how unlike the officer who a few minutes before had been conversing with her from the ramparts. His fine hair, matted with blood, now hung loosely and disfiguringly over his eyes, and his pallid face and brow were covered with gore spots, the evident splatterings from the wounds of others; while a stream that issued from one side of his head attested he himself had not escaped unhurt in the cruel mêlée. A skirt and a lapel had been torn from his uniform, which, together with other portions of his dress, were now stained in various parts by the blood continually flowing from his wound.

"Oh, Captain Baynton," murmured the fainting girl, her whole soul sinking within her, as she gazed shudderingly on his person, "is there no hope for us? must we die?"

"No, by heaven, not while I have strength to save you," returned the officer, with energy. "If the savages have not penetrated to the rear, we may yet escape. I saw the postern open just now, on my passage round the rampart, and the boat of the schooner upon the strand. Ha!" he exclaimed, as he flew to the window, and cast his eye rapidly below, "we are lost! The gate is still clear, and not an Indian to be seen; but the coward sailor is pulling for his life towards the vessel. But hold! another boat is now quitting the ship's side. See, how manfully they give themselves to the oars: in a few minutes they will be here. Come, Clara, let us fly!" and again he caught her in his arms, and bore her across the room. "Hark, hear you not the exulting yellings of the monsters? They are forcing the outer door: mark how they redouble their efforts to break it open! That passed, but one more barrier remains between us and inevitable and instant death."

"And my cousin, my uncle!" shrieked the unhappy girl, as the officer now bore her rapidly down the back staircase.

"Oh, ask me not!" exclaimed Baynton: "were I to linger again on all I have witnessed, I should go mad. All, all have perished! but, hark!"

A tremendous yell now bursting from the passage, announced at once the triumph of the savages in having effected an entrance into the bed-room, and their disappointment at finding their pursuit balked by a second door. Presently afterwards their heavy weapons were to be heard thundering at this new obstacle, in the most furious manner. This gave new stimulus to the exertions of the generous officer. Each winding of the staircase was familiar to him, and he now descended it with a rapidity which, considering the burden that reposed against his chest, could only have been inspired by his despair. The flight terminated at a door that led directly upon the rampart, without communicating with any of the passages of the building; and in this consisted the principal facility of escape: for, in order to reach them, the savages must either make the circuit of the block-house, or overtake them in the course they were now following. In this trying emergency, the presence of mind of the young officer, wounded and bleeding as he was, did not desert him. On quitting the larger apartment above, he had secured the outside fastenings of a small door at the top of the stairs, and having now gained the bottom, he took a similar precaution. All that remained was to unclose the bolts of the ponderous door that opened upon their final chance of escape: this was speedily done, but here the feelings of the officer were put to a severe test. A rude partition divided him from the fatal council-room; and while he undid the fastenings, the faint and dying groans of his butchered brother officers rung in his ears, even at the moment that he felt his feet dabbled in the blood that oozed through the imperfectly closed planks of which the partition was composed. As for Clara, she was insensible to all that was passing. From the moment of the Indian yell, announcing their entry into the bed-room, she had fainted.

The huge door came now creaking back upon its hinges, when the sounds of the yet unfinished conflict in front, which had hitherto been deadened in their descent through the remote staircase, rang once more fiercely and startlingly upon the ear. A single glance satisfied Captain Baynton the moment for exertion was come, and that the way to the lake shore, which, by some strange oversight, both the Indians and the men had overlooked, was perfectly clear. He clasped his unconscious burden closer to his chest, and then, setting his life upon the cast, hastened down the few steps that led to the rampart, and dashed rapidly through the postern; in the next minute he stood on the uttermost verge of the sands, unharmed and unfollowed. He cast his eyes anxiously along the surface of the lake; but such was the excitement and confusion of his mind, produced by the horrid recollection of the past scene, it was not until he had been abruptly hailed from it, he could see a boat, at the distance of about two hundred yards, the crew of which were lying on their oars. It was the long-boat of the schooner, which, prevented from a nearer approach by a sand bar that ran along the lake to a considerable extent, had taken her station there to receive the fugitives. Two tall young men in the dress, yet having little the mien, of common sailors, were standing up in her stern; and one of these, with evident anxiety in his manner, called on Baynton by name to make the best of his way to the boat. At that moment a loud and frantic yell came from the block-house the latter had just quitted. In the wild impulse of his excited feelings, he answered with a cheer of defiance, as he turned to discover the precise point whence it proceeded. The windows of the apartment so recently occupied by the unhappy cousins, were darkened with savage forms, who now pealed forth their mingled fury and disappointment in the most terrific manner.

"Fly, fly, Baynton, or you are lost!" exclaimed the same voice from the boat; "the devils are levelling from the windows."

While he yet spake, several shots came whizzing along the waters, and a spent ball even struck the now rapidly fleeing officer in the back; but the distance was too great for serious injury. The guns of the savages had been cut so short for their desperate enterprise, that they carried little further than a horse pistol.

Again, in the desperation of his feelings, and heedless of the danger he was drawing on himself and charge, the officer turned fiercely round and shouted, at his utmost lungs, a peal of triumph in the ears of his enemies. Scarcely, however, had the sounds escaped his lips, when two hideously painted Indians sprang through the postern, and, silent as the spectres they resembled, rushed down the sands, and thence into the lake. Loud shouts from the windows above were again pealed forth, and from the consternation visible on the features of those within the boat, the nearly exhausted Baynton learnt all the risk he incurred. Summoning all his strength, he now made the most desperate efforts to reach his friends. The lake was little more than knee deep from the shore to the bar, but, encumbered as he was, the difficulty opposed to his movements was immeasurably against him, and yet he seemed generously resolved rather to perish than relinquish his charge. Already were his pursuers, now closely followed by a numerous band, within twenty yards of him, when the two young men, each armed with a cutlass and pistol, sprang from the boat upon the sand bar: as the Indians came on they fired deliberately at them, but both missed their aim. Encouraged by this failure, the fearless devils dashed eagerly on, brandishing their gleaming tomahawks, but uttering not a sound. Already was the unfortunate Baynton within a few feet of the bar, when he felt that the savages were immediately upon him.

"Take, take, for God's sake, take her!" he cried, with a desperate effort he threw the light form of the still unconscious girl into the arms of one of the young men. "My strength is quite exhausted, and I can do no more."

For the first time a yell burst from the lips of the pursuing savages, as they saw him, to whom the guardianship of the wretched Clara was now confided, suddenly spring from the sand bar into the lake, and in a few rapid strokes gain the side of the boat. Leaving the hapless Baynton to be disposed of by his companion, the foremost darted upon the bank, burning with disappointment, and resolved to immolate another victim. For a moment he balanced his tomahawk, and then with the rapidity of thought, darted it at the covered head of the youth who still lingered on the bar. A well-timed movement of the latter averted the blow, and the whizzing steel passed harmlessly on. A guttural "ugh!" marked the disappointment of the Indian, now reduced to his scalping-knife; but before he could determine whether to advance or to retreat, his opponent had darted upon him, and with a single blow from his cutlass, cleft his skull nearly asunder. The next instantaneous purpose of the victor was to advance to the rescue of the exhausted Baynton; but, when he turned to look for him, he saw the mangled form of what had once been that gallant and handsome officer floating, without life or motion, on the blood-stained surface of the Huron, while his fiercest murderer, calmly awaiting the approach of his companions, held up the reeking scalp, in triumph, to the view of the still yelling groups within the block-house.

"Noble, generous, self-devoted fellow!" exclaimed the youth, as he fixed his burning tearless eye for a moment on the unfortunate victim; "even you, then, are not spared to tell the horrid story of this butchery; yet is the fate of the fallen far, far more enviable than that of those who have survived this day." He then committed his cutlass to its sheath; and, leaping into the deep water that lay beyond the bar, was, in a few seconds, once more in the stern of the boat.

Meanwhile, the numerous band, who followed their two first fierce comrades into the lake, bounded rapidly forward: and, so active were their movements, that, at almost the same moment when the second of the youths had gained his temporary place of refuge, they stood yelling and screaming on the sand bar he had just quitted. Two or three, excited to desperation by the blood they had seen spilt, plunged unhesitatingly into the opposite depths of the lake; and the foremost of these was the destroyer of the ill-fated Baynton. With his bloody scalping-knife closely clutched between his teeth, and his tomahawk in his right hand, this fierce warrior buffeted the waves lustily with one arm, and, noiselessly as in the early part of his pursuit, urged his way towards the boat. In the stern of this a few planks from the schooner had been firmly lashed, to serve as a shield against the weapons of the savages, and was so arranged as to conceal all within while retiring from the shore. A small aperture had, however, been bored for the purpose of observing the movements of the enemy without risk. Through this an eye was now directed, while only the blades of the oars were to be seen projecting from the boat's sides as they reposed in their rowlocks. Encouraged by the seeming apathy and inertness of the crew, the swimming savages paused not to consider of consequences, but continued their daring course as if they had apprehended neither risk nor resistance. Presently a desperate splash was heard near the stern of the boat, and the sinuous form of the first savage was raised above the gunwale, his grim face looking devilish in its smeared war-paint, and his fierce eyes gleaming and rolling like fire-balls in their sockets. Scarcely was he seen, however, when he had again disappeared. A blow from the cutlass that had destroyed his companion descended like lightning on his naked and hairless head; and, in the agony of death, he might be seen grinding his teeth against the knife which the instinctive ferocity of his nature forbade his relinquishing. A yell of fury burst from the savages on the bar, and presently a shower of bullets ran whistling through the air. Several were heard striking the rude rampart in the stern; but, although the boat was scarcely out of pistol-shot, the thickness of the wood prevented injury to those within. Another fierce yell followed this volley; and then nearly a score of warriors, giving their guns in charge to their companions, plunged furiously into the water; and, with an air of the most infuriated determination, leaped rather than swam along its surface.

"Now, then, my lady, give way," said he at the lookout; "there are more than a dozen of the devils in full cry; and our only chance is in flight! Ha! another here!" as, turning to issue these directions, he chanced to see the dark hand of a savage at that moment grasping the gunwale of the boat, as if with a view to retard her movements until the arrival of his companions.

A heavy blow from his cutlass accompanied these words. The fingers, divided at their very roots, rolled to the bottom of the boat, and the carcass of the savage dropped, with a yell of anguish, far in the rear. The heavy oar-blades of the seamen now made play, dashing the lake away in sheets of foam; and, in less than five minutes, the heads of the swimming savages were seen mingling like so many rats upon the water, as they returned once more in disappointment from their fruitless pursuit.

CHAPTER XXII.

The sun had gone down, as he had risen, in all the glories of his autumnal splendour, and twilight was now fast descending on the waters of the Huron. A slight breeze was just beginning to make itself felt from the land, the gradual rising of which was hailed by many an anxious heart, as the schooner, which had been making vain attempts to quit her anchorage during the day, now urged her light bows through the slightly curling element. A death-like silence, interrupted only by the low gruff voice of a veteran seaman, as he issued, in technical language, the necessary orders for the management of the vessel, prevailed every where along her decks. The dress and general appearance of this individual announced him for a petty officer of the royal service; and it was evident, from the tone of authority with which he spoke, he was now in the enjoyment of a temporary command. The crew, consisting of about thirty souls, and chiefly veterans of the same class, were assembled along the gangways, each man wearing a brace of pistols in the belt, which, moreover, secured a naked cut-throat around his loins; and these now lingered near the several guns that were thrown out from their gloomy looking ports, as if ready for some active service. But, although the arming of these men indicated hostile preparation, there was none of that buoyancy of movement and animation of feature to be observed, which so usually characterise the indomitable daring of the British sailor. Some stood leaning their heads pensively on their hands against the rigging and hammocks that were stowed away along the bulwarks, after the fashion of war ships in boarding; others, with arms tightly folded across their chests, gazed earnestly and despondingly on the burning fort in the distance, amid the rolling volumes of smoke and flame from which, ever and anon, arose the fiendish yell of those who, having already sucked, were now reducing it to ashes. Nor was this the only object of their attention. On the sand bank alluded to in our last chapter were to be dimly seen through the growing dusk, the dark outlines of many of the savages, who, frantic with rage at their inability to devote them to the same doom, were still unwilling to quit a spot which approached them nearest to the last surviving objects of their enmity. Around this point were collected numerous canoes, filled also with warriors; and, at the moment when the vessel, obeying the impulse given by her flowing sails, glided from her anchorage, these followed, scudding in her wake, and made a show of attacking her in the stern. The sudden yawing of the schooner, however, in bringing her tier of bristling ports into view, had checked the ardour of the pursuing fleet; and the discharge of a single gun, destroying in its course three of their canoes, and carrying death among those who directed them, had driven them back, in the greatest hurry and confusion, to their yelling and disappointed comrades.

The after-deck of the schooner presented a different, though not less sombre and discouraging scene. On a pile of mattresses lay the light and almost inanimate form of Clara de Haldimar; her fair and redundant hair overshadowing her pallid brow and cheek, and the dress she had worn at the moment of her escape from the fort still spotted with the blood of her generous but unfortunate preserver. Close at her side, with her hands clasped in his, while he watched the expression of deep suffering reflected from each set feature, and yet with the air of one pre-occupied with some other subject of painful interest, sat, on an empty shot-box, the young man in sailor's attire, whose cutlass had performed the double service of destroying his own immediate opponent, and avenging the death of the devoted Baynton. At the head of the rude couch, and leaning against a portion of the schooner's stern-work, stood his companion, who from delicacy appeared to have turned away his eyes from the group below, merely to cast them vacantly on the dark waters through which the vessel was now beginning to urge her course.

Such was the immediate position of this little party, when the gun fired at the Indians was heard booming heavily along the lake. The loud report, in exciting new sources of alarm, seemed to have dissipated the spell that had hitherto chained the energies and perception of the still weak, but now highly excited girl.

"Oh, Captain Baynton, where are we?" she exclaimed, starting up suddenly in terror, and throwing her arms around him who sat at her side, as if she would have clung to him for protection. "Is the horrid massacre not finished yet? Where is Madeline? where is my cousin? Oh, I cannot leave the fort without her."

"Ha! where indeed is she?" exclaimed the youth, as he clasped his trembling and scarcely conscious burden to his chest, "Almighty God, where is she?" Then, after a short pause, and in a voice of tender but exquisite anguish, "Clara, my beloved sister, do you not know me? It is not Baynton but your brother, who now clasps you to his breaking heart."

A deluge of tears was the only answer of the wretched girl. They were the first she had shed,—the first marks of consciousness she had exhibited. Hitherto her heart had been oppressed; every fibre of her brain racked almost to bursting, and filled only with ghastly fitting visions of the dreadful horrors she had seen perpetrated, she had continued, since the moment of her fainting in the block-house, as one bereft of all memory of the past, or apprehension of the present. But now, the full outpouring of her grief relieved her overcharged brain and heart, even while the confused images floating before her recollection acquired a more tangible and painful character. She raised herself a moment from the chest on which her burning head reposed, looked steadfastly in the face that hung anxiously over her own, and saw indeed that it was her brother. She tried to speak, but she could not utter a word, for the memory of all that had occurred that fatal morning rushed with mountain weight upon her fainting spirit, and again she wept, and more bitterly than before.

The young man pressed her in silence to his chest; nor was it until she had given full vent to her grief, that he ventured to address her on the subject of his own immediate sorrows. At length, when she appeared somewhat calm, he observed, in a voice broken by emotion,—

"Clara, dearest, what account have you to give me of Madeline? Has she shared the fate of all? or have you reason to suppose her life has been spared?"

Another burst of tears succeeded to these questions, for coupled with the name of her cousin arose all the horrid associations connected with her loss. As soon, however, as she could compose herself, she briefly stated all she had witnessed of the affair, from the moment when the boat of the schooner was seen to meet the strange looking object on the water, to that when she had beheld her ill-fated cousin borne away apparently lifeless in the arms of the tall Indian by whom she had been captured.

During this recital, the heart of Captain de Haldimar,—for it was he,—beat audibly against the cheek that still reposed on his breast; but when his sister had, in a faint voice, closed her melancholy narrative with the manner of her cousin's disappearance, he gave a sudden start, uttering at the same time an exclamation of joy.

"Thank God, she still lives!" he cried, pressing his sister once more in fondness to his heart; then turning to his companion, who, although seemingly abstracted, had been a silent and attentive witness of the scene,—"By heaven! Valletort, there is yet a hope. She it was indeed whom we saw borne out of the fort, and subsequently made to walk by the cruel Indian who had charge of her."

"Valletort, Valletort," murmured Clara unconsciously, her sick heart throbbing with she knew not what. "How is this, Frederick?—Where, then, is Captain Baynton? and how came you here?"

"Alas! Clara, poor Baynton is no more. Even at the moment when he confided the unconscious burden, preserved at the peril of his own life, to the arms of Sir Everard here, he fell beneath the tomahawk of a pursuing savage. Poor, noble, generous Baynton," he continued, mournfully; "to him, indeed, Clara, are you indebted for your life; yet was it purchased at the price of his own."

Again the pained and affectionate girl wept bitterly, and her brother proceeded:—

"The strange object you saw on the lake, my love, was nothing more than a canoe disguised with leafy boughs, in which Sir Everard Valletort and myself, under the guidance of old François of the Fleur de lis, whom you must recollect, have made the dangerous passage of the Sinclair in the garb of duck hunters,—which latter we had only discarded on reaching the schooner, in order to assume another we conceived better suited to our purpose. Alas!" and he struck his hand violently against his brow, "had we made directly for the shore without touching the vessel at all, there might have been time to save those we came to apprise of their danger. Do you not think there was, Valletort?"

"Most assuredly not," returned his companion, anxious to remove the impression of self-blame that existed in the mind of Captain de Haldimar. "From the moment of our reaching the schooner, which lay immediately in our route, to that when the shout was raised by the savages as they rushed into the fort, there was scarcely an interval of three minutes; and it would have required a longer period to have enabled us even to gain the shore."

"Thank, thank you for that!" exclaimed the officer, drawing himself up with the air of one who breathes more freely. "I would not, for the wealth and honours of the united world, that such a cause for self-reproach should linger on my mind. By heaven! it would break my heart to think we had been in time to save them, and yet had lost the opportunity through even one moment of neglect." Then turning once more to his sister,—"Now, Clara, that I see you in safety, I have another sacred duty to perform. I must leave you, but not alone."

"What mean you, Frederick?" exclaimed his agitated sister, clinging more closely to his embrace. "Scarce have we met, and you talk of leaving me. Oh, whither would you go?"

"Surely, my love," and he spoke half reproachfully, although with tenderness of accent, "my meaning must be obvious. But what do I say? You know it not. Madeline still lives. We saw her, as we pulled towards the shore, led across the clearing in the direction of Chabouiga. Hear me, then: the canoe in which we came is still towing from the vessel's stern, and in this do I mean to embark, without further loss of time, in search of her who is dearer to me than existence. I know," he pursued with emotion, "I have but little hope of rescuing, even if I do succeed in finding her: but at least I shall not have to suffer under the self-reproach of having neglected the only chance that now lies within my reach. If she be doomed to die, I shall then have nothing left to live for—except you, Clara," he concluded, after a pause, pressing the weeping girl to his heart, as he remarked how much she seemed pained by the declaration.

Having placed his sister once more on the couch, and covered her with a cloak that had been brought from the cabin of the unfortunate commander, Captain de Haldimar now rose from his humble seat, and grasping the hand of his friend,—

"Valletort," he said, "I commit this dear girl to your keeping. Hitherto we have been equal sharers in an enterprise having for its object the preservation of our mutual companions and friends. At present, interests of a more personal nature occupy my attention; and to these I must devote myself alone. I trust you will reach Detroit in safety; and when you have delivered my unfortunate sister into the arms of her father, you will say to him from me, I could not survive the loss of that being to whom I had sworn eternal fidelity and affection. François must be my only companion on this occasion. Nay," he continued, pointing to his sister, in answer to the rising remonstrance of the baronet, "will you desert the precious charge I have confided to your keeping? Recollect, Valletort," in a more subdued tone, "that besides yourself, there will be none near her but rude and uneducated sailors;—honest men enough in their way, it is true; but not the sort of people to whom I should like to confide my poor sister."

The warm and silent pressure by Sir Everard of his hand announced his participation in the sentiment; and Captain de Haldimar now hastened forward to apprise the Canadian of his purpose. He found mine host of the Fleur de lis seated in the fore-castle of the schooner; and with an air of the most perfect unconcern discussing a substantial meal, consisting of dried uncooked venison, raw onions, and Indian corn bread, the contents of a large bag or wallet that lay at his feet. No sooner, however, had the impatient officer communicated his design, asking at the same time if he might expect his assistance in the enterprise, than the unfinished meal of the Canadian was discontinued, the wallet refilled, and the large greasy clasp-knife with which the portions had been separated, closed and thrust into a pocket of his blanket coat!

"I shall go to de devils for you, capitaine, if we must," he said, as he raised his portly form, not without effort, from the deck, slapping the shoulder of the officer at the same time somewhat rudely with his hand. There was nothing, however, offensively familiar in this action. It expressed merely the devotedness of heart with which the man lent himself to the service to which he had pledged himself, and was rather complimentary than otherwise to him to whom it was directed. Captain de Haldimar took it in the light in which we have just shown it, and he grasped and shook the rough hand of the Canadian with an earnestness highly gratifying to the latter.

Every thing was now in readiness for their departure. The canoe, still covered with its streaming boughs, was drawn close up to the gangway, and a few hasty necessities thrown in. While this was passing, the officer had again assumed his disguise of a duck-hunter; and he now appeared in the blanket costume in which we introduced Sir Everard and himself in the eleventh chapter.

"If I may be so bold as to put in my oar, your honour,"—said the veteran boatswain, on whom the command of the schooner had fallen, as he now advanced, rolling his quid in his mouth, and dropping his hat on his shoulder, while the fingers of the hand which clutched it were busily occupied in scratching his bald head,— "if I may be so bold, there is another chap here as might better serve your honour's purpose than that 'ere fat Canadian, who seems to think only of stuffing while his betters are fasting."

"And who is he, my good Mullins?" asked Captain de Haldimar.

"Why, that 'ere Indian, your honour, as began the butchery in the fort, yonder, by trying to kill Jack Fuller while he laid asleep this morning, waiting for the captain in the jolly boat. Jack never seed him coming, until he felt his black hands upon his throat, and then he ups with the tiller at his noddle, and sends him floundering across the boat's thwart like a flat-fish. I thought, your honour, seeing as how I have got the command of the schooner, of tying him up to the mainmast, and giving him two or three round dozen or so, and then sending him to swim among the mackerel with a twenty-four pound shot in his neckcloth; but, seeing as how your honour is going among them savages again, I thought as how some good might be done with him, if your honour could contrive to keep him in tow, and close under your lee quarter, to prevent his escape."

"At all events," returned the officer, after a pause of some moments, during which he appeared to be deliberating on his course of action, "it may be dangerous to keep him in the vessel; and yet, if we take him ashore, he may be the means of our more immediate destruction; unless, indeed, as you observe, he can be so secured as to prevent the possibility of escape; but that I very much doubt indeed. Where is he, Mullins? I should like to see and question him."

"He shall be up, your honour, in no time," replied the sailor, once more resuming his hat, and moving a pace or two forward. Then addressing two or three men in the starboard gangway in the authoritative tone of command:—"Bear a hand there, my men, and cast off the lashings of that black Indian, and send him aft, here, to the officer."

The order was speedily executed. In a few minutes the Indian stood on the quarter-deck, his hands firmly secured behind, and his head sunk upon his chest in sullen despondency. In the increasing gloom in which objects were now gradually becoming more and more indistinct, it was impossible for Captain de Haldimar to distinguish his features; but there was something in the outline of the Indian's form that impressed him with the conviction he had seen it before. Advancing a pace or two forward, he pronounced, in an emphatic and audible whisper, the name of "Oucanasta!"

The Indian gave an involuntary start,—uttered a deep interjectional "Ugh!"—and, raising his head from his chest, fixed his eye heavily on the officer.

"Hookynaster!—Hookynaster!" growled Jack Fuller, who had followed to hear the examination of his immediate captive: "why, your honour, that jaw-breaking name reminds me as how the chap had a bit of a paper when I chucked him into the jolly boat, stuck in his girdle. It was covered over with pencil-marks, as writing like; but all was rubbed out agin, except some such sort of a name as that."

"Where is it?—what have you done with it?" hastily asked Captain de Haldimar.

"Here, in my backy-box, your honour. I kept it safe, thinking as how it might serve to let us know all about it afterwards."

The sailor now drew from the receptacle just named a dirty piece of folded paper, deeply impregnated with the perfume of stale and oft re-chewed quids of coarse tobacco; and then, with the air of one conscious of having "rendered the state some service," hitched up his trousers with one hand, while with the other he extended the important document.

To glance his eye hurriedly over the paper by the light of a dark lantern that had meanwhile been brought upon deck, unclasp his hunting-knife, and divide the ligatures of the captive, and then warmly press his liberated hands within his own, were, with Captain de Haldimar, but the work of a minute.

"Hilloo! which the devil way does the wind blow now?" muttered Fuller, the leer of self-satisfaction that had hitherto played in his eye rapidly giving place to an air of seriousness and surprise; an expression that was not at all diminished by an observation from his new commander.

"I tell you what it is, Jack," said the latter, impressively: "I don't pretend to have more gumption (qu. discernment?) than my messmates; but I can see through a millstone as clear as any man as ever heaved a lead in these here lakes; and may I never pipe boatswain's whistle again, if you ar'n't, some how or other, in the wrong box. That 'ere Indian's one of us!"

The feelings of Captain de Haldimar may easily be comprehended by our readers, when, on glancing at the paper, he found himself confirmed in the impression previously made on him by the outline of the captive's form. The writing, nearly obliterated by damp, had been rudely traced by his own pencil, on a leaf torn from his pocket-book on the night of his visit to the Indian encampment, and at the moment when, seated on the fatal log, Oucanasta had generously promised her assistance in at least rescuing his betrothed bride. They were addressed to Major de Haldimar, and briefly stated that a treacherous plan was in contemplation by the enemy to surprise the fort, which the bearer, Oucanasta (the latter word strongly marked), would fully explain, if she could possibly obtain access within. From the narrative entered into by Clara, who had particularly dwelt on the emotions of fear that had sprung up in her own and cousin's heart by the sudden transformation of a supposed harmless beaver into a fierce and threatening savage, he had no difficulty in solving the enigma.

The Indian, in whom he had recognised the young chief who had saved him from the fury of Wacosta, had evidently been won upon by his sister to perform a service which offered so much less difficulty to a warrior than to a woman; and it was clear, that, finding all other means of communication with the fort, undiscovered by his own people, impracticable, he had availed himself of the opportunity, when he saw the boat waiting on the strand, to assume a disguise so well adapted to insure success. It was no remarkable thing to see both the beaver and the otter moving on the calm surface of the waters in the vicinity of the forts, even at mid-day; and, occupied as the Indians were, to a man, at that moment with their cruel projects, it was by no means likely that their attention should have been called off from these to so apparently unimportant a circumstance. The act that had principally alarmed the cousins, and terminated, as we have seen, in the sudden attack of the sailor, had evidently been misconceived. The hand supposed to be feeling for the heart of the sluggard, had, in all probability, been placed on his chest with a view to arouse him from his slumber; while that which was believed to have been dropt to the handle of his knife, was, in reality, merely seeking the paper that contained the announcement, which, if then delivered, might have saved the garrison.

Such was the train of conjecture that now passed through the mind of the officer; but, although he thus placed the conduct of the Indian in the most favourable light, his impression received no confirmation from the lips of the latter. Sullen and doggedly, notwithstanding the release from his bonds, the Ottawa hung his head upon his chest, with his eyes riveted on the deck, and obstinately refused to answer every question put to him by his deliverer. This, however, did not the less tend to confirm Captain de Haldimar in his belief. He knew enough of the Indian character, to understand the indignant, and even revengeful spirit likely to be aroused by the treatment the savage had met with in return for his intended services. He was aware that, without pausing to reflect on the fact, that the sailor, ignorant of his actual purpose, could merely have seen in him an enemy in the act of attempting his life, the chief would only consider and inflame himself over the recollection of the blow inflicted; and that, with the true obstinacy of his race, he would rather suffer captivity or death itself, than humble the haughty pride of his nature, by condescending to an explanation with those by whom he felt himself so deeply injured. Still, even amid all his own personal griefs,—griefs that rendered the boon in some degree at present valueless,—Captain de Haldimar could not forget that the youth, no matter by what motive induced, had rescued him from a dreadful death on a previous occasion. With the generous warmth, therefore, of a grateful mind, he now sought to impress on the Indian the deep sense of obligation under which he laboured; explaining at the same time the very natural error into which the sailor had fallen, and concluding with a declaration that he was free to quit the vessel in the canoe in which he himself was about to take his departure for the shore, in search of her whom his sister had pledged herself, at all hazards, to save.

The address of the officer, touching and impressive as language ever is that comes from the heart, was not altogether without effect on the Indian. Several times he interrupted him with a short, quick, approving "Ugh!" and when he at length received the assurance that he was no longer a prisoner, he raised his eyes rapidly, although without moving his head, to the countenance of his deliverer. Already were his lips opening to speak for the first time, when the attention of the group around him was arrested by his giving a sudden start of surprise. At the same moment he raised his head, stretched his neck, threw forward his right ear, and, uttering a loud and emphatic "Waugh!" pointed with his finger over the bows of the vessel.

All listened for upwards of a minute in mute suspense; and then a faint and scarcely distinguishable sound was heard in the direction in which he pointed. Scarcely had it floated on the air, when a shrill, loud, and prolonged cry, of peculiar tendency, burst hurriedly and eagerly from the lips of the captive; and, spreading over the broad expanse of water, seemed to be re-echoed back from every point of the surrounding shore.

Great was the confusion that followed this startling yell on the decks of the schooner. "Cut the bell-tied down!"—"Chuck him overboard!"—"We are betrayed!"—"Every man to his gun!"—"Put the craft about!" were among the numerous exclamations that now rose simultaneously from at least twenty lips, and almost drowned the loud shriek that burst again from the wretched Clara de Haldimar.

"Stop, Mullins!—Stop, men!" shouted Captain de

Haldimar, firmly, as the excited boatswain, with two or three of his companions, now advanced with the intention of laying violent hands on the Indian. "I will answer for his fidelity with my life. If he be false, it will be time enough to punish him afterwards; but let us calmly await the issue like men. Hear me," he proceeded, as he remarked their incredulous, uncertain, and still threatening air;—"this Indian saved me from the tomahawks of his tribe not a week ago; and, even now, he has become our captive in the act of taking a note from me to the garrison, to warn them of their danger. But for that slumbering fool," he added, bitterly, pointing to Fuller, who slept when he should have watched, "you fort would not now have been what it is,—a mass of smoking ruins. He has an ocean of blood upon his soul, that all the waters of the Huron can never wash out!"

Struck by the vehement manner of the officer, and the disclosure he had just made, the sailors sunk once more into inaction and silence. The boatswain alone spoke.

"I thought, your honour, as how Jack Fuller, who certainly is a better hand at a snooze than a watch, had got into a bit of a mess; but, shiver my topmasts, if I think it's quite fair to blame him, neither, for clapping a stopper on the Indian's cable, seeing as how he was expecting a shot between wind and water. Still, as the chap turns out to be an honest chap, and has saved your honour's life above all, I don't much care if I give him a grip. Here, old fellow, tip us your fist!"

Without seeming to understand that his cry had been productive of general and intense alarm throughout the vessel, the Indian had viewed the sudden rushing of the crew towards him as an act of gratuitous hostility; and, without shrinking from the attack, had once more resumed his original air of dogged sullenness. It was evident to him, from the discussion going on, that some violence, about to be offered to his person, had only been prevented by the interference of the officer. With the natural haughtiness of his savage nature, he therefore rejected the overtures of the sailor, whose hand he had observed among the first that were raised against him.

While the angry boatswain was yet rolling his quid within his capacious jaws, racking his brain for the strongest language wherein to give vent to his indignation, his ears were suddenly saluted by a low but clear "Hilloo!" from the bows of the schooner.

"Ay, ay!" was the brief response.

"There's something approaching us ahead, on the weather fore quarter," continued the same voice, which was that of the man on the look-out.

The most profound silence now pervaded the deck. Every individual, including Captain de Haldimar and the boatswain, had flown to the gangway of the quarter indicated, which was on the side occupied by the couch of the unfortunate Clara. Presently a noise like that produced by a single paddle rapidly dividing the water, was heard by every anxious ear. Night had long since thrown her mantle over the surrounding waste; and all that was to be seen reflected from the boom of the gradually darkening river, scarcely ruffled by the yet incipient breeze, were a few straggling stars, that here and there appeared in the overcast heavens. Hitherto no object could be discovered by those who strained their eyes eagerly and painfully through the gloom, although the sounds became at each moment more distinct. It was evident the party, guided by the noise of the rippling waves that fell from the bows of the schooner, was enabled to follow up a course, the direct clue to which had been indicated by the cry of the captive. Every man stood near his gun on the starboard battery, and the burning matches hanging over their respective buckets ready to be seized at a moment's notice. Still, but little room for apprehension existed: for the practised ear of the mariners could easily tell that a solitary bark alone approached; and of one, or even ten, they entertained no fear. Suddenly, as the course of the vessel was now changed a point to windward,—a movement that brought her bows more off the adjacent shore,—the sound, in which all were more or less interested, was heard not more than twenty yards off, and in a line with the gangway at which the principal of the crew were assembled. In the next minute the low hull of a canoe came in sight, and then a tall and solitary human figure was seen in the stern, bending alternately to the right and to the left, as the paddle was rapidly and successively changed from side to side.

Another deep and exulting "Ugh!" was now heaved from the chest of the Indian, who stood calmly on the spot on which he had first rested, while Fuller prepared a coil of rope to throw to the active steersman.

"Avast there, Jack!" growled the boatswain, addressing the sailor; "how can the stranger keep the bow of his craft on, and grapple at the same time? Just pass one end of the coil round your waist, and swing yourself gently into her."

The head of the canoe was now near enough for the purpose. The sailor did as he was desired, having previously divested himself of his shoes, and leaping forward, alighted on what appeared to be a bundle of blankets stowed away in her bows. No sooner, however, had he secured his footing, when with another desperate leap, and greatly to the astonishment of all around, he bounded once more to the deck of the schooner, his countenance exhibiting every mark of superstitious alarm. In the act of quitting the canoe he had spurned her violently several feet from the vessel, which the silent steersman was again making every effort to reach.

"Why, what the devil's the matter with you now?" exclaimed the rough boatswain, who, as well as Captain de Haldimar and the rest of the crew, had quitted the gangway to learn the cause of this extraordinary conduct. "Damn my eyes, if you ar'n't worse scared than when the Indian stood over you in the jolly boat."

"Scared, ay, to be sure I am; and so would you be scared too, if you'd a see'd what I did. May I never touch the point at Portsmouth, if I a'n't seen her ghost!"

"Where?—whose ghost?—what ghost?—what do you mean, Jack?" exclaimed several of the startled men in the same breath, while the superstitious dread so common to mariners drew them still closer in the group that encircled their companion.

"Well, then, as I am a miserable sinner," returned the man, impressively, and in a low tone, "I see'd in the bows of the canoe,—and the hand that steered it was not made of flesh and blood like ours,—what do you think?—the ghost of—"

Captain de Haldimar heard no more. At a single bound he had gained the ship's side. He strained his eyes anxiously over the gangway in search of the canoe, but it was gone. A death-like silence throughout the deck followed the communication of the sailor, and in that pause the sound of the receding boat could be heard, not urged, as it had approached, by one paddle, but by two. The heart of the officer throbbed almost to suffocation; and his firmness, hitherto supported by the manly energies of his nature, now failed him quite. Heedless of appearances, regardless of being overlooked, he tottered like a drunken man for support against the mainmast. For a moment or two he leant his head upon his hand, with the air of one immersed in the most profound abstraction; while the crew, at once alarmed and touched by the deep distress into which this mysterious circumstance had plunged him, stood silently and respectfully watching his emotion. Suddenly he started from his attitude of painful repose, like one awakening from a dream, and demanded what had become of the Indian.

Every one looked around, but the captive was no where to be seen. Search was made below, both in the cabin and in the fore decks, and men were sent up aloft to see if he had secreted himself in the rigging; but all returned, stating he was no where to be found. He had disappeared from the vessel altogether, yet no one knew how; for he had not been observed to stir from the spot on which he had first planted himself. It was plain however, he had joined the mysterious party in the canoe, from the fact of the second paddle having been detected; and all attempts at pursuit, without endangering the vessel on the shallows, whither the course of the fugitives was now directed, was declared by the boatswain utterly impracticable.

The announcement of the Indian's disappearance seemed to put the climax to the despair of the unfortunate officer. "Then is our every hope lost!" he groaned aloud, as, quitting the centre of the vessel, he slowly traversed the deck, and once more stood at the side of his no less unhappy and excited sister. For a moment or two he remained with his arms folded across his chest, gazing on the dark outline of her form; and then, in a wild paroxysm of silent, tearless grief, threw himself suddenly on the edge of the couch, and clasping her in a long close embrace to his audibly beating heart, lay like one bereft of all sense and consciousness of surrounding objects.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The night passed away without further event on board the schooner, yet in all the anxiety that might be supposed incident to men so perilously situated. Habits of long since acquired superstition, too powerful to be easily shaken off, moreover, contributed to the dejection of the mariners, among whom there were not wanting those who believed the silent steersman was in reality what their comrade had represented,—an immaterial being, sent from the world of spirits to warn them of some impending evil. What principally gave weight to this impression were the repeated asseverations of Fuller, during the sleepless night passed by all on deck, that what he had seen was no other, could be no other, than a ghost! exhibiting in its hueless, fleshless cheek, the well known lineaments of one who was supposed to be no more; and, if the story of their comrade had needed confirmation among men in whom faith in, rather than love for, the marvellous was a constitutional ingredient, the terrible effect that seemed to have been produced on Captain de Haldimar by the same mysterious visitation would have been more than conclusive. The very appearance of the night, too, favoured the delusion. The heavens, comparatively clear at the moment when the canoe approached the vessel, became suddenly enveloped in the deepest gloom at its departure, as if to enshroud the course of those who, having so mysteriously approached, had also so unaccountably disappeared. Nor had this threatening state of the atmosphere the counterbalancing advantage of storm and tempest to drive them onward through the narrow waters of the Sinclair, and enable them, by anticipating the pursuit of their enemies, to shun the Scylla and Charbydis that awaited their more leisurely advance. The wind increased not; and the disappointed seamen remarked, with dismay, that their craft scarcely made more progress than at the moment when she first quitted her anchorage.

It was now near the first hours of day; and although, perhaps, none slept, there were few who were not apparently at rest, and plunged in the most painful reflections. Still occupying her humble couch, and shielded from the night air merely by the cloak that covered her own blood-stained garments, lay the unhappy Clara, her deep groans and stifled sobs bursting occasionally from her pent-up heart, and falling on the ears of the mariners like sounds of fearful import, produced by the mysterious agency that already bore such undivided power over their thoughts. On the bare deck, at her side, lay her brother, his face turned upon the planks, as if to shut out all objects from eyes he had not the power to close; and, with one arm supporting his heavy brow, while the other, cast around the restless form of his beloved sister, seemed to offer protection and to impart confidence, even while his lips denied the accents of consolation. Seated on an empty hen-coop at their head, was Sir Everard Valletort, his back reposing against the bulwarks of the vessel, his arms folded across his chest, and his eyes bent mechanically on the man at the helm, who stood within a few paces of him,—an attitude of absorption, which he, ever and anon, changed to one of anxious and enquiring interest, whenever the agitation of Clara was manifested in the manner already shown.

The main deck and fore-castle of the vessel presented a similar picture of mingled inquietness and repose. Many of the seamen might be seen seated on the gun-carriages, with their cheeks pressing the rude metal that served them for a pillow. Others lay along the decks, with their heads resting on the elevated hatches; while not a few, squatted on their haunches with their knees doubled up to their very chins, supported in that position the aching head that rested between their rough and horny palms. A first glance might have induced the belief that all were buried in the most profound slumber; but the quick jerking of a limb,—the fitful, sudden shifting of a position,—the utter absence of that deep breathing which indicates the unconsciousness of repose, only required to be noticed, to prove the living silence that reigned throughout was not born either of apathy or sleep.

At the gangway at which the canoe had approached now stood the individual already introduced to our readers as Jack Fuller. The same superstitious terror that caused his flight had once more attracted him to the spot where the subject of his alarm first appeared to him; and, without seeming to reflect that the vessel, in her slow but certain progress, had left all vestige of the mysterious visitant behind, he continued gazing over the bulwarks on the dark waters, as if he expected at each moment to find his sight stricken by the same appalling vision. It was at the moment when he had worked u-in pacing up and down the decks, watching the aspect of the heavens, and occasionally tauting a rope or squaring a light yard, unassisted, as the fluttering of the canvass in the wind rendered the alteration necessary.

"Well, Jack!" bluntly observed the latter in a gruff whisper that resembled the suppressed growling of a mastiff, "what are ye thinking of now?—Not got over your flummetsification yet, that ye stand here, looking as sanctified as an old parson?"

"I'll tell ye what it is, Mr. Mullins," returned the sailor, in the same key; "you may make as much game on me as you like; but these here strange sort of doings are somehow quizzical; and, though I fears nothing in the shape of flesh and blood, still, when it comes to having to do with those as is gone to Davy Jones' locker like, it gives a fellow an all overhissness as isn't quite the thing. You understand me?"

"Hang me if I do!" was the brief rejoinder.

"Well, then," continued Fuller, "if I must out with it, I must. I think that 'ere Ingian must have been the devil, or how could he come so sudden and unbeknownst upon me, with the head of a 'possum; and then agin, how could he get away from the craft without our seeing him? and how came the ghost on board of the canoe?"

"Avast there, old fellow; you means not the head of a 'possum, but a beaver: but that 'ere's all nat'r'l enough, and easily 'counted for; but you hav'n't told us whose ghost it was, after all."

"No; the captain made such a spring to the gunwale, as frightened it all out of my head: but come closer, Mr. Mullins, and I'll whisper it in your ear.—Hark! what was that?"

"I hears nothing," said the boatswain, after a pause.

"It's very odd," continued Fuller; "but I thought as how I heard it several times afore you came."

"There's something wrong, I take it, in your upper story, Jack Fuller," coolly observed his companion; "that 'ere ghost has quite capsizeed you."

"Hark, again!" repeated the sailor. "Did'n't you hear it then? A sort of a groan, like."

"Where, in what part?" calmly demanded the boatswain; though in the same suppressed tone in which the dialogue had been carried on.

"Why, from the canoe that lies alongside there. I heard it several times afore."

"Well, if you arn't turned a real coward at last," politely remarked Mr. Mullins. "Can't the poor fat devil of a Canadian snooze a bit in his hammock, without putting you so completely out of your reckoning?"

"The Canadian—the Canadian!" hurriedly returned Fuller: "why, don't you see him there, leaning with his back to the mainmast, and as fast asleep as if the devil himself couldn't wake him?"

"Then it was the devil, you heard, if you like," quaintly retorted Mullins: "but bear a hand and tell us all about this here ghost."

"Hark, again! what was that?" once more enquired the excited sailor.

"Only a gust of wind passing through the dried boughs of the canoe," said the boatswain: "but since we can get nothing out of that crazed noddle of yours, see if you can't do something with your hands. That 'ere canoe running alongside, takes half a knot off the ship's way. Bear a hand then, and cast off the painter, and let her drop astern, that she may follow in our wake. Hilloa! what's the matter with the man now?"

And well might he ask. With his eye-balls staring, his teeth chattering, his body half bent, and his arms thrown forward, yet pendent as if suddenly arrested in that position while in the act of reaching the rope, the terrified sailor stood gazing on the stern of the canoe; in which, by the faint light of the dawning day, was to be seen an object well calculated to fill the least superstitious heart with terror and dismay. Through an opening in the foliage peered the pale and spectral face of a human being, with its dull eyes bent fixedly and mechanically upon the vessel. In the centre of the wan forehead was a dark incrustation as of blood, covering the superficies of a newly closed wound. The pallid mouth was partially unclenched, so as to display a row of white and apparently lipless teeth; and the features were otherwise set and drawn, as those of one who is no longer of earth. Around the head was bound a covering so close, as to conceal every part save the face; and once or twice a hand was slowly raised, and pressed upon the blood spot that dimmed the passing fairness of the brow. Every other portion of the form was invisible.

"Lord have mercy upon us!" exclaimed the boatswain, in a voice that, now elevated to more than its natural tone, sounded startlingly on the stillness of the scene; "sure enough it is, indeed, a ghost!"

"Ha! do you believe me now?" returned Fuller, gaining confidence from the admission of his companion, and in the same elevated key. "It is, as I hope to be saved, the ghost I see'd afore."

The commotion on deck was now every where universal. The sailors started to their feet, and, with horror and alarm visibly imprinted on their countenances, rushed tumultuously towards the dreaded gangway.

"Make way—room, fellows!" exclaimed a hurried voice; and presently Captain de Haldimar, who had bounded like lightning from the deck, appeared with eager eye and excited cheek among them. To leap into the bows of the canoe, and disappear under the foliage, was the work of a single instant. All listened breathlessly for the slightest sound; and then every heart throbbed with the most undefinable emotions, as his lips were heard giving utterance to the deep emotion of his own spirit.—

"Madeline, oh, my own lost Madeline!" he exclaimed with almost frantic energy of passion: "do I then press you once more to my dying heart? Speak, speak to me—for God's sake speak, or I shall go mad! Air, air,—she wants air only—she cannot be dead."

These last words were succeeded by the furious rending asunder of the fastenings that secured the boughs, and presently the whole went overboard, leaving revealed the tall and picturesque figure of the officer; whose left arm encircled while it supported the reclining and powerless form of one who well resembled, indeed, the spectre for which she had been mistaken, while his right hand was busied in detaching the string that secured a portion of the covering round her throat. At length it fell from her shoulders; and the well known form of Madeline de Haldimar, clad even in the vestments in which they had been wont to see her, met the astonished gaze of the excited seamen. Still there were some who doubted it was the corporeal woman whom they beheld; and several of the crew who were catholics even made the sign of the cross as the supposed spirit was now borne up the gangway in the arms of the pained yet gratified Do Haldimar: nor was it until her feet were seen finally resting on the deck, that Jack Fuller could persuade himself it was indeed Miss de Haldimar, and not her ghost, that lay clasped to the heart of the officer.

With the keen rush of the morning air upon her brow returned the suspended consciousness of the bewildered Madeline. The blood came slowly and imperceptibly to her cheek; and her eyes, hitherto glazed, fixed, and inexpressive, looked enquiringly, yet with stupid wonderment, around. She started from the embrace of her lover, gazed alternately at his disguise, at himself, and at Clara; and then passing her hand several times rapidly across her brow, uttered an hysterical scream, and threw herself impetuously forward on the bosom of the sobbing girl; who, with extended arms, parted lips, and heaving bosom, sat breathlessly awaiting the first dawn of the returning reason of her more than sister.

We should vainly attempt to paint all the heart-rending misery of the scene exhibited in the gradual restoration of Miss de Haldimar to her senses. From a state of torpor, produced by the freezing of every faculty into almost idiocy, she was suddenly awakened to all the terrors of the past; and the deep intonations of her rich voice were heard only in expressions of agony, that entered into the most iron-hearted of the assembled seamen; while they drew from the bosom of her gentle and sympathising cousin fresh bursts of desolating grief. Imagination itself would find difficulty in supplying the harrowing effect upon all, when, with upraised hands, and on her bended knees, her large eyes turned wildly up to heaven, she invoked in deep and startling accents the terrible retribution of a just God on the inhuman murderers of her father, with whose life-blood her garments were profusely saturated; and then, with hysterical laughter, demanded why she alone had been singled out to survive the bloody tragedy. Love and affection, hitherto the first principles of her existence, then found no entrance into her mind. Stricken, broken-hearted, stultified to all feeling save that of her immediate wretchedness, she thought only of the horrible scenes through which she had passed; and even he, whom at another moment she could have clasped in an agony of fond tenderness to her beating bosom,—he to whom she had pledged her virgin faith, and was bound by the dearest of human ties,—he whom she had so often longed to behold once more, and had thought of, the preceding day, with all the tenderness of her impassioned and devoted soul,—even he did not, in the first hours of her terrible consciousness, so much as command a single passing regard. All the affections were for a period blighted in her bosom. She seemed as one devoted, without the power of resistance, to a grief which calcined and preyed upon all other feelings of the mind. One stunning and annihilating reflection seemed to engross every principle of her being; nor was it for hours after she had been restored to life and recollection that a deluge of burning tears, giving relief to her heart and a new direction to her feelings, enabled her at length to separate the past from, and in some degree devote herself to, the present. Then, indeed, for the first time did she perceive and take pleasure in the presence of her lover; and clasping her beloved and weeping Clara to her heart, thank her God, in all the fervour of true piety, that she at least had been spared to shed a ray of comfort on her distracted spirit. But we will not pain the reader by dwelling on a scene that drew tears even from the rugged and flint-nerved boatswain himself; for, although we should linger on it with minute anatomical detail, no powers of language we possess could convey the transcript as it should be. Pass we on, therefore, to the more immediate incidents of our narrative.

The day now rapidly developing, full opportunity was afforded the mariners to survey the strict nature of their position. To all appearance they were yet in the middle of the lake, for around them lay the belting sweep of forest that bounded the perspective of the equidistant circle, of which their bark was the focus or immediate centre. The wind was dying gradually away, and when at length the sun rose, in all his splendour, there was scarce air enough in the heavens to keep the sails from flapping against the masts, or to enable the vessel to obey her helm. In vain was the low and peculiar whistle of the seamen heard, ever and anon, in invocation of the departing breeze. Another day, calm and breathless as the preceding, had been chartered from the world of light; and their hearts failed them, as they foresaw the difficulty of their position, and the almost certainty of their retreat being cut off. It was while labouring under the disheartening consciousness of danger, peculiar to all, that the anxious boatswain summoned Captain de Haldimar and Sir Everard Valletort, by a significant beck of the finger, to the side of the deck opposite to that on which still lay the suffering and nearly broken-hearted girls.

"Well, Mullins, what now?" enquired the former, as he narrowly scanned the expression of the old man's features: "that clouded brow of yours, I fear me, bodes no agreeable information."

"Why, your honour, I scarcely knows what to say about it; but seeing as I'm the only officer in the ship, now our poor captain is killed, God bless him! I thought I might take the liberty to consult with your honours as to the best way of getting out of the jaws of them sharks of Ingians; and two heads, as the saying is, is always better than one."

"And now you have the advantage of three," observed the officer, with a sickly smile; "but I fear, Mullins, that if your own be not sufficient for the purpose, ours will be of little service. You must take counsel from your own experience and knowledge of nautical matters."

"Why, to be sure, your honour," and the sailor rolled his quid from one cheek to the other, "I think I may say as how I'll venture to steer the craft with any man on the Canada lakes, and bring her safe into port too; but seeing as how I'm only a petty officer, and not yet recommended by his worship the governor for the full command, I thought it but right to consult with my superiors, not as to the management of the craft, but the best as is to be done. What does your honour think of making for the high land over the larboard bow yonder, and waiting for the chance of the night breeze to take us through the Sinclair?"

"Do whatever you think best," returned the officer. "For my part, I scarcely can give an opinion. Yet how are we to get there? There does not appear to be a breath of wind."

"Oh, that's easily managed; we have only to brail and furl up a little, to hide our cloth from the Ingians, and then send the boats a-head to tow the craft, while some of us lend a hand at her own sweeps. We shall get close under the lee of the land afore night, and then we must pull up agin along shore, until we get within a mile or so of the head of the river."

"But shall we not be seen by our enemies?" asked

Sir Everard; "and will they not be on the watch for our movements, and intercept our retreat?"

"Now that's just the thing, your honour, as they're not likely to do, if so be as we bears away for yon headlands. I knows every nook and sounding round the lake; and odd enough if I didn't, seeing as how the craft circumnavigated it, at least, a dozen times since we have been cooped up here. Poor Captain Danvers! (may the devil take his murderers, I say, though it does make a commander of me for once;) he used always to make for that 'ere point, whenever he wished to lie quiet; for never once did we see so much as a single Indian on the headland. No, your honour, they keeps all at t'other side of the lake, seeing as how that is the main road from Mackina to Detroit."

"Then, by all means, do so," eagerly returned Captain de Haldimar. "Oh, Mullins! take us but safely through, and if the interest of my father can procure you a king's commission, you shall not want it, believe me."

"And if half my fortune can give additional stimulus to exertion, it shall be shared, with pleasure, between yourself and crew," observed Sir Everard.

"Thank your honours,—thank your honours," said the boatswain, somewhat electrified by these brilliant offers. "The lads may take the money, if they like; all I cares about is the king's commission. Give me but a swab on my shoulder, and the money will come fast enough of itself. But, still, shiver my topails, if I wants any bribery to make me do my duty; besides, if 'twas only for them poor girls alone, I would go through fire and water to save them. I'm not very chicken-hearted in my old age, your honours, but I don't recollect the time when I blubbered so much as I did when Miss Madeline come aboard. But I can't bear to think of it; and now let us see and get all ready for towing."

Every thing now became bustle and activity on board the schooner. The matches, no longer required for the moment, were extinguished, and the heavy cutlasses and pistols unbuckled from the loins of the men, and deposited near their respective guns. Light forms flew aloft, and, standing out upon the yards, loosely furling the sails that had previously been hauled and clewed up; but, as this was an operation requiring little time in so small a vessel, those who were engaged in it speedily glided to the deck again, ready for a more arduous service. The boats had, meanwhile, been got forward, and into these the sailors sprang, with an alacrity that could scarcely have been expected from men who had passed not only the preceding night, but many before it, in utter sleeplessness and despair. But the imminence of the danger, and the evident necessity existing for exertion, aroused them to new energy; and the hitherto motionless vessel was now made to obey the impulse given by the tow ropes of the boats, in a manner that proved their crews to have entered on their toil with the determination of men, resolved to devote themselves in earnest to their task. Nor was the spirit of action confined to these. The long sweeps of the schooner had been shipped, and such of the crew as remained on board laboured effectually at them,—a service, in which they were essentially aided, not only by mine host of the Fleur de lis, but by the young officers themselves.

At mid-day the headlands were seen looming largely in the distance, while the immediate shores of the ill-fated fortress were momentarily, and in the same proportion, disappearing under the dim line of horizon in the rear. More than half their course, from the spot whence they commenced towing, had been completed, when the harassed men were made to quit their oars, in order to partake of the scanty fare of the vessel, consisting chiefly of dried bear's meat and venison. Spirit of any description they had none; but, unlike their brethren of the Atlantic, when driven to extremities in food, they knew not what it was to poison the nutritious properties of the latter by sipping the putrid drops of the water-cask; in quantities scarce sufficient to quench the fire of their parched palates. Unslaked thirst was a misery unknown to the mariners of these lakes: it was but to cast their buckets deep into the tempting element, and water, pure, sweet, and grateful as any that ever bubbled from the moss-clad fountain of sylvan deity, came cool and refreshing to their lips, neutralising, in a measure, the crudities of the coarsest food. It was to this incalculable advantage the crew of the schooner had been principally indebted for their health, during the long series of privation, as far as related to fresh provisions and rest, to which they had been subjected. All appeared as vigorous in frame, and robust in health, as at the moment when they had last quitted the waters of the Detroit; and but for the inward sinking of the spirit, reflected in many a bronzed and furrowed brow, there was little to show they had been exposed to any very extraordinary trials.

Their meal having been hastily despatched, and sweetened by a draught from the depths of the Huron, the seamen once more sprang into their boats, and devoted themselves, heart and soul, to the completion of their task, pulling with a vigour that operated on each and all with a tendency to encouragement and hope. At length the vessel, still impelled by her own sweeps, gradually approached the land; and at rather more than an hour before sunset was so near that the moment was deemed arrived when, without danger of being perceived, she might be run up along the shore to the point alluded to by the boatswain. Little more than another hour was occupied in bringing her to her station; and the red tints of departing day were still visible in the direction of the ill-fated fortress of Michillimackinac, when the sullen rumbling of the cable, following the heavy splash of the anchor, announced the place of momentary concealment had been gained.

The anchorage lay between two projecting headlands; to the outermost extremities of which were to be seen, overhanging the lake, the stately birch and pine, connected at their base by an impenetrable brushwood, extending to the very shore, and affording the amplest concealment, except from the lake side and the banks under which the schooner was moored. From the first quarter, however, little danger was incurred, as any canoes the savages might send in discovery of their course, must unavoidably be seen the moment they appeared over the line of the horizon, while, on the contrary, their own vessel, although much larger, resting on and identified with the land, must be invisible, except on a very near approach. In the opposite direction they were equally safe; for, as Mullins had truly remarked, none, save a few wandering hunters, whom chance occasionally led to the spot, were to be met with in a part of the country that lay so completely out of the track of communication between the fortresses. It was, however, but to double the second headland in their front, and they came within view of the Sinclair, the head of which was situated little more than a league beyond the spot where they now lay. Thus secure for the present, and waiting only for the rising of the breeze, of which the setting sun had given promise, the sailors once more snatched their hasty refreshment, while two of their number were sent aloft to keep a vigilant look-out along the circuit embraced by the ensnouring headlands.

During the whole of the day the cousins had continued on deck clasped in each other's arms, and shedding tears of bitterness, and heaving the most heart-rending sobs at intervals, yet but rarely conversing. The feelings of both were too much oppressed to admit of the utterance of their grief. The vampire of despair had banqueted on their hearts. Often had Sir Everard and De Haldimar paused momentarily from the labour of their oars, to cast an eye of anxious solicitude on the scarcely conscious girls, wishing, rather than expecting, to find the violence of their desolation abated, and that, in the full expansion of unreserved communication, they were relieving their sick hearts from the terrible weight of woe that bore them down. Captain de Haldimar had even once or twice essayed to introduce the subject himself, in the hope that some fresh paroxysm, following their disclosures, would remove the horrible stupefaction of their senses; but the wild look and excited manner of Madeline, whenever he touched on the chord of her affliction, had as often caused him to desist.

Towards the evening, however, her natural strength of character came in aid of his quiescent efforts to soothe her; and she appeared not only more composed, but more sensible of the impression produced by surrounding objects. As the last rays of the sun were tinging the horizon, she drew up her form in a sitting position against the bulwarks, and, raising her clasped hands to heaven, while her eyes were bent long and fixedly on the distant west, appeared for some minutes wholly lost in that attitude of absorption. Then she closed her eyes; and through the swollen lids came coursing, one by one, over her quivering cheek, large tears, that seemed to scald a furrow where they passed. After this she became more calm—her respiration more free; and she even consented to taste the humble meal which the young man now offered for the third time. Neither Clara nor herself had eaten food since the preceding morning; and the weakness of their frames contributed not a little to the increasing despondency of their spirits; but, notwithstanding several attempts previously made, they had rejected what was offered them, with insurmountable loathing. When they had now swallowed a few morsels of the sliced venison ham, prepared with all the delicacy the nearly exhausted resources of the vessel could supply, accompanied by a small portion of the corn-bread of the Canadian, Captain de Haldimar prevailed on them to swallow a few drops of the spirit that still remained in the canteen given them by Erskine on their departure from Detroit. The genial liquid sent a kindling glow to their chilled hearts, and for a moment deadened the pungency of their anguish; and then it was that Miss de Haldimar entered briefly on the horrors she had witnessed, while Clara, with her arm encircling her waist, fixed her dim and swollen eyes, from which a tear ever and anon rolled heavily to her lap, on those of her beloved cousin.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Without borrowing the affecting language of the unhappy girl—a language rendered even more touching by the peculiar pathos of her tones, and the searching agony of spirit that burst at intervals through her narrative—we will merely present our readers with a brief summary of what was gleaned from her melancholy disclosure. On bearing her cousin to the bed-room, after the terrifying yell first heard from without the fort, she had flown down the front stairs of the block-house, in the hope of reaching the guard-room in time to acquaint Captain Baynton with what she and Clara had witnessed from their window. Scarcely, however, had she gained the exterior of the building, when she saw that officer descending from a point of the rampart immediately on her left, and almost in a line with the block-house. He was running to overtake and return the ball of the Indian players, which had, at that moment, fallen into the centre of the fort, and was now rolling rapidly away from the spot on which Miss de Haldimar stood. The course of the ball led the pursuing officer out of the reach of her voice; and it was not until he had overtaken and thrown it again over the rampart, she could succeed in claiming his attention. No sooner, however, had he heard her hurried statement, than, without waiting to take the orders of his commanding officer, he prepared to join his guard, and gave directions for the immediate closing of the gates. But the opportunity was now lost. The delay occasioned by the chase and recovery of the ball had given the Indians time to approach the gates in a body, while the unsuspecting soldiery looked on without so much as dreaming to prevent them; and Captain Baynton had scarcely moved forward in execution of his purpose, when the yelling fiends were seen already possessing themselves of the drawbridge, and exhibiting every appearance of fierce hostility. Wild, maddened at the sight, the almost frantic Madeline, alive only to her father's danger, rushed back towards the council room, whence the startling yell from without had already been echoed, and where the tramp of feet, and the clashing of weapons, were distinguishable.

Cut off from his guard, by the rapid inundation of warriors, Captain Baynton had at once seen the futility of all attempts to join the men, and his first impression evidently had been to devote himself to the preservation of the cousins. With this view he turned hastily to Miss de Haldimar, and hurriedly naming the back staircase of the block-house, urged her to direct her flight to that quarter. But the excited girl had neither consideration nor fear for herself; she thought only of her father; and, even while the fierceness of contest was as its height within, she suddenly burst into the council room. The confusion and horror of the scene that met her eyes no language can render: blood was flowing in every direction, and dying and dead officers, already stripped of their scalps, were lying strewn about the room. Still the survivors fought with all the obstinacy of despair; and many of the Indians had shared the fate of their victims. Miss de Haldimar attempted to reach her father, then vigorously combating with one of the most desperate of the chiefs; but, before she could dart through the intervening crowd, a savage seized her by the hair, and brandished a tomahawk rapidly over her neck. At that moment Captain Baynton sent his glittering blade deep into the heart of the Indian, who, relinquishing his grasp, fell dead at the feet of his intended victim. The devoted officer then threw his left arm round her waist, and parrying with his sword-arm the blows of those who sought to intercept his flight, dragged his reluctant burden towards the door. Holy pressed by the remaining officers, nearly equal in number, the Indians were now compelled to turn and defend themselves in front, when Captain Baynton took that opportunity of getting once more into the corridor, not, however, without having received a severe wound immediately behind the right ear, and leaving a skirt and lappel of his uniform in the hands of two savages who had successively essayed to detain him. At that moment the band without had succeeded in forcing open the door of the guard room; and the officer saw, at a glance, there was little time left for decision. In hurried and imploring accents he besought Miss de Haldimar to forget every thing but her own danger, and to summon resolution to tear herself from the scene; but prayer and entreaty, and even force, were alike employed in vain. Clinging firmly to the rude balustrades, she refused to be led up the staircase, and wildly resisting all his efforts to detach her hands, declared she would again return to the scene of death, in which her beloved parent was so conspicuous an actor. While he was yet engaged in this fruitless attempt to force her from the spot, the door of the council-room was suddenly burst open, and a group of bleeding officers, among whom was Major de Haldimar, followed by their yelling enemies, rushed wildly into the passage, and, at the very foot of the stairs where they yet stood, the combat was renewed. From that moment Miss de Haldimar lost sight of her generous protector. Meanwhile the tumult of execrations, and groans, and yells, was at its height; and one by one she saw the unhappy officers sink beneath weapons yet reeking with the blood of their comrades, until not more than three or four, including her father and the commander of the schooner, were left. At length Major de Haldimar, overcome by exertion, and faint from wounds, while his wild eye darted despairingly on his daughter, had his sword-arm desperately wounded, when the blade dropped to the earth, and a dozen weapons glittered above his head. The wild shriek that had startled Clara then burst from the agonised heart of her maddened cousin, and she darted forward to cover her father's head with her arms. But her senses failed her in the attempt; and the last thing she recollected was falling over the weltering form of Middleton, who pressed her, as she lay there, in the convulsive energy of death, to his almost pulseless heart.

A vague consciousness of being raised from the earth, borne rapidly through the air, came over her even in the midst of her insensibility, but without any definite perception of the present, or recollection of the past, until she suddenly, when about midway between the fort and the point of wood that led to Chabouiga, opened her eyes, and found herself in the firm grasp of an Indian, whose features, even in the hasty and fearful glance she cast at the countenance, she fancied were not unfamiliar to her. Not another human being was to be seen in the clearing at that moment; for all the savages, including even the women assembled outside, were now within the fort assisting in the complex horrors of murder, fire, and spoliation. In the wild energy of returning reason and despair, the wretched girl struggled violently to free herself; and so far with success, that the Indian, whose strength was evidently fast failing him, was compelled to quit his hold, and suffer her to walk. No sooner did Miss de Haldimar feel her feet touching the ground, when she again renewed her exertions to free herself, and return to the fort; but the Indian held her firmly secured by a leathern thong he now attached to her waist, and every attempt proved abortive. He was evidently much disconcerted at her resistance; and more than once she expected, and almost hoped, the tomahawk at his side would be made to revenge him for the test to which his patience was subjected: but Miss de Haldimar looked in vain for the expression of ferocity and impatience that might have been expected from him at such a moment. There was an air of mournfulness, and even kindness, mingled with severity, on his smooth brow that harmonised ill with the horrible atrocities in which he had, to all appearance, covered as he was with blood, been so recent and prominent an actor. The Indian remarked her surprise; and then looking hurriedly, but keenly, around, and finding no living being near them, suddenly tore the shirt from his chest, and emphatically pronouncing the names "Oucanasta," "de Haldimar," disclosed to the still struggling captive the bosom of a woman. After which, pointing in the direction of the wood, and finally towards Detroit, she gave Miss de Haldimar to understand that was the course intended to be pursued.

In a moment the resistance of the latter ceased. She at once recognised the young Indian woman whom her cousin had rescued from death: and aware, as she was, of the strong attachment that had subsequently bound her to her preserver, she was at no loss to understand how she might have been led to devote herself to the rescue of one whom, it was probable, she knew to be his affianced wife. Once, indeed, a suspicion of a different nature crossed her mind; for the thought occurred to her she had only been saved from the general doom to be made the victim of private revenge—that it was only to glut the jealous vengeance of the woman at a more deliberative hour, she had been made a temporary captive. The apprehension, however, was no sooner formed than extinguished. Bitterly, deeply as she had reason to abhor the treachery and cunning of the dark race to which her captor belonged, there was an expression of openness and sincerity, and even imploringness, in the countenance of Oucanasta, which, added to her former knowledge of the woman, at once set this fear at rest, inducing her to look upon her rather in the character of a disinterested saviour, than in that of a cruel and vindictive enemy, goaded on to the indulgence of malignant hate by a spirit of rivalry and revenge. Besides, even were her cruellest fears to be realised, what could await her worse than the past? If she could even succeed in getting away, it would only be to return upon certain death; and death only could await her, however refined the tortures accompanying its infliction, in the event of her quietly following and yielding herself up to the guidance of one who offered this slight consolation, at least, that she was of her own sex. But Miss de Haldimar was willing to attribute more generous motives to the Indian; and fortified in her first impression, she signified by signs, that seemed to be perfectly intelligible to her companion, she appreciated her friendly intentions, and confided wholly in her.

No longer checked in her efforts, Oucanasta now directed her course towards the wood, still holding the thong that remained attached to Miss de Haldimar's waist, probably with a view to deceive any individuals from the villages on whom they might chance to fall, into the belief that the English girl was in reality her prisoner. No sooner, however, had they entered the depths of the forest, when, instead of following the path that led to Chabouiga, Oucanasta took a direction to the left, and then moving nearly on a parallel line with the course of the lake, continued her flight as rapidly as the rude nature of the underwood, and the unpractised feet of her companion, would permit. They had travelled in this manner for upwards of four hours, without meeting a breathing thing, or even so much as exchanging a sound between themselves, when, at length, the Indian stopped at the edge of a deep cavern-like excavation in the earth, produced by the tearing up, by the wild tempest, of an enormous pine. Into this she descended, and presently re-appeared with several blankets, and two light painted paddles. Then unloosing the thong from the waist of the exhausted girl, she proceeded to disguise her in one of the blankets in the manner already shown, securing it over the head, throat, and shoulders with the badge of captivity, now no longer necessary for her purpose. She then struck off at right angles from the course they had previously pursued; and in less than twenty minutes both stood on the lake shore, apparently at a great distance from the point whence they had originally set out. The Indian gazed for a moment anxiously before her; and then, with an exclamation, evidently meant to convey a sense of pleasure and satisfaction, pointed forward upon the lake. Miss de Haldimar followed, with eager and aching eyes, the direction of her finger, and beheld the well known schooner evidently urging her flight towards the entrance of the Sinclair. Oh, how her sick heart seemed ready to burst at that moment! From the vessel she turned her eyes away upon the distant shore, which it was fast quitting, and beheld a column of mingled flame and smoke towering far above the horizon, and attesting the universal wreck of what had so long been endeared to her as her home. And she had witnessed all this, and yet had strength to survive it!

The courage of the unhappy girl had hitherto been sustained by no effort of volition of her own. From the moment when, discovering a friend in Oucanasta, she had yielded herself unresistingly to the guidance of that generous creature, her feelings had been characterised by an obtuseness strongly in contrast with the high excitement that had distinguished her previous manner. A dreamy recollection of some past horror, it is true, pursued her during her rapid and speechless flight; but any analysis of the causes conducing to that horror, her subjugated faculties were unable to enter upon. She had followed her conductor almost without consciousness, and with such deep absorption of spirit, that she neither once conjectured whither they were going, nor what was to be the final issue of their flight. But now, when she stood on the lake shore, suddenly awakened, as if by some startling spell, to every harrowing recollection, and with her attention assisted by objects long endeared, and rendered familiar to her gaze—when she beheld the vessel that had last borne her across the still bosom of the Huron, fleeing for ever from the fortress where her arrival had been so joyously hailed—when she saw that fortress itself presenting the hideous spectacle of a blackened mass of ruins fast crumbling into nothingness, a faintness, as of death, came over her, and she sank without life on the beach. Of what passed afterwards, she had no recollection. She neither knew how she had got into the canoe, nor what means the Indian had taken to secure her approach to the schooner. She had no consciousness of having been removed to the bark of the Canadian, nor did she even remember having risen and gazed through the foliage on the vessel at her side; but she presumed, the chill air of morning having partially restored pulsation, she had moved instinctively from her recumbent position to the spot in which her spectre-like countenance had been perceived by Fuller. The first moment of her returning reason was that when, standing on the deck of the schooner, she found herself so unexpectedly clasped to the heart of her lover.

Twilight had entirely passed away when Miss de Haldimar completed her sad narrative; and already the crew, roused to exertion by the swelling breeze, were once more engaged in weighing the anchor, and setting and trimming the sails of the schooner, which latter soon began to shoot round the concealing headland into the opening of the Sinclair. A deathlike silence prevailed throughout the decks of the little bark, as her bows, dividing the waters of the basin that formed its source, gradually immersed into the current of that deep but narrow river; so narrow, indeed, that from its centre the least active of the mariners might have leaped without difficulty to either shore. This was the most critical part of the dangerous navigation. With a wide seaboard, and full command of their helm, they had nothing to fear; but so limited was the passage of this river, it was with difficulty the yards and masts of the schooner could be kept disengaged from the projecting boughs of the dense forest that lined the adjacent shores to their very junction with the water. The darkness of the night, moreover, while it promised to shield them from the observation of the savages, contributed greatly to perplex their movements; for such was the abruptness with which the river wound itself round in various directions, that it required a man constantly on the alert at the bows to apprise the helmsman of the course he should steer, to avoid collision with the shores. Canopies of weaving branches met in various directions far above their heads, and through these the schooner glided with a silence that might have called up the idea of a Stygian freight. Meanwhile, the men stood to their guns, concealing the matches in their water-buckets as before; and, while they strained both ear and eye through the surrounding gloom to discover the slightest evidence of danger, grasped the handles of their cutlasses with a firm hand, ready to unsheathe them at the first intimation of alarm.

At the suggestion of the boatswain, who hinted at the necessity of having cleared decks, Captain de Haldimar had prevailed on his unfortunate relatives to retire to the small cabin arranged for their reception; and here they were attended by an aged female, who had long followed the fortunes of the crew, and acted in the twofold character of laundress and sempstress. He himself, with Sir Everard, continued on deck watching the progress of the vessel with an anxiety that became more intense at each succeeding hour. Hitherto their course had been unimpeded, save by the obstacles already enumerated; and they had now, at about an hour before dawn, gained a point that promised a speedy termination to their dangers and perplexities. Before them lay a reach in the river, enveloped in more than ordinary gloom, produced by the continuous weaving of the tops of the overhanging trees; and in the perspective, a gleam of relieving light, denoting the near vicinity of the lake that lay at the opposite extremity of the Sinclair, whose name it also bore. This was the narrowest part of the river; and so approximate were its shores, that the vessel in her course could not fail to come in contact both with the obtruding foliage of the forest and the dense bulrushes skirting the edge of either bank.

"If we get safe through this here place," said the boatswain, in a rough whisper to his anxious and attentive auditors, "I think as how I'll venture to answer for the craft. I can see daylight dancing upon the lake already. Ten minutes more and she will be there." Then turning to the man at the helm,—"Keep her in the centre of the stream, Jim. Don't you see you're hugging the weather shore?"

"It would take the devil himself to tell which is the centre," growled the sailor, in the same suppressed tone.

"One might steer with one's eyes shut in such a queer place as this, and never be no worse off than with them open."

"Steady her helm, steady," rejoined Mullins, "it's as dark as pitch, to be sure, but the passage is straight as an arrow, and with a steady helm you can't miss it. Make for the light ahead."

"Aha! there!" hurriedly and loudly shouted the man on the look-out at the bows, "there's a tree lying across the river, and we're just upon it."

While he yet spoke, and before the boatswain could give such instructions as the emergency required, the vessel suddenly struck against the obstacle in question; but the concussion was not of the violent nature that might have been anticipated. The course of the schooner, at no one period particularly rapid, had been considerably checked since her entrance into the gloomy arch, in the centre of which her present accident had occurred; so that it was without immediate injury to her hull and spars she had been thus suddenly brought to. But this was not the most alarming part of the affair. Captain de Haldimar and Sir Everard both recollected, that, in making the same passage, not forty-eight hours previously, they had encountered no obstacle of the kind, and a misgiving of danger rose simultaneously to the hearts of each. It was, however, a thing of too common occurrence, where storm and tempest were so prevalent and partial, to create more than a mere temporary alarm; for it was quite as probable the barrier had been interposed by some siffling outburst of nature, as that it arose from design on the part of their enemies: and when the vessel had continued stationary for some minutes, without the prepared and expectant crew discovering the slightest indication of attack, the former impression was preserved by the officers—at least avowedly to those around.

"Bear a hand, my lads, and cut away," at length ordered the boatswain, in a low but clear tone; "half a dozen at each end of the stick, and we shall soon clear a passage for the craft."

A dozen sailors grasped their axes, and hastened forward to execute the command. They sprang lightly from the entangled bows of the schooner, and diverging in equal numbers moved to either extremity of the fallen tree.

"This is sailing through the heart of the American forest with a vengeance," muttered Mullins, whose annoyance at their detention was strongly manifested as he paced up and down the deck. "Shiver my topsails, if it isn't bad enough to clear the Sinclair at any time, much more so when one's running for one's life, and not a whisper's length from one's enemies. Do you know, Captain," abruptly checking his movement, and familiarly placing his hand on the shoulder of De Haldimar, "the last time we sailed through this very reach I couldn't help telling poor Captain Danvers, God rest his soul, what a nice spot it was for an Indian ambushade, if they had only gumption enough to think of it."

"Hark!" said the officer, whose heart, eye, and ear were painfully on the alert, "what rustling is that we hear overhead?"

"It's Jack Fuller, no doubt, your honour; I sent him up to clear away the branches from the main topmast rigging." Then raising his head, and elevating his voice, "Hilloa! aloft there!"

The only answer was a groan, followed by a deeper commotion among the rustling foliage.

"Why, what the devil's the matter with you now, Jack?" pursued the boatswain, in a voice of angry vehemence. "Are ye scared at another ghost, that ye keep groaning there after that fashion?"

At that moment a heavy dull mass was heard tumbling through the upper rigging of the schooner towards the deck, and presently a human form fell at the very feet of the small group, composed of the two officers and the individual who had last spoken.

"A light, a light!" shouted the boatswain; "the foolish chap has lost his hold through fear, and tumbled to one if he hasn't cracked his skull-piece for his pains. Quick there with a light, and let's see what we can do for him."

The attention of all had been arrested by the sound of the falling weight, and as one of the sailors now advanced, bearing a dark lantern from below, the whole of the crew, with the exception of those employed on the fallen tree, gathered themselves in a knot round the motionless form of the prostrate man. But no sooner had their eyes encountered the object of their interest, when each individual started suddenly and involuntarily back, baring his cutlass, and drawing forth his pistol, the whole presenting a group of countenances strongly marked by various shades of consternation and alarm, even while their attitudes were those of men prepared for some fierce and desperate danger. It was indeed Fuller whom they had beheld, but not labouring, as the boatswain had imagined, under the mere influence of superstitious fear. He was dead, and the blood flowing from a deep wound, inflicted by a sharp instrument in his chest, and the scalped head, too plainly told the manner of his death, and the danger that awaited them all.

A pause ensued, but it was short. Before any one could find words to remark on the horrible circumstance, the appalling war-cry of the savages burst loudly from every quarter upon the ears of the devoted crew. In the desperation of the moment, several of the men clutched their cutlasses between their teeth, and seizing the concealed matches, rushed to their respective stations at the guns. It was in vain the boatswain called out to them, in a voice of stern authority, to desist, intimating that their only protection lay in the reservation of the fire of their batteries. Goaded and excited, beyond the power of resistance to an impulse that set all subordination at defiance, they applied the matches, and almost at the same instant the terrific discharge of both broadsides took place, rocking the vessel to the water's edge, and reverberating, throughout the confined space in which she lay, like the deadly explosion of some deeply excavated mine.

Scarcely had the guns been fired, when the seamen became sensible of their imprudence. The echoes were yet struggling to force a passage through the dense forest, when a second yell of the Indians announced the fiercest joy and triumph, unmixed by disaster, at the result; and then the quick leaping of many forms could be heard, as they divided the crashing underwood, and rushed forward to close with their prey. It was evident, from the difference of sound, their first cry had been pealed forth while lying prostrate on the ground, and secure from the bullets, whose harmless discharge that cry was intended to provoke; for now the voices seemed to rise progressively from the earth, until they reached the level of each individual height, and were already almost hotly breathing in the ears of those they were destined to fill with illimitable dismay.

"Shiver my topsails, but this comes of disobeying orders," roared the boatswain, in a voice of mingled anger and vexation. "The Indians are quite as cunning as ourselves, and arn't to be frightened that way. Quick, every cutlass and pistol to his gangway, and let's do our best. Pass the word forward for the axemen to return to quarters."

Recovered from their first paroxysm of alarm, the men at length became sensible of the presence of a directing power, which, humble as it was, their long habits of discipline had taught them to respect, and, headed on the one side by Captain de Haldimar, and on the other by Sir Everard Valletort, neither of whom, however, entertained the most remote chance of success, flew, as commanded, to their respective gangways. The yell of the Indians had again ceased, and all was hushed into stillness; but as the anxious and quicksighted officers gazed over the bulwarks, they fancied they could perceive, even through the deep gloom that every where prevailed, the forms of men, resting in cautious and eager attitudes, on the very verge of the banks, and at a distance of little more than half pistol shot. Every heart beat with expectancy,—every eye was riveted intently in front, to watch and meet the first movements of their foes, but not a sound of approach was audible to the equally attentive ear. In this state of aching suspense they might have continued about five minutes, when suddenly their hearts were made to quail by a third cry, that came, not as previously, from the banks of the river, but from the very centre of their own decks, and from the topmast and rigging of the schooner. So sudden and unexpected too was this fresh danger, that before the two parties had time to turn, and assume a new posture of defence, several of them had already fallen under the butchering blades of their enemies. Then commenced a desperate but short conflict, mingled with yellings, that again were answered from every point; and rapidly gliding down the pendant ropes, were to be seen the active and dusky forms of men, swelling the number of the assailants, who had gained the deck in the same noiseless manner, until resistance became almost hopeless.

"Ha! I hear the footsteps of our lads at last," exclaimed Mullins exultingly to his comrades, as he finished despatching a third savage with his sturdy weapon. "Quick, men, quick, up with hatchet and cutlass, and take them in the rear. If we are to die, let's die game, he would perhaps have added, but death arrested the word upon his lips; and his corpse rolled along the deck, until its further progress was stopped by the stiffened body of the unhappy Fuller.

Notwithstanding the fall of their brave leader, and the whoopings of their enemies, the flagging spirits of the men were for a moment excited by the announcement of the return even of the small force of the axemen, and they defended themselves with a courage and determination worthy of a better result; but when, by the lurid light of the torches, now lying burning about the decks, they turned and beheld not their companions, but a fresh band of Indians, at whose pouch-belts dangled the reeking scalps of their murdered friends, they at once relinquished the combat as hopeless, and gave themselves unresistingly up to be bound by their captors.

Meanwhile the cousins experienced a renewal of all those horrors from which their distracted minds had been temporarily relieved; and, petrified with alarm, as they lay in the solitary berth that contained them both, endured sufferings infinitely more terrible than death itself. The early part of the tumult they had noticed almost without comprehending its cause, and but for the terrific cry of the Indians that had preceded them, would have mistaken the deafening broadsides for the blowing up of the vessel, so tremendous and violent had been the concussion. Nay, there was a moment when Miss de Haldimar felt a pang of deep disappointment and regret at the misconception; for, with the fearful recollection of past events, so strongly impressed on her bleeding heart, she could not but acknowledge, that to be engulfed in one general and disastrous explosion, was mercy compared with the alternative of falling into the hands of those to whom her loathing spirit had been too fatally taught to deny even the commonest attributes of humanity. As for Clara, she had not the power to think, or to form a conjecture on the subject:—she was merely sensible of a repetition of the horrible scenes from which she had so recently been snatched, and with a pale cheek, a fixed eye, and an almost pulseless heart, lay without motion in the inner side of the berth. The piteous spectacle of her cousin's alarm lent a forced activity to the despair of Miss de Haldimar, in whom apprehension produced that strong energy of excitement that sometimes gives to helplessness the character of true courage. With the increasing clamour of appalling conflict on deck, this excitement grew at every moment stronger, until it finally became irresistible, so that at length, when through the cabin windows there suddenly streamed a flood of yellow light, extinguishing that of the lamp that threw its flickering beams around the cabin, she flung herself impetuously from the berth, and, despite of the aged and trembling female who attempted to detain her, burst open the narrow entrance to the cabin, and rushed up the steps communicating with the deck.

The picture that here met her eyes was at once graphic and fearful in the extreme. On either side of the river, lines of streaming torches were waved by dusky warriors high above their heads, reflecting the grim countenances, not only of those who bore them, but of dense groups in their rear, whose numbers were alone concealed by the foliage of the forest in which they stood. From the branches that wove themselves across the centre of the river, and the topmast and rigging of the vessel, the same strong yellow light, produced by the bark of the birch tree steeped in gum, streamed down upon the decks below, rendering each line and block of the schooner as distinctly visible as if it had been noon on the sunniest of those far distant lakes. The deck itself was covered with the bodies of slain men—sailors and savages mixed together; and amid these were to be seen fierce warriors, reclining triumphantly and indolently on their rifles, while others were occupied in scouring the arms of their captives with leathern thongs behind their backs. The silence that now prevailed was strongly in contrast with, and even more fearful than, the horrid shouts by which it had been preceded; and, but for the ghastly countenances of the captives, and the quick rolling eyes of the savages, Miss de Haldimar might have imagined herself the sport of some extraordinary and exciting illusion. Her glance over these prominent features in the tragedy had been cursory, yet accurate. It now rested on one that had more immediate and terrifying interest for herself. At a few paces in front of the companion ladder, and with their backs turned towards her, stood two individuals, whose attitudes denoted the purpose of men resolved to sell with their lives alone a passage to a tall fierce-looking savage, whose countenance betrayed every mark of triumphant and deadly passion, while he apparently hesitated whether his uplifted arm should stay the weapon it wielded. These individuals were Captain de Haldimar and Sir Everard Valletort; and to the former of these the attention of the savage was more immediately and exultingly directed; so much so, indeed, that Miss de Haldimar thought she could read in the ferocious expression of his features the death-warrant of her cousin. In the wild terror of the moment she gave a piercing scream that was answered by a hundred yelling voices, and rushing between her lover and his enemy threw herself wildly and supplicatingly at the feet of the latter. Uttering a savage laugh, the monster spurned her from him with his foot, when, quick as thought, a pistol was discharged within a few inches of his face; but with a rapidity equal to that of his assailant, he bent aside his head, and the ball passed harmlessly on. The yell that followed was terrific; and while it was yet swelling into fulness, Captain de Haldimar felt an iron hand furiously grappling his throat, and, ere the grasp was relinquished, he again stood the bound and passive victim of the warrior of the Fleur de lis.

CHAPTER XXV.

The interval that succeeded to the last council scene of the Indians was passed by the officers of Detroit in a state of inexpressible anxiety and doubt. The fears entertained for the fate of their companions, who had set out in the perilous and almost forlorn hope of reaching Michillimackinac, in time to prevent the consummation of the threatened treachery, had, in some degree, if not wholly, been allayed by the story narrated by the Ottawa chief. It was evident, from his statement, the party had again met, and been engaged in fearful struggle with the gigantic warrior they had all so much reason to recollect; and it was equally apparent, that in that struggle they had been successful. But still, so many obstacles were likely to be opposed to their navigation of the several lakes and rivers over which lay their course, it was almost feared, even if they eventually escaped unharmed themselves, they could not possibly reach the fort in time to communicate the danger that awaited their friends. It is true, the time gained by Governor de Haldimar on the first occasion had afforded a considerable interval, of which advantage might be taken; but it was also, on the other hand, uncertain whether Pontecac had commanded the same delay in the council of the chiefs investing Michillimackinac, to which he had himself assented. Three days were sufficient to enable an Indian warrior to perform the journey by land; and it was chiefly on this vague and uncertain ground they based whatever little of hope was entertained on the subject.

It had been settled at the departure of the adventurers, that the instant they effected a communication with the schooner on Lake Huron, François should be immediately sent back, with instructions so to contrive the period of his return, that his canoe should make its appearance soon after daybreak at the nearest extremity of Hog Island, the position of which has been described in our introductory chapter. From this point a certain signal, that could be easily distinguished with the aid of a telescope, was to be made from the canoe, which, without being of a nature to attract the attention of the savages, was yet to be such as could not well be mistaken by the garrison. This was a precaution adopted, not only with the view of giving the earliest intimation of the result of the enterprise, but lest the Canadian should be prevented, by any closer investment on the part of the Indians, from communicating personally with the fort in the way he had been accustomed.

It will easily be comprehended therefore, that as the period approached when they might reasonably look for the return of François, if he should return at all, the nervous anxiety of the officers became more and more developed. Upwards of a week had elapsed since the departure of their friends; and already, for the last day or two, their impatience had led them, at early dawn, and with beating hearts, to that quarter of the rampart which overlooked the eastern extremity of Hog Island. Hitherto, however, their eager watching had been in vain. As far as our recollection of the Canadian tradition of this story serves us, it must have been on the fourth night after the final discomfiture of the plans of Pontecac, and the tenth from the departure of the adventurers, that the officers were assembled in the mess-room, partaking of the scanty and frugal supper to which their long confinement had reduced them. The subject of their conversation, as it was ever of their thoughts, was the probable fate of their companions; and many and various, although all equally melancholy, were the conjectures offered as to the result. There was on the countenance of each, that deep and fixed expression of gloom, which, if it did not indicate any unmanliness of despair, told at least that hope was nearly extinct: but more especially was this remarkable in the young but sadly altered Charles de Haldimar, who, with a vacant eye and a preoccupied manner, seemed wholly abstracted from the scene before him.

All was silence in the body of the fort. The men off duty had long since retired to rest in their clothes, and only the "All's well!" of the sentinels was heard at intervals of a quarter of an hour, as the cry echoed from mouth to mouth in the line of circuit. Suddenly, however, between two of those intervals, and during a pause in the languid conversation of the officers, the sharp challenge of a sentinel was heard, and then quick steps on the rampart, as of men hastening to the point whence the challenge had been given. The officers, whom this new excitement seemed to arouse into fresh activity, hurriedly quitted the room; and, with as little noise as possible, gained the spot where the voice had been heard. Several men were bending eagerly over the rampart, and, with their muskets at the recover, riveting their gaze on a dark and motionless object that lay on the verge of the ditch immediately beneath them.

"What have you here, Mitchell?" asked Captain Blessington, who was in command of the guard, and who had recognised the gruff voice of the veteran in the challenge just given.

"An American burnt log, your honour," muttered the soldier, "if one was to judge from its stillness; but if it is, it must have rolled there within the last minute; for I'll take my affidavit it wasn't here when I passed last in my beat."

"An American burnt log, indeed! it's some rascal of a spy, rather," remarked Captain Erskine. Who knows but it may be our big friend, come to pay us a visit again? And yet he is not half long enough for him, either. Can't you try and tickle him with the bayonet, any of you fellows, and see whether he is made of flesh and blood?"

Although this observation was made almost without object, it being totally impossible for any musket, even with the addition of its bayonet, to reach more than half way across the ditch, the several sentinels threw themselves on their chests, and, stretching over the rampart as far as possible, made the attempt to reach the suspicious looking object that lay beyond. No sooner, however, had their arms been extended in such a manner as to be utterly powerless, when the dark mass was seen to roll away in an opposite direction, and with such rapidity that, before the men could regain their feet and level their muskets, it had entirely disappeared from their view.

"Cleverly managed, to give the red skin his due," half laughingly observed Captain Erskine, while his brother officers continued to fix their eyes in astonishment on the spot so recently occupied by the strange object; "but what the devil could be his motive for lying there so long? Not playing the eaves-dropper, surely; and yet, if he meant to have picked off a sentinel, what was to have prevented him from doing it sooner?"

"He had evidently no arms," said Esnign Delme.

"No, nor legs either, it would appear," resumed the literal Erskine. "Curse me if I ever saw any thing in the shape of a human form bundled together in that manner."

"I mean he had no fire-arms—no rifle," pursued Delme.

"And if he had, he certainly would have rifled one of us of a life," continued the captain, laughing at his own conceit. "But come, the bird is flown, and we have only to thank ourselves for having been so egregiously duped. Had Valletot been here, he would have given a different account of him."

"Hist! listen!" exclaimed Lieutenant Johnstone, calling the attention of the party to a peculiar and low sound in the direction in which the supposed Indian had departed.

It was repeated, and in a plaintive tone, indicating a desire to propitiate. Soon afterwards a human form was seen advancing slowly, but without show either of concealment or hostility in its movements. It finally remained stationary on the spot where the dark and shapeless mass had been first perceived.

"Another Oucanasta for De Haldimar, no doubt," observed Captain Erskine, after a moment's pause. "These grenadiers carry every thing before them as well in love as in war." The error of the good-natured officer was, however, obvious to all but himself. The figure, which was now distinctly traced in outline for that of a warrior, stood boldly and fearlessly on the brink of the ditch, holding up its left arm, in the hand of which dangled something that was visible in the starlight, and pointing unergetically to this pendant object with the other. A voice from one of the party now addressed the Indian in two several dialects, but without eliciting a reply. He either understood not, or would not answer the question proposed, but continued pointing significantly to the indistinct object which he still held in an elevated position.

"The governor must be apprised of this," observed Captain Blessington to De Haldimar, who was his subaltern of the guard. "Hasten, Charles, to acquaint your father, and receive his orders."

The young officer willingly obeyed the injunction of his superior. A secret and indefinable hope rushed through his mind, that as the Indian came not in hostility, he might be the bearer of some communication from their friends; and he moved rapidly towards that part of the building occupied by his father.

The light of a lamp suspended over the piazza leading to the governor's rooms reflecting strongly on his regimentals, he passed unchallenged by the sentinels posted there, and uninterruptedly gained a door that opened on a narrow passage, at the further extremity of which was the sitting-room usually occupied by his parent. This again was entered from the same passage by a second door, the upper part of which was of common glass, enabling any one on the outside to trace with facility every object within when the place was lighted up.

A glance was sufficient to satisfy the youth his father was not in the room; although there was strong evidence he had not retired for the night. In the middle of the floor stood an oaken table, and on this lay an open writing desk, with a candle on each side, the wicks of which had burnt so long as to throw a partial gloom over the surrounding wainscoting. Scattered about the table and desk were a number of letters that had apparently been just looked at or read; and in the midst of these an open case of red morocco, containing a miniature. The appearance of these letters, thus left scattered about by one who was scrupulously exact in the arrangement of his papers, added to the circumstance of the neglected and burning candles, confirmed the young officer in an impression that his father, overcome by fatigue, had retired into his bed-room, and fallen unconsciously asleep. Imagining, therefore, he could not, without difficulty, succeed in making himself heard, and deeming the urgency of the case required it, he determined to wave the usual ceremony of knocking, and penetrate to his father's bed-room unannounced. The glass door being without fastening within, easily yielded to his pressure of the latch; but as he passed by the table, a strong and natural feeling of curiosity induced him to cast his eye upon the miniature. To his infinite surprise, nay, almost terror, he discovered it was that of his mother—the identical portrait which his sister Clara had worn in her bosom from infancy, and which he had seen clasped round her neck on the very deck of the schooner in which she sailed for Michillimackinac. He felt there could be no mistake, for only one miniature of the sort had ever been in possession of the family, and that the one just accounted for. Almost stupefied at what he saw, and scarcely crediting the evidence of his senses, the young officer glanced his eye hurriedly along one of the open letters that lay around. It was in the well remembered hand-writing of his mother, and commenced, "Dear, dearest Reginald." After this followed expressions of endearment no woman might address except to an affianced lover, or the husband of her choice; and his heart sickened while he read. Scarcely, however, had he scanned half a dozen lines, when it occurred to him he was violating some secret of his parents; and, discontinuing the perusal with an effort, he prepared to acquit himself of his mission.

On raising his eyes from the paper he was startled by the appearance of his father, who, with a stern brow and a quivering lip, stood a few paces from the table, apparently too much overcome by his indignation to be able to utter a sentence. Charles de Haldimar felt all the awkwardness of his position. Some explanation of his conduct, however, was necessary; and he stammered forth the fact of the portrait having riveted his attention, from its striking resemblance to that in his sister's possession.

"And to what do these letters bear resemblance?" demanded the governor, in a voice that trembled in its attempt to be calm, while he fixed his penetrating eye on that of his son. "They, it appears, were equally objects of attraction with you."

"The letters were in the hand-writing of my mother; and I was irresistibly led to glance at one of them," replied the youth, with the humility of conscious wrong. "The action was involuntary, and no sooner committed than repented of. I am here, my father, on a mission of importance, which must account for my presence."

"A mission of importance!" repeated the governor,

with more of sorrow than of anger in the tone in which he now spoke. "On what mission are you here, if it be not to intrude unwarrantably on a parent's privacy?"

The young officer's cheek flushed high, as he proudly answered:—"I was sent by Captain Blessington, sir, to take your orders in regard to an Indian who is now without the fort under somewhat extraordinary circumstances, yet evidently without intention of hostility. It is supposed he bears some message from my brother."

The tone of candour and offended pride in which this formal announcement of duty was made seemed to banish all suspicion from the mind of the governor; and he remarked, in a voice that had more of the kindness than had latterly distinguished his address to his son, "Was this, then, Charles, the only motive for your abrupt intrusion at this hour? Are you sure no inducement of private curiosity was mixed up with the discharge of your duty, that you entered thus unannounced? You must admit, at least, I found you employed in a manner different from what the urgency of your mission would seem to justify."

There was lurking irony in this speech; yet the softened accents of his father, in some measure, disarmed the youth of the bitterness he would have flung into his observation.—"That no man on earth, his parent excepted, should have dared to insinuate such a doubt with impunity."

For a moment Colonel de Haldimar seemed to regard his son with a surprised but satisfied air, as if he had not expected the manifestation of so much spirit, in one whom he had been accustomed greatly to undervalue.

"I believe you, Charles," he at length observed; "forgive the justifiable doubt, and think no more of the subject. Yet, one word," as the youth was preparing to depart; "you have read that letter" (and he pointed to that which had principally arrested the attention of the officer): what impression has it given you of your mother? Answer me sincerely. My name," and his faint smile wore something of the character of triumph, "is not Reginald, you know."

The pallid cheek of the young man flushed at this question. His own undistinguished impression was, that his mother had cherished a guilty love for another than her husband. He felt the almost impiety of such a belief, but he could not resist the conviction that forced itself on his mind; the letter in her handwriting spoke for itself; and though the idea was full of wretchedness, he was unable to conquer it. Whatever his own inference might be, however, he could not endure the thought of imparting it to his father: he therefore answered evasively.

"Doubtless my mother had some dear relative of the name, and to him was this letter addressed; perhaps a brother, or an uncle. But I never knew," he pursued, with a look of appeal to his father, "that a second portrait of my mother existed. This is the very counterpart of Clara's."

"It may be the same," remarked the governor, but in a tone of indecision, that denied his faith in what he uttered.

"Impossible, my father. I accompanied Clara, if you recollect, as far as Lake Sinclair; and when I quitted the deck of the schooner to return, I particularly remarked my sister wore her mother's portrait, as usual, round her neck."

"Well, no matter about the portrait," hurriedly rejoined the governor; "yet, whatever your impression, Charles," and he spoke with a warmth that was far from habitual to him, "dare not to sully the memory of your mother by a doubt of her purity. An accident has given this letter to your inspection, but breathe not its contents to a human creature; above all, respect the being who gave you birth. Go, tell Captain Blessington to detain the Indian; I will join you immediately."

Strongly, yet confusedly, impressed with the singularity of the scene altogether, and more particularly with his father's strange admonition, the young officer quitted the room, and hastened to rejoin his companions. On reaching the rampart he found that the Indian, during his long absence, had departed; yet not without depositing, on the outer edge of the ditch, the substance to which he had previously directed their attention. At the moment of De Haldimar's approach, the officers were bending over the rampart, and, with straining eyes, endeavouring to make out what it was, but in vain; something was just perceptible in the withered turf, but what that something was no one could succeed in discovering.

"Whatever this be, we must possess ourselves of it," said Captain Blessington; "it is evident, from the energetic manner of him who left it, it is of importance. I think I know who is the best swimmer and climber of our party."

Several voices unanimously pronounced the name of "Johnstone."

"Any thing for a dash of enterprise," said that officer, whose slight wound had been perfectly healed. "But what do you propose that the swimmer and climber should do, Blessington?"

"Secure yon parcel, without lowering the draw-bridge."

"What! and be scalped in the act! Who knows if it be not a trick after all, and that the rascal who placed it there is not lying within a few feet, ready to pounce upon me the instant I reach the bank."

"Never mind," said Erskine, laughingly, "we will revenge your death, my boy."

"Besides, consider the namquam non paratus, Johnstone," slyly remarked Lieutenant Leslie.

"What, again, Leslie?" energetically responded the young Scotman. "Yet think not I hesitate, for I did but jest: make fast a rope round my loins, and I think I will answer for the result."

Colonel de Haldimar now made his appearance. Having heard a brief statement of the facts, and approving of the suggestion of Captain Blessington, a rope was procured, and made fast under the shoulders of the young officer, who had previously stripped himself of his uniform and shoes. He then suffered himself to drop gently over the edge of the rampart, his companions gradually lowering the rope, until a deep and gasping aspiration, such as is usually wrung from one coming suddenly in contact with cold water, announced he had gained the surface of the ditch. The rope was then slackened, to give him the unrestrained command of his limbs; and in the next instant he was seen clambering up the opposite elevation.

Although the officers, indulging in a forced levity, in a great degree meant to encourage their companion, had treated his enterprise with indifference, they were far from being without serious anxiety for the result. They had laughed at the idea, suggested by him, of being scalped; whereas, in truth, they entertained the apprehension far more powerfully than he did himself. The artifices resorted to by the savages, to secure an isolated victim, were so many and so various, that suspicion could not but attach to the mysterious occurrence they had just witnessed. Willing even as they were to believe their present visitor, whoever he was, came not in a spirit of enmity, they could not altogether divest themselves of a fear that it was only a subtle artifice to decoy one of them within the reach of their traitorous weapons. They, therefore, watched the movements of their companion with quickening pulses; and it was with a lively satisfaction they saw him, at length, after a momentary search, descend once more into the ditch, and, with a single powerful impulsion of his limbs, urge himself back to the foot of the rampart. Neither feet nor hands were of much service, in enabling him to scale the smooth and slanting logs that composed the exterior surface of the works; but a slight jerk of the well secured rope, serving as a signal to his friends, he was soon dragged once more to the summit of the rampart, without other injury than a couple of slight bruises.

"Well, what success?" eagerly asked Leslie and Captain Erskine, in the same breath, as the dripping Johnstone buried himself in the folds of a capacious cloak procured during his absence.

"You shall hear," was the reply; "but first, gentlemen, allow me, if you please, to enjoy, with yourselves, the luxury of dry clothes. I have no particular ambition to contract an American ague fit just now; yet, unless you take pity on me, and reserve my examination for a future moment, there is every probability I shall not have a tooth left by to-morrow morning."

No one could deny the justice of the remark, for the teeth of the young man were chattering as he spoke. It was not, therefore, until after he had changed his dress, and swallowed a couple of glasses of Captain Erskine's never failing spirit, that they all repaired once more to the mess-room, when Johnstone anticipated all questions, by the production of the mysterious packet.

After removing several wrappers of bark, each of which was secured by a thong of deer-skin, Colonel de Haldimar, to whom the successful officer had handed his prize, at length came to a small oval case of red morocco, precisely similar, in size and form, to that which had so lately attracted the notice of his son. For a moment he hesitated, and his cheek was observed to turn pale, and his hand to tremble; but quickly subduing his indecision, he hurriedly unfastened the clasp, and disclosed to the astonished view of the officers the portrait of a young and lovely woman, habited in the Highland garb.

Exclamations of various kinds burst from the lips of the group of officers. Several knew it to be the portrait of Mrs. de Haldimar; others recognised it from the striking likenesses it bore to Clara and to Charles; all knew it had never been absent from the possession of the former since her mother's death; and feeling satisfied as they did that its extraordinary appearance among them, at the present moment, was an announcement of some dreadful disaster, their countenances wore an impress of dismay little inferior to that of the wretched Charles, who, agonised beyond all attempt at description, had thrown himself into a seat in the rear of the group, and sat like one bewildered, with his head buried in his hands.

"Gentlemen," at length observed Colonel de Haldimar, in a voice that proved how vainly his natural emotion was sought to be subdued by his pride, "this, I fear me, is an unwelcome token. It comes to announce to a father the murder of his child; to us all, the destruction of our last remaining friends and comrades."

"God forbid!" solemnly aspirated Captain Blessington. After a pause of a moment or two he pursued: "I know not why, sir; but my impression is, the appearance of this portrait, which we all recognise for that worn by Miss de Haldimar, bears another interpretation."

Colonel de Haldimar shook his head. "I have but too much reason to believe," he observed, smiling in mournful bitterness, "it has been conveyed to us not in mercy but in revenge."

No one ventured to question why; for notwithstanding all were aware that, in the mysterious ravisher of the wife of Halloway, Colonel de Haldimar had a fierce and inexorable private enemy, no allusion had ever been made by that officer himself to the subject.

"Will you permit me to examine the portrait and envelope, colonel?" resumed Captain Blessington: I feel almost confident, although I confess I have no other motive for it than what springs from a recollection of the manner of the Indian, that the result will bear me out in my belief the bearer came not in hostility but in friendship."

"By my faith, I quite agree with Blessington," said Captain Erskine; "for, in addition to the manner of the Indian, there is another evidence in favour of his position. Was it merely intended in the light in which you consider it, colonel, the case or the miniature itself might have been returned, but certainly not the metal in which it is set. The savages are fully aware of the value of gold, and would not so easily let it slip through their fingers."

Meanwhile, Captain Blessington had turned and examined the miniature in fifty different ways, but without succeeding in discovering any thing that could confirm him in his original impression. Vexed and disappointed, he at length flung it from him on the table, and sinking into a seat at the side of the unfortunate Charles, pressed the hand of the youth in significant silence.

Finding his worst fears now confirmed, Colonel de Haldimar, for the first time, cast a glance towards his son, whose drooping head, and sorrowing attitude, spoke volumes to his heart. For a moment his own cheek blanched, and his eye was seen to glisten with the first tear ever witnessed there by those around him. Subduing his emotion, however, he drew up his person to its lordly height, as if that act reminded him the commander was not to be lost in the father, and quitting the room with a heavy brow and step, recommended to his officers the repose of which they appeared to stand so much in need. But not one was there who felt inclined to court the solitude of his pillow. No sooner were the footsteps of the governor heard dying away in the distance, when fresh lights were ordered, and several logs of wood heaped on the slackening fire. Around this the officers now grouped, and throwing themselves back in their chairs, assumed the attitudes of men seeking to indulge rather in private reflection than in personal converse.

The grief of the wretched Charles de Haldimar, hitherto restrained by the presence of his father, and encouraged by the touching evidences of interest afforded him by the ever considerate Blessington, now burst forth audibly. No attempt was made by the latter officer to check the emotion of his young friend. Knowing his passionate fondness for his sister, he was not without fear that the sudden shock produced by the appearance of her miniature might destroy his reason, even if it affected not his in the ferocious expression of his features the death-warrant of her cousin. In the wild terror of the moment she gave a piercing scream that was answered by a hundred yelling voices, and rushing between her lover and his enemy threw herself wildly and supplicatingly at the feet of the latter. Uttering a savage laugh, the monster spurned her from him with his foot, when, quick as thought, a pistol was discharged within a few inches of his face; but with a rapidity equal to that of his assailant, he bent aside his head, and the ball passed harmlessly on. The yell that followed was terrific; and while it was yet swelling into fulness, Captain de Haldimar felt an iron hand furiously grappling his throat, and, ere the grasp was relinquished, he again stood the bound and passive victim of the warrior of the Flour de lis.

CHAPTER XXV.

The interval that succeeded to the last council scene of the Indians was passed by the officers of Detroit in a state of inexpressible anxiety and doubt. The fears entertained for the fate of their companions, who had set out in the perilous and almost forlorn hope of reaching Michillimackinac, in time to prevent the consummation of the threatened treachery, had, in some degree, if not wholly, been allayed by the story narrated by the Ottawa chief. It was evident, from his statement, the party had again met, and been engaged in fearful struggle with the gigantic warrior they had all so much reason to recollect; and it was equally apparent, that in that struggle they had been successful. But still, so many obstacles were likely to be opposed to their navigation of the several lakes and rivers over which lay their course, it was almost feared, even if they eventually escaped unharmed themselves, they could not possibly reach the fort in time to communicate the danger that awaited their friends. It is true, the time gained by Governor de Haldimar on the first occasion had afforded a considerable interval, of which advantage might be taken; but it was also, on the other hand, uncertain whether Pontiac had commanded the same delay in the council of the chiefs investing Michillimackinac, to which he had himself assented. Three days were sufficient to enable an Indian warrior to perform the journey by land; and it was chiefly on this vague and uncertain ground they based whatever little of hope was entertained on the subject.

It had been settled at the departure of the adventurers, that the instant they effected a communication with the schooner on Lake Huron, François should be immediately sent back, with instructions so to contrive the period of his return, that his canoe should make its appearance soon after daybreak at the nearest extremity of Hog Island, the position of which has been described in our introductory chapter. From this point a certain signal, that could be easily distinguished with the aid of a telescope, was to be made from the canoe, which, without being of a nature to attract the attention of the savages, was yet to be such as could not well be mistaken by the garrison. This was a precaution adopted, not only with the view of giving the earliest intimation of the result of the enterprise, but lest the Canadian should be prevented, by any closer investment on the part of the Indians, from communicating personally with the fort in the way he had been accustomed.

It will easily be comprehended therefore, that as the period approached when they might reasonably look for the return of François, if he should return at all, the nervous anxiety of the officers became more and more developed. Upwards of a week had elapsed since the departure of their friends; and already, for the last day or two, their impatience had led them, at early dawn, and with beating hearts, to that quarter of the rampart which overlooked the eastern extremity of Hog Island. Hitherto, however, their eager watching had been in vain. As far as our recollection of the Canadian tradition of this story serves us, it must have been on the fourth night after the final discomfiture of the plans of Pontiac, and the tenth from the departure of the adventurers, that the officers were assembled in the mess-room, partaking of the scanty and frugal supper to which their long confinement had reduced them. The subject of their conversation, as it was ever of their thoughts, was the probable fate of their companions; and many and various, although all equally melancholy, were the conjectures offered as to the result. There was on the countenance of each, that deep and fixed expression of gloom, which, if it did not indicate any unmanliness of despair, told at least that hope was nearly extinct; but more especially was this remarkable in the young but sadly altered Charles de Haldimar, who, with a vacant eye and a preoccupied manner, seemed wholly abstracted from the scene before him.

All was silence in the body of the fort. The men off duty had long since retired to rest in their clothes, and only the "All's well!" of the sentinels was heard at intervals of a quarter of an hour, as the cry echoed from mouth to mouth in the line of circuit. Suddenly, however, between two of those intervals, and during a pause in the languid conversation of the officers, the sharp challenge of a sentinel was heard, and then quick steps on the rampart, as of men hastening to the point whence the challenge had been given. The officers, whom this new excitement seemed to arouse into fresh activity, hurriedly quitted the room; and, with as little noise as possible, gained the spot where the voice had been heard. Several men were bending eagerly over the rampart, and, with their muskets at the recover, riveting their gaze on a dark and motionless object that lay on the verge of the ditch immediately beneath them.

"What have you here, Mitchell?" asked Captain Blessington, who was in command of the guard, and who had recognised the gruff voice of the veteran in the challenge just given.

"An American burnt log, your honour," muttered the soldier, "if one was to judge from its stillness; but if it is, it must have rolled there within the last minute; for I'll take my affidavit it wasn't here when I passed last in my beat."

"An American burnt log, indeed! it's some rascal of a spy, rather," remarked Captain Erskine. Who knows but it may be our big friend, come to pay us a visit again? And yet he is not half long enough for him, either. Can't you try and tickle him with the bayonet, any of you fellows, and see whether he is made of flesh and blood?"

Although this observation was made almost without object, it being totally impossible for any musket, even with the addition of its bayonet, to reach more than half way across the ditch, the several sentinels threw themselves on their chests, and, stretching over the rampart as far as possible, made the attempt to reach the suspicious looking object that lay beyond. No sooner, however, had their arms been extended in such a manner as to be utterly powerless, when the dark mass was seen to roll away in an opposite direction, and with such rapidity that, before the men could regain their feet and level their muskets, it had entirely disappeared from their view.

"Cleverly managed, to give the red skin his due," half laughingly observed Captain Erskine, while his brother officers continued to fix their eyes in astonishment on the spot so recently occupied by the strange object; "but what the devil could be his motive for lying there so long? Not playing the eaves-dropper, surely; and yet, if he meant to have picked off a sentinel, what was to have prevented him from doing it sooner?"

"He had evidently no arms," said Esau Delme.

"No, nor legs either, it would appear," resumed the literal Erskine. "Curse me if I ever saw any thing in the shape of a human form bundled together in that manner."

"I mean he had no fire-arms—no rifle," pursued Delme.

"And if he had, he certainly would have rifled one of us of a life," continued the captain, laughing at his own conceit. "But come, the bird is flown, and we have only to thank ourselves for having been so egregiously duped. Had Valletort been here, he would have given a different account of him."

"Hist! listen!" exclaimed Lieutenant Johnstone, calling the attention of the party to a peculiar and low sound in the direction in which the supposed Indian had departed.

It was repeated, and in a plaintive tone, indicating a desire to propitiate. Soon afterwards a human form was seen advancing slowly, but without show either of concealment or hostility in its movements. It finally remained stationary on the spot where the dark and shapeless mass had been first perceived.

"Another Oucanasta for De Haldimar, no doubt," observed Captain Erskine, after a moment's pause. "These grenadiers carry every thing before them as well in love as in war." The error of the good-natured officer was, however, obvious to all but himself. The figure, which was now distinctly traced in outline for that of a warrior, stood boldly and fearlessly on the brink of the ditch, holding up its left arm, in the hand of which dangled something that was visible in the starlight, and pointing energetically to this pendant object with the other. A voice from one of the party now addressed the Indian in two several dialects, but without eliciting a reply. He either understood not, or would not answer the question proposed, but continued pointing significantly to the indistinct object which he still held in an elevated position.

"The governor must be apprised of this," observed Captain Blessington to De Haldimar, who was his subaltern of the guard. "Hasten, Charles, to acquaint your father, and receive his orders."

The young officer willingly obeyed the injunction of his superior. A secret and indefinable hope rushed through his mind, that as the Indian came not in hostility, he might be the bearer of some communication from their friends; and he moved rapidly towards that part of the building occupied by his father.

The light of a lamp suspended over the piazza leading to the governor's rooms reflecting strongly on his regimentals, he passed unchallenged by the sentinels posted there, and uninterruptedly gained a door that opened on a narrow passage, at the further extremity of which was the sitting-room usually occupied by his parent. This again was entered from the same passage by a second door, the upper part of which was of common glass, enabling any one on the outside to trace with facility every object within when the place was lighted up.

A glance was sufficient to satisfy the youth his father was not in the room; although there was strong evidence he had not retired for the night. In the middle of the floor stood an oaken table, and on this lay an open writing desk, with a candle on each side, the wicks of which had burnt so long as to throw a partial gloom over the surrounding wainscoting. Scattered about the table and desk were a number of letters that had apparently been just looked at or read; and in the midst of these an open case of red morocco, containing a miniature. The appearance of these letters, thus left scattered about by one who was scrupulously exact in the arrangement of his papers, added to the circumstance of the neglected and burning candles, confirmed the young officer in an impression that his father, overcome by fatigue, had retired into his bed-room, and fallen unconsciously asleep. Imagining, therefore, he could not, without difficulty, succeed in making himself heard, and deeming the urgency of the case required it, he determined to wave the usual ceremony of knocking, and penetrate to his father's bed-room unannounced. The glass door being without fastening within, easily yielded to his pressure of the latch; but as he passed by the table, a strong and natural feeling of curiosity induced him to cast his eye upon the miniature. To his infinite surprise, nay, almost terror, he discovered it was that of his mother—the identical portrait which his sister Clara had worn in her bosom from infancy, and which he had seen clasped round her neck on the very deck of the schooner in which she sailed for Michillimackinac. He felt there could be no mistake, for only one miniature of the sort had ever been in possession of the family, and that the one just accounted for. Almost stupified at what he saw, and scarcely crediting the evidence of his senses, the young officer glanced his eye hurriedly along one of the open letters that lay around. It was in the well remembered hand-writing of his mother, and commenced, "Dear, dearest Reginald." After this followed expressions of endearment no woman might address except to an affianced lover, or the husband of her choice; and his heart sickened while he read. Scarcely, however, had he scanned half a dozen lines, when it occurred to him he was violating some secret of his parents; and, discontinuing the perusal with an effort, he prepared to acquit himself of his mission.

On raising his eyes from the paper he was startled by the appearance of his father, who, with a stern brow and a quivering lip, stood a few paces from the table, apparently too much overcome by his indignation to be able to utter a sentence. Charles de Haldimar felt all the awkwardness of his position. Some explanation of his conduct, however, was necessary; and he stammered forth the fact of the portrait having riveted his attention from its striking resemblance to that in his sister's possession.

"And to what do these letters bear resemblance?" demanded the governor, in a voice that trembled in its attempt to be calm, while he fixed his penetrating eye on that of his son. "They, it appears, were equal objects of attraction with you."

"The letters were in the hand-writing of my mother, and I was irresistibly led to glance at one of them," replied the youth, with the humility of conscious wrong. "The action was involuntary, and no sooner committed than repented of. I am here, my father, on a mission of importance, which must account for my presence."

"A mission of importance!" repeated the governor, with more of sorrow than of anger in the tone in which he now spoke. "On what mission are you here, if it be not to intrude unwarrantably on a parent's privacy?"

The young officer's cheek flushed high, as he proudly answered:—"I was sent by Captain Blessington, sir, to take your orders in regard to an Indian who is now without the fort under somewhat extraordinary circumstances, yet evidently without intention of hostility. It is supposed he bears some message from my brother."

The tone of candour and offended pride in which this formal announcement of duty was made seemed to banish all suspicion from the mind of the governor; and he remarked, in a voice that had more of the kindness than had latterly distinguished his address to his son, "Was this, then, Charles, the only motive for your abrupt intrusion at this hour? Are you sure no inducement of private curiosity was mixed up with the discharge of your duty, that you entered thus unannounced? You must admit, at least, I found you employed in a manner different from what the urgency of your mission would seem to justify."

There was lurking irony in this speech; yet the softened accents of his father, in some measure, disarmed the youth of the bitterness he would have flung into his observation.—"That no man on earth, his parent excepted, should have dared to insinuate such a doubt with impunity."

For a moment Colonel de Haldimar seemed to regard his son with a surprised but satisfied air, as if he had not expected the manifestation of so much spirit, in one whom he had been accustomed greatly to undervalue.

"I believe you, Charles," he at length observed; "forgive the justifiable doubt, and think no more of the subject. Yet, one word," as the youth was preparing to depart; "you have read that letter" (and he pointed to that which had principally arrested the attention of the officers): what impression has it given you of your mother? Answer me sincerely. My name," and his faint smile wore something of the character of triumph, "is not Reginald, you know."

The pallid cheek of the young man flushed at this question. His own undisguised impression was, that his mother had cherished a guilty love for another than her husband. He felt the almost impiety of such a belief, but he could not resist the conviction that forced itself on his mind; the letter in her handwriting spoke for itself; and though the idea was full of wretchedness, he was unable to conquer it. Whatever his own inference might be, however, he could not endure the thought of imparting it to his father: he therefore answered evasively.

"Doubtless my mother had some dear relative of the name, and to him was this letter addressed; perhaps a brother, or an uncle. But I never knew," he pursued, with a look of appeal to his father, "that a second portrait of my mother existed. This is the very counter-part of Clara's."

"It may be the same," remarked the governor, but in a tone of indecision, that denied his faith in what he uttered.

"Impossible, my father. I accompanied Clara, if you recollect, as far as Lake Sinclair; and when I quitted the deck of the schooner to return, I particularly remarked my sister wore her mother's portrait, as usual, round her neck."

"Well, no matter about the portrait," hurriedly rejoined the governor; "yet, whatever your impression, Charles," and he spoke with a warmth that was far from habitual to him, "dare not to sully the memory of your mother by a doubt of her purity. An accident has given this letter to your inspection, but breathe not its contents to a human creature; above all, respect the being who gave you birth. Go, tell Captain Blessington to detain the Indian; I will join you immediately."

Strongly, yet confusedly, impressed with the singularity of the scene altogether, and more particularly with his father's strange admonition, the young officer quitted the room, and hastened to rejoin his companions. On reaching the rampart he found that the Indian, during his long absence, had departed; yet not without depositing, on the outer edge of the ditch, the substance to which he had previously directed their attention. At the moment of De Haldimar's approach, the officers were bending over the rampart, and, with straining eyes, endeavouring to make out what it was, but in vain; something was just perceptible in the withered turf, but

"Besides, consider the nunquam non paratus, Johnstone," shily remarked Lieutenant Leslie.

"What, again, Leslie?" energetically responded the young Scotsman. "Yet think not I hesitate, for I did but jest: make fast a rope round my loins, and I think I will answer for the result."

Colonel de Haldimar now made his appearance. Having heard a brief statement of the facts, and approving of the suggestion of Captain Blessington, a rope was procured, and made fast under the shoulders of the young officer, who had previously stripped himself of his uniform and shoes. Around this the officers now grouped, and throwing themselves back in their chairs, assumed the attitudes of men seeking to indulge rather in private reflection than in personal converse.

The grief of the wretched Charles de Haldimar, hitherto restrained by the presence of his father, and encouraged by the touching evidences of interest afforded him by the ever considerate Blessington, now burst forth audibly. No attempt was made by the latter officer to check the emotion of his young friend. Knowing his passionate fondness for his sister, he was not without fear that the sudden shock produced by the appearance of her miniature might destroy his reason, even if it affected not his life; and as the moment was now come when tears might be shed without exciting invidious remark in the only individual who was likely to make it, he sought to promote them as much as possible. Too much occupied in their own mournful reflections to bestow more than a passing notice on the weakness of their friend, the group round the fire-place scarcely seemed to have regarded his emotion.

This violent paroxysm past, De Haldimar breathed more freely; and, after listening to several earnest observations of Captain Blessington, who still held out the possibility of something favourable turning up, on a re-examination of the portrait by daylight, he was so far composed as to be able to attend to the summons of the sergeant of the guard, who came to say the relief were ready, and waiting to be inspected before they were finally marched off. Clapping the extended hand of his captain between his own, with a pressure indicative of his deep gratitude, De Haldimar now proceeded to the discharge of his duty, and having caught up the portrait, which still lay on the table, and thrust it into the breast of his uniform, he repaired hurriedly to rejoin his guard, from which circumstances alone had induced his unusually long absence.

CHAPTER XXVI.

The remainder of that night was passed by the unhappy De Haldimar in a state of indescribable wretchedness. After inspecting the relief, he had thrown himself on his rude guard-bed; and, drawing his cloak over his eyes, given full rein to the wanderings of his excited imagination.

Miserable as he felt his position to be, it was not without satisfaction he again heard the voice of his sergeant summoning him to the inspection of another relief. This duty performed, and anxious to avoid the paining presence of his servant, he determined, instead of returning to his guard-room, to consume the hour that remained before day in pacing the ramparts. Leaving word with his subordinate, that, in the event of his being required, he might be found without difficulty, he ascended to that quarter of the works where the Indian had been first seen who had so mysteriously conveyed the sad token he still retained in his breast. It was on the same side with that particular point whence we have already stated a full view of the bridge with its surrounding scenery, together with the waters of the Detroit, where they were intersected by Hog Island, were distinctly commanded. At either of those points was stationed a sentinel, whose duty it was to extend his beat between the boxes used now rather as lines of demarcation than as places of temporary shelter, until each gained that of his next comrade, when they again returned to their own, crossing each other about half way: a system of precaution pursued by the whole of the sentinels in the circuit of the rampart.

The ostensible motive of the officer in ascending the works, was to visit his several posts; but no sooner had he found himself between the points alluded to, which happened to be the first in his course, than he seemed to be riveted there by a species of fascination.

Reminded, for the first time, as he was pursuing his measured but aimless walk, by the fatal portrait which he more than once pressed with feverish energy to his lips, of the singular discovery he had made that night in the apartments of his father, he was naturally led, by a chain of consecutive thought, into a review of the whole of the extraordinary scene. The fact of the existence of a second likeness of his mother was one that did not now fail to re-awaken all the unqualified surprise he had experienced at the first discovery. So far from having ever heard his father make the slightest allusion to this memorial of his departed mother, he perfectly recollected his repeatedly recommending to Clara the safe custody of a treasure, which, if lost, could never be replaced. What could be the motive for this mystery?—and why had he sought to impress him with the belief it was the identical portrait worn by his sister which had so unintentionally been exposed to his view? Why, too, had he evinced so much anxiety to remove from his mind all unfavourable impressions in regard to his mother? Why have been so energetic in his caution not to suffer a taint of impurity to attach to her memory? Why should he have supposed the possibility of such impression, unless there had been sufficient cause for it? In what, moreover, originated his triumphant expression of feature, when, on that occasion, he reminded him that his name was not Reginald? Who, then, was this Reginald? Then came the recollection of what had been repeated to him of the parting scene between Halloway and his wife. In addressing her ill-fated husband, she had named him Reginald. Could it be possible this was the same being alluded to by his father? But no; his youth forbade the supposition, being but two years older than his brother Frederick; yet might he not, in some way or other, be connected with the Reginald of the letter? Why, too, had his father shown such unrelenting severity in the case of this unfortunate victim?—a severity which had induced more than one remark from his officers, that it looked as if he entertained some personal feeling of enmity towards a man who had done so much for his family, and stood so high in the esteem of all who knew him.

Then came another thought. At the moment of his execution, Halloway had deposited a packet in the hands of Captain Blessington;—could these letters—could that portrait be the same? Certain it was, by whatever means obtained, his father could not have had them long in his possession; for it was improbable letters of so old a date should have occupied his attention now, when many years had rolled over the memory of his mother. And then, again, what was the meaning of the language used by the implacable enemy of his father, that uncouth and ferocious warrior of the Fleur de lis, not only on the occasion of the execution of Halloway, but afterwards to his brother, during his short captivity; and subsequently, when, disguised as a black, he penetrated, with the band of Pontiac, into the fort, and aimed his murderous weapon at his father's head. What had made him the enemy of his family? and where and how had originated his father's connection with so extraordinary and so savage a being? Could he, in any way, be implicated with his mother? But no; there was something revolting, monstrous, in the thought: besides, had not his father stood forward the champion of her innocence?—had he not declared, with an energy carrying conviction with every word, that she was untainted by guilt? And would he have done this, had he had reason to believe in the existence of a criminal love for him who evidently was his mortal foe? Impossible.

Such were the questions and solutions that crowded on and distracted the mind of the unhappy De Haldimar, who, after all, could arrive at no satisfactory conclusion. It was evident there was a secret,—yet, whatever its nature, it was one likely to go down with his father to the grave; for, however humiliating the reflection to a haughty parent, compelled to vindicate the honour of a mother to her son, and in direct opposition to evidence that scarcely bore a shadow of misinterpretation, it was clear he had motives for consigning the circumstance to oblivion, which far outweighed any necessity he felt of adducing other proofs of her innocence than those which rested on his own simple yet impressive assertion.

In the midst of these bewildering doubts, De Haldimar heard some one approaching in his rear, whose footsteps he distinguished from the heavy pace of the sentinels. He turned, stopped, and was presently joined by Captain Blessington.

"Why, dearest Charles," almost querulously asked the kind officer, as he passed his arm through that of his subaltern,—“why will you persist in feeding this love of solitude? What possible result can it produce, but an utter prostration of every moral and physical energy? Come, come, summon a little fortitude; all may not yet be so hopeless as you apprehend. For my own part, I feel convinced the day will dawn upon some satisfactory solution of the mystery of that packet.”

"Blessington, my dear Blessington!"—and De Haldimar spoke with mournful energy,—“you have known me from my boyhood, and, I believe, have ever loved me; seek not, therefore, to draw me from the present temper of my mind; deprive me not of an indulgence which, melancholy as it is, now constitutes the sole satisfaction I take in existence.”

"By heaven! Charles, I will not listen to such language. You absolutely put my patience to the rack.”

"Nay, then, I will urge no more," pursued the young officer. "To revert, therefore, to a different subject. Answer me one question with sincerity. What were the contents of the packet you received from poor Halloway previous to his execution? and in whose possession are they now?"

Pleased to find the attention of his young friend diverted from the moment from his sister, Captain Blessington quickly rejoined, he believed the packet contained letters which Halloway had stated to him were of a nature to throw some light on his family connections. He had, however, transferred it, with the seal unbroken, as desired by the unhappy man, to Colonel de Haldimar.

An exclamation of surprise burst involuntarily from the lips of the youth. "Has my father ever made any allusion to that packet since?" he asked?"

"Never," returned Captain Blessington; "and, I confess, his failing to do so has often excited my astonishment. But why do you ask?"

De Haldimar energetically pressed the arm of his captain, while a heavy sigh burst from his oppressed heart. "This very night, Blessington, on entering my father's apartment to apprise him of what was going on here, I saw,—I can scarcely tell you what, but certainly enough to convince me, from what you have now stated, Halloway was, in some degree or other, connected with our family. Tell me," he anxiously pursued, "was there a portrait enclosed with the letters?"

"I cannot state with confidence, Charles," replied his friend; "but if I might judge from the peculiar form and weight of the packet, I should be inclined to say not. Have you seen the letters, then?"

"I have seen certain letters which, I have reason to believe, are the same," returned De Haldimar. "They were addressed to 'Reginald;' and Halloway, I think you have told me, was so called by his unhappy wife."

"There can be little doubt they are the same," said Captain Blessington; "but what were their contents, and by whom written, that you deem they prove a connection between the unhappy soldier and your family?"

De Haldimar felt the blood rise into his cheek, at this natural but unexpected demand. "I am sure, Blessington," he replied, after a pause, "you will not think me capable of unworthy mystery towards yourself; but the contents of these letters are sacred, inasmuch as they relate only to circumstances connected with my father's family."

They soon both prepared to quit the rampart. As they passed the sentinel stationed at that point where the Indian had been first seen, their attention was directed by him to a fire that now suddenly rose, apparently at a great distance, and rapidly increased in volume. The singularity of this occurrence riveted the officers for a moment in silent observation; until Captain Blessington at length ventured a remark, that, judging from the direction, and the deceptive nature of the element at night, he should incline to think it was the hut of the Canadian burning.

"Which is another additional proof, were any such wanting, that every thing is lost," mournfully urged the ever apprehensive De Haldimar. "François has been detected in rendering aid to our friends; and the Indians, in all probability, after having immolated their victim, are sacrificing his property to their rage."

During this exchange of opinions, the officers had again moved to the opposite point of the limited walk of the younger. Scarcely had they reached it, and before Captain Blessington could find time to reply to the fears of his friend, when a loud and distant booming like that of a cannon was heard in the direction of the fire. The alarm was given hastily by the sentinels, and sounds of preparation and arming were audible in the course of a minute or two every where throughout the fort. Startled by the report, which they had half inclined to imagine produced by the discharge of one of their own guns, the half-slumbering officers had quitted the chairs in which they had passed the night in the mess-room, and were soon at the side of their more watchful companions, then anxiously listening for a repetition of the sound.

The day was just beginning to dawn, and as the atmosphere cleared gradually away, it was perceived the fire rose not from the hut of the Canadian, but at a point considerably beyond it. Unusual as it was to see a large fire of this description, its appearance became an object of minor consideration, since it might be attributed to some caprice or desire on the part of the Indians to excite apprehension in their enemies. But how was the report which had reached their ears to be accounted for? It evidently could only have been produced by the discharge of a cannon; and if so, where could the Indians have procured it? No such arm had recently been in their possession; and if it were, they were totally unacquainted with the manner of serving it.

As the day became more developed, the mystery was resolved. Every telescope in the fort had been called into requisition; and as they were now levelled in the direction of the fire, sweeping the line of horizon around, exclamations of surprise escaped the lips of several.

"It is an unusual hour for the Indians' war dance," observed Captain Blessington. "My experience furnishes me with no one instance in which it has not been danced previous to their retiring to rest."

"Unless," said Lieutenant Boyce, "they should have been thus engaged all night; in which case the singularity may be explained."

"Look, look," eagerly remarked Lieutenant Johnstone—"see how they are flying to their canoes, bounding and leaping like so many devils broke loose from their chains. The fire is nearly deserted already."

"The schooner—the schooner!" shouted Captain Erskine. "By heaven, our own gallant schooner! see how beautifully she drives past the island. It was her gun we heard, intended as a signal to prepare us for her appearance."

A thrill of wild and indescribable emotion passed through every heart. Every eye was turned upon the point to which attention was now directed. The graceful vessel, with every stitch of canvas set, was shooting rapidly past the low bushes skirting the sands that still concealed her hull; and in a moment or two she loomed largely and proudly on the bosom of the Detroit, the surface of which was slightly curled with a northwestern breeze.

"Safe, by Jupiter!" exclaimed the delighted Erskine, dropping the glass upon the rampart, and rubbing his hands together with every manifestation of joy.

"The Indians are in chase," said Lieutenant Boyce; "upwards of fifty canoes are following in the schooner's wake. But Danvers will soon give us an account of their Lilliputian fleet."

"Let the troops be held in readiness for a sortie, Mr. Lawson," said the governor, who had joined his officers just as the schooner cleared the island; "we must cover their landing, or, with this host of savages in pursuit, they will never effect it alive."

During the whole of this brief but exciting scene, the heart of Charles de Haldimar beat audibly. A thousand hopes and fears rushed confusedly on his mind, and he was as one bewildered by, and scarcely crediting, what he saw. Could Clara—could his cousin—could his brother—could his friend be on board? He scarcely dared to ask himself these questions; still it was with a fluttering heart, in which hope, however, predominated, that he hastened to execute an order of his captain, that bore immediate reference to his duty as subaltern of the guard.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Meanwhile the schooner dashed rapidly along, her hull occasionally hid from the view of those assembled on the ramparts by some intervening orchard or cluster of houses, but her tall spars glittering in their cover of white canvas, and marking the direction of her course. At length she came to a point in the river that offered no other interruption to the eye than what arose from the presence of almost all the inhabitants of the village, who, urged by curiosity and surprise, were to be seen crowding the intervening bank. Here the schooner was suddenly put about, and the English colours, hitherto concealed by the folds of the canvas, were at length discovered proudly floating in the breeze.

Immediately over the gateway of the fort there was an elevated platform, approached by the rampart of which it formed a part, by some half dozen rude steps on either side; and on this platform was placed a long eighteen pounder, that commanded the whole extent of road leading from the drawbridge to the river. Hither the officers had all repaired, while the schooner was in the act of passing the town; and now that, suddenly brought up in the wind's eye, she rode leisurely in the offing, every movement on her decks was plainly discernible with the telescope.

"Where can Danvers have hid all his crew?" first spoke Captain Erskine; "I count but half a dozen hands altogether on deck, and these are barely sufficient to work her."

"Lying concealed, and ready, no doubt, to give the canoes a warm reception," observed Lieutenant Johnstone; "but where can our friends be? Surely, if there, they would show themselves to us."

There was truth in this remark; and each felt discouraged and disappointed that they did not appear.

"There come the whooping hell fiends," said Major Blackwater. "By heaven! the very water is darkened with the shadows of their canoes."

Scarcely had he spoken, when the vessel was suddenly surrounded by a multitude of savages, whose fierce shouts rent the air, while their dripping paddles, gleaming like silver in the rays of the rising sun, were alternately waved aloft in triumph, and then plunged into the troubled element, which they spurned in fury from their blades.

"What can Danvers be about? Why does he not either open his fire, or crowd sail and away from them?" exclaimed several voices.

"The detachment is in readiness, sir," said Mr. Lawson, ascending the platform, and addressing Major Blackwater.

"The deck, the deck!" shouted Erskine.

Already the eyes of several were bent in the direction alluded to by the last speaker, while those whose attention had been diverted by the approaching canoes glanced rapidly to the same point. To the surprise and consternation of all, the tall and well-remembered form of the warrior of the Fleur de lis was seen towering far above the bulwarks of the schooner; and with an expression in the attitude he had assumed, which no one could mistake for other than that of triumphant defiance. Presently he drew from the bosom of his hunting coat a dark parcel, and springing into the rigging of the mainmast, ascended with incredible activity to the point where the English ensign was faintly floating in the breeze. This he tore furiously away, and rending it into many pieces, cast the fragments into the silver element beneath him, on whose bosom they were seen to float among the canoes of the savages, many of whom possessed themselves, with eagerness, of the gaudy coloured trophies. The dark parcel was now unfolded by the active warrior, who, after having waved it several times round his head, commenced attaching it to the lines whence the English ensign had so recently been torn. It was a large black flag, the purport of which was too readily comprehended by the excited officers.

"Hang the ruffian! can we not manage to make that flag serve as his own winding sheet?" exclaimed Captain Erskine. "Come, Wentworth, give us a second edition of the sortie firing; I know no man who understands pointing a gun better than yourself, and this eighteen pounder might do some mischief."

"The idea was instantly caught at by the officer of artillery, who read his consent in the eye of Colonel de Haldimar. His companions made way on either side; and several gunners, who were already at their stations, having advanced to work the piece at the command of their captain, it was speedily brought to bear upon the schooner.

"This will do, I think," said Wentworth, as, glancing his experienced eye carefully along the gun, he found it pointed immediately on the gigantic frame of the warrior. "If this chain-shot miss him, it will be through no fault of mine."

Every eye was now riveted on the main mast of the schooner, where the warrior was still engaged in attaching the portentous flag. The gunner, who held the match, obeyed the silent signal of his captain; and the massive iron was heard rushing past the officers, bound on its murderous mission. A moment or two of intense anxiety elapsed; and when at length the rolling volumes of smoke gradually floated away, to the dismay and disappointment of all, the fierce warrior was seen standing apparently unharmed on the same spot in the rigging. The shot had, however, been well aimed, for a large rent in the outstretched canvas, close at his side, and about mid-height of his person, marked the direction it had taken. Again he tore away, and triumphantly waved the black flag around his head, while from his capacious lungs there burst yells of defiance and scorn, that could be distinguished for his own even at that distance. This done, he again secured the death symbol to its place; and gliding to the deck by a single rope, appeared to give orders to the few men of the crew who were to be seen; for every stitch of canvas was again made to fill, and the vessel, bounding forward before the breeze then blowing upon her quarter, shot rapidly behind the town, and was finally seen to cast anchor in the navigable channel that divides Hog Island from the shores of Canada.

At the discharge of the eighteen pounder, the river had been suddenly cleared, as if by magic, of every canoe; while, warned by the same danger, the groups of inhabitants, assembled on the bank, had rushed for shelter to their respective homes; so that, when the schooner disappeared, not a vestige of human life was to be seen along that vista so recently peopled with human forms. An order from Colonel de Haldimar to the adjutant, countermanding the sortie, was the first interruption to the silence that had continued to pervade the little band of officers; and two or three of those having hastened to the western front of the rampart, in order to obtain a more distinct view of the movements of the schooner, their example was speedily followed by the remainder, all of whom now quitted the platform, and repaired to the same point.

Here, with the aid of their telescopes, they again distinctly commanded a view of the vessel, which lay motionless close under the sandy beach of the island, and exhibiting all the technicalities of skill in the disposition of sails and yards peculiar to the profession. In vain, however, was every eye strained to discover, among the multitudes of savages that kept momentarily leaping to her deck, the forms of those in whom they were most interested. A group of some half dozen men, apparently common sailors, and those, in all probability, whose services had been compelled in the working of the vessel, were the only evidences that civilised man formed a portion of that grotesque assemblage. These, with their arms evidently bound behind their backs, and placed on one of the gangways, were only visible at intervals, as the band of savages that surrounded them, brandishing their tomahawks around their heads, occasionally left an opening in their circle. The formidable warrior of the Fleur de lis was no longer to be seen, although the flag which he had hoisted still fluttered in the breeze.

"All is lost, then," ejaculated the governor, with a mournfulness of voice and manner that caused many of his officers to turn and regard him with surprise. "That black flag announces the triumph of my foe in the too certain destruction of my children. Now, indeed," he concluded in a lower tone, "for the first time, does the curse of Ellen Halloway sit heavily upon my soul."

A deep sigh burst from one immediately behind him. The governor turned suddenly round, and beheld his son. Never did human countenance wear a character of more poignant misery than that of the unhappy Charles at the moment. Attracted by the report of the cannon, he had flown to the rampart to ascertain the cause, and had reached his companions only to learn the strong hope so recently kindled in his breast was fled for ever. His cheek, over which hung his neglected hair, was now pale as marble, and his lips bloodless and parted; yet, notwithstanding this intensity of personal sorrow, a tear had started to his eye, apparently wrung from him by this unusual expression of dismay in his father.

"Charles—my son—my only now remaining child," murmured the governor, with emotion, as he remarked, and started at the death-like image of the youth; "look not thus, or you will utterly unman me."

A sudden and involuntary impulse caused him to extend his arms. The young officer sprang forward into the proffered embrace, and sank his head upon the cheek of his father. It was the first time he had enjoyed that privilege since his childhood; and even overwhelmed as he was by his affliction, he felt it deeply.

This short but touching scene was witnessed by their companions, without levity in any, and with emotion by several. None felt more gratified at this demonstration of parental affection for the sensitive boy, than Blessington and Erskine.

"I cannot yet persuade myself," observed the former officer, as the colonel again assumed that dignity of demeanour which had been momentarily lost sight of in the ebullition of his feelings—"I cannot yet persuade myself things are altogether so bad as they appear. It is true the schooner is in the possession of the enemy, but there is nothing to prove our friends are on board."

"If you had reason to know him into whose hands she has fallen, as I do, you would think differently, Captain Blessington," returned the governor. "That mysterious being," he pursued, after a short pause, "would never have made this parade of his conquest, had it related merely to a few lives, which to him are of utter insignificance. The very substitution of yon black flag, in his insolent triumph, was the pledge of redemption of a threat breathed in my ear within this very fort: on what occasion I need not state, since the events connected with that unhappy night are still fresh in the recollections of us all. That he is my personal enemy, gentle-ment, it would be in vain to disguise from you; although who he is, or of what nature his enmity, it imports not now to enter upon. Suffice it, I have little doubt my children are in his power; but whether the black flag indicates they are no more, or that the tragedy is only in preparation, I confess I am at a loss to understand."

Deeply affected by the evident despondency that had dictated these unusual admissions on the part of their chief, the officers were forward to combat the inferences he had drawn: several coinciding in the opinion now expressed by Captain Wentworth, that the fact of the schooner having fallen into the hands of the savages by no means implied the capture of the fort whence she came; since it was not at all unlikely she had been chased during a calm by the numerous canoes into the Sinclair, where, owing to the extreme narrowness of the river, she had fallen an easy prey.

"Moreover," observed Captain Blessington, "it is highly improbable the ferocious warrior could have succeeded in capturing any others than the unfortunate crew of the schooner; for had this been the case, he would not have lost the opportunity of crowning his triumph by exhibiting his victims to our view in some conspicuous part of the vessel."

"This, I grant you," rejoined the governor "to be one solitary circumstance in our favour; but may it not, after all, merely prove that our worst apprehensions are already realised?"

"He is not one, methinks, since vengeance seems his aim, to exercise it in so summary, and therefore merciful, a manner. Depend upon it, colonel, had any one of those in whom we are more immediately interested, fallen into his hands, he would not have failed to insult and agonise us by an exhibition of his prisoners."

"You are right, Blessington," exclaimed Charles de Haldimar, in a voice that his choking feelings rendered almost sepulchral; "he is not one to exercise his vengeance in a summary and merciful manner. The deed is yet unaccomplished, for even now the curse of Ellen Halloway rings again in my ear, and tells me the atoning blood must be spilt on the grave of her husband."

The peculiar tone in which these words were uttered, caused every one present to turn and regard the speaker, for they recalled the prophetic language of the unhappy woman. There was now a wildness of expression in his handsome features, marking the mind utterly dead to hope, yet struggling to work itself up to passive endurance of the worst. Colonel de Haldimar sighed painfully, as he bent his eye half reproachfully on the dull and attenuated features of his son; and although he spoke not, his look betrayed the anguish that allusion had called up to his heart.

"Ha! what new movement is that on the part of the savages?" exclaimed Captain Erskine, who had kept his glass to his eye mechanically, and chiefly with a view of hiding the emotion produced in him by the almost infantine despair of the younger De Haldimar: "surely it is—yet, no, it cannot be—yes, see how they are dragging several prisoners from the wood to the beach. I can distinctly see a man in a blanket coat, and two others considerably taller, and apparently sailors. But look, behind them are two females in European dress. Almighty heaven! there can be no doubt."

A painful pause ensued. Every other glass and eye was levelled in the same direction; and, even as Erskine had described it, a party of Indians were seen, by those who had the telescopes, conducting five prisoners towards a canoe that lay in the channel communicating from the island with the main land on the Detroit shore. Into the bottom of these they were presently huddled, so that only their heads and shoulders were visible above the gunwale of the frail bark. Presently a tall warrior was seen bounding from the wood towards the beach. The crowd of gesticulating Indians made way, and the warrior was seen to stoop and apply his shoulder to the canoe, one half of which was high and dry upon the sands. The heavily laden vessel obeyed the impetus with a rapidity that proved the muscular power of him who gave it. Like some wild animal, instinct with life, it lashed the foaming waters from its bows, and left a deep and gurgling furrow where it passed. As it quitted the shore the warrior sprang lightly in, taking his station at the stern; and while his tall and remarkable figure bent nimbly to the movement, he dashed his paddle from right to left alternately in the stream, with a quickness that rendered it almost invisible to the eye. Presently the canoe disappeared round an intervening headland, and the officers lost sight of it altogether.

"The portrait, Charles; what have you done with the portrait?" exclaimed Captain Blessington, actuated by a sudden recollection, and with a trepidation in his voice and manner that spoke volumes of despair to the younger De Haldimar. "This is our only hope of solving the mystery. Quick, give me the portrait, if you have it."

The young officer hurriedly tore the miniature from the breast of his uniform, and pitched it through the interval that separated him from his captain, who stood a few feet off; but with so uncertain and trembling an aim, it missed the hand extended to secure it, and fell upon the very stone the youth had formerly pointed out to Blessington, as marking the particular spot on which he stood during the execution of Halloway. The violence of the fall separated the back of the frame from the picture itself, when suddenly a piece of white and crumpled paper, apparently part of the back of a letter, yet cut to the size and shape of the miniature, was exhibited to the view of all.

"Ha!" resumed the gratified Blessington, as he stooped to possess himself of the prize; "I knew the miniature would be found to contain some intelligence from our friends. It is only this moment it occurred to me to take it to pieces, but accident has anticipated my purpose. May the omen prove a good one! But what have we here?"

With some difficulty, the anxious officer now succeeded in making out the characters, which, in default of pen or pencil, had been formed by the pricking of a fine pin on the paper. The broken sentences, on which the whole of the group now hung with greedy ear, ran nearly as follows:—"All is lost. Michillimackinac is taken. We are prisoners, and doomed to die within eight and forty hours. Alas! Clara and Madeline are of our number. Still there is a hope, if my father deem it prudent to incur the risk. A surprise, well managed, may do much; but it must be to-morrow night; forty-eight hours more, and it will be of no avail. He who will deliver this is our friend, and the enemy of my father's enemy. He will be in the spot at the same hour to-morrow night, and will conduct the detachment to wherever we may chance to be. If you fail in your enterprise, receive our last prayers for a less disastrous fate. God bless you all!"

The blood ran coldly through every vein during the perusal of these important sentences, but not one word of comment was offered by an individual of the group. No explanation was necessary. The captives in the canoe, the tall warrior in its stern, all sufficiently betrayed the horrible truth. Colonel de Haldimar at length turned an enquiring look at his two captains, and then addressing the adjutant, asked—"What companies are off duty to-day, Mr Lawson?"

"Mine," said Blessington, with an energy that denoted how deeply rejoiced he felt at the fact, without giving the adjutant time to reply.

"And mine," impetuously added Captain Erskine; "and (with an oath) I will answer for them; they never embarked on a duty of the sort with greater zeal than they will on this occasion."

"Gentlemen, I thank you," said Colonel de Haldimar, with deep emotion, as he stepped forward and grasped in turn the hands of the generous hearted officers. "To heaven, and to your exertions, do I commit my children."

"Any artillery, colonel?" enquired the officer of that corps.

"No, Wentworth, no artillery. Whatever remains to be done, must be achieved by the bayonet alone, and under favour of the darkness. Gentlemen, again I thank you for this generous interest in my children—this forwardness in an enterprise on which depend the lives of so many dear friends. I am not one given to express warm emotion, but I do, indeed, appreciate this conduct deeply." He then moved away, desiring Mr. Lawson, as he quitted the rampart, to cause the men for this service to be got in instant readiness.

Following the example of their colonel, Captain Blessington and Erskine quitted the rampart also, hastening to satisfy themselves by personal inspection of the efficiency in all respects of their several companies; and in a few minutes, the only individual to be seen in that quarter of the works was the sentinel, who had been a silent and pained witness of all that had passed among his officers.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Sufficient has been shown, from the conversations among his officers, elsewhere transcribed, to account for the governor's conduct in the case of Halloway. That the recommending of his son, Captain de Haldimar, had not been attended to, arose not from any particular ill-will towards the unhappy man, but simply because he had always been in the habit of making his own selections from the ranks, and that the present recommendation had been warmly urged by one who he fancied pretended to a discrimination superior to his own, in pointing out merits that had escaped his observation. It might be, too, that there was a latent pride about the manner of Halloway that displeased and dissatisfied one who looked upon his subordinates as things that were amenable to the haughtiness of his glance,—not enough of deference in his demeanour, or of supplicating obsequiousness in his speech, to entitle him to the promotion prayed for. Whatever the motive, there was nothing of personality to influence him in the rejection of the appeal made in favour of one who had never injured him; but who, on the contrary, as the whole of the regiment could attest, had saved the life of his son.

Rigid disciplinarian as he was, and holding himself responsible for the safety of the garrison, it was but natural, when the discovery had been made of the unaccountable unfastening of the gate of the fort, suspicion of no ordinary kind should attach to the sentinel posted there; and that he should steadily refuse all credence to a story wearing so much appearance of improbability. Proud, and inflexible, and bigoted to first impressions, his mind was closed against those palliating circumstances, which, adduced by Halloway in his defence, had so mainly contributed to stamp the conviction of his moral innocence on the minds of his judges and the attentive auditory; and could he even have conquered his pride so far as to have admitted the belief of that innocence, still the military crime of which he had been guilty, in infringing a positive order of the garrison, was in itself sufficient to call forth all the unrelenting severity of his nature. Throughout the whole of the proceedings subsequently instituted, he had acted and spoken from a perfect conviction of the treason of the unfortunate soldier, and with the fullest impression of the falsehood of all that had been offered in his defence. The considerations that influenced the minds of his officers, found no entrance into his proud breast, which was closed against every thing but his own dignified sense of superior judgment. Could he, like them, have given credence to the tale of Halloway, or really have believed that Captain de Haldimar, educated under his own military eye, could have been so wanting in subordination, as not merely to have infringed a positive order of the garrison, but to have made a private soldier of that garrison accessory to his delinquency, it is more than probable his stern habits of military discipline would have caused him to overlook the offence of the soldier, in deeper indignation at the conduct of the infinitely more culpable officer; but not one word did he credit of a statement, which he assumed to have been got up by the prisoner with the mere view of shielding himself from punishment; and when to these suspicions of his fidelity was attached the fact of the introduction of his alarming visitor, it must be confessed his motives for indulging in this belief were not without foundation.

The impatience manifested during the trial of Halloway was not a result of any desire of systematic persecution, but of a sense of wounded dignity. It was a thing unheard of, and unpardonable in his eyes, for a private soldier to assert, in his presence, his honour and his respectability in extenuation, even while admitting the justice of a specific charge; and when he remarked the court listening with that profound attention, which the peculiar history of the prisoner had excited, he could not repress the manifestation of his anger. In justice to him, however, it must be acknowledged that, in causing the charge, to which the unfortunate man pleaded guilty, to be framed, he had only acted from the conviction that, on the two first, there was not sufficient evidence to condemn one whose crime was as clearly established, to his judgment, as if he had been an eye-witness of the treason. It is true, he availed himself of Halloway's voluntary confession, to effect his condemnation; but estimating him as a traitor, he felt little delicacy was necessary to be observed on that score.

Much of the despotic military character of Colonel de Haldimar had been communicated to his private life; so much, indeed, that his sons,—both of whom, it has been seen, were of natures that belied their origin from so stern a stock,—were kept at nearly as great a distance from him as any other subordinates of his regiment. But although he seldom indulged in manifestations of parental regard towards those whom he looked upon rather as inferiors in military rank, than as beings connected with him by the ties of blood, Colonel de Haldimar was not without that instinctive love for his children, which every animal in the creation feels for its offspring. He, also, valued and took a pride in, because they reflected a certain degree of lustre upon himself, the talents and accomplishments of his eldest son, who, moreover, was a brave, enterprising officer, and, only wanted, in his father's estimation, that severity of carriage and hauteur of deportment, befitting his son, to render him perfect. As for Charles,—the gentle, bland, winning, universally conciliating Charles,—he looked upon him as a mere weak boy, who could never hope to arrive at any post of distinction, if only by reason of the extreme delicacy of his physical organisation; and to have shown any thing like respect for his character, or indulged in any expression of tenderness for one so far below his estimate of what a soldier, a child of his, ought to be, would have been a concession of which his proud nature was incapable. In his daughter Clara, however, the gentleness of sex claimed that warmer affection which was denied to him who resembled her in almost every attribute of mind and person. Colonel de Haldimar doted on his daughter with a tenderness, for which few, who were familiar with his harsh and unbending nature, ever gave him credit. She was the image of one on whom all of love that he had ever known had been centered; and he had continued in Clara an affection, that seemed in itself to form a portion, distinct and apart, of his existence.

We have already seen, as stated by Charles de Haldimar to the unfortunate wife of Halloway, with what little success he had pleaded in the interview he had requested of his father, for the preserver of his gallant brother's life; and we have also seen how equally inefficient was the lowly and supplicating anguish of that wretched being, when, on quitting the apartment of his son, Colonel de Haldimar had so unexpectedly found himself clasped in her despairing embrace. There was little to be expected from an intercession on the part of one claiming so little ascendancy over his father's heart, as the universally esteemed young officer; still less from one who, in her shriek of agony, had exposed the haughty chief to the observation both of men and officers, and under circumstances that caused his position to border on the ludicrous. But however these considerations might have failed in effect, there was another which, as a soldier, he could not wholly overlook. Although he had offered no comment on the extraordinary recommendation to mercy annexed to the sentence of the prisoner, it had a certain weight with him; and he felt, all absolute even as he was, he could not, without exciting strong dissatisfaction among his troops, refuse attention to a document so powerfully worded, and bearing the signature and approval of so old and valued an officer as Captain Blossington. His determination, therefore, had been formed, even before his visit to his son, to act as circumstances might require; and, in the meanwhile, he commanded every preparation for the execution to be made.

In causing a strong detachment to be marched to the conspicuous point chosen for his purpose, he had acted from a conviction of the necessity of showing the enemy the treason of the soldier had been detected; reserving to himself the determination of carrying the sentence into full effect, or pardoning the condemned, as the event might warrant. Not one moment, meanwhile, did he doubt the guilt of Halloway, whose description of the person of his enemy was, in itself, to him, confirmatory evidence of his treason. It is doubtful whether he would, in any way, have been influenced by the recommendation of the court, had the first charges been substantiated; but as there was nothing but conjecture to bear out these, and as the prisoner had been convicted only on the ground of suffering Captain de Haldimar to quit the fort contrary to orders, he felt he might possibly go too far in carrying the capital punishment into effect, in decided opposition to the general feeling of the garrison,—both of officers and men.

When the shot was subsequently fired from the hut of the Canadian, and the daring rifleman recognized as the same fearful individual who had gained access to his apartment the preceding night, conviction of the guilt of Halloway came even deeper home to the mind of the governor. It was through François alone that a communication was kept up secretly between the garrison and several of the Canadians without the fort; and the very fact of the mysterious warrior having been there so recently after his daring enterprise, bore evidence that whatever treason was in operation, had been carried on through the instrumentality of mine host of the Fleur de lis. In proof, moreover, there was the hat of Donellan, and the very rope Halloway had stated to be that by which the unfortunate officer had effected his exit. Colonel de Haldimar was not one given to indulge in the mysterious or to believe in the romantic. Every thing was plain matter of fact, as it now appeared before him; and he thought it evident, as though it had been written in words of fire, that if his son and his unfortunate servant had quitted the fort in the manner represented, it was no less certain they had been forced off by a party, at the head of whom was his vindictive enemy, and with the connivance of Halloway. We have seen, that after the discovery of the sex of the supposed drummer-boy when the prisoners were confronted together, Colonel de Haldimar had closely watched the expression of their countenances, but failed in discovering any thing that could be traced into evidence of a guilty recognition. Still he conceived his original impression to have been too forcibly borne out, even by the events of the last half hour, to allow this to have much weight with him; and his determination to carry the thing through all its fearful preliminary stages became more and more confirmed.

In adopting this resolution in the first instance, he was not without a hope that Halloway, standing, as he must feel himself to be, on the verge of the grave, might be induced to make confession of his guilt, and communicate whatever particulars might prove essential not only to the safety of the garrison generally, but to himself individually, as far as his personal enemy was concerned. With this view, he had charged Captain Blossington, in the course of their march from the hut to the fatal bridge, to promise a full pardon, provided he should make such confession of his crime as would lead to a just appreciation of the evils likely to result from the treason that had in part been accomplished. Even in making this provision, however, which was met by the prisoner with solemn yet dignified reiteration of his innocence, Colonel de Haldimar had not made the refusal of pardon altogether conclusive in his own mind: still, in adopting this plan, there was a chance of obtaining a confession; and not until there was no longer a prospect of the unhappy man being led into that confession, did he feel it imperative on him to stay the progress of the tragedy.

What the result would have been, had not Halloway, in the strong excitement of his feelings, sprung to his feet upon the coffin, uttering the exclamation of triumph, is scarcely doubtful. However much the governor might have contemned and alighted a credulity in which he in no way participated himself, he had too much discrimination not to perceive, that to have persevered in the capital punishment would have been to have rendered himself personally obnoxious to the comrades of the condemned, whose dispirited air and sullen mien, he clearly saw, denounced the punishment as one of unnecessary rigour. The haughty commander was not a man to be intimidated by manifestations of discontent; neither was he one to brook a spirit of insubordination, however forcibly supported; but he had too much experience and military judgment, not to determine that this was not a moment, by foregoing an act of compulsory clemency, to instil divisions in the garrison, when the safety of all so much depended on the cheerfulness and unanimity with which they lent themselves to the arduous duties of defence.

However originating in policy, the lenity he might have been induced to have shown, all idea of the kind was chased from his mind by the unfortunate action of the prisoner. At the moment when the distant heights resounded with the fierce yells of the savages, and leaping forms came bounding down the slope, the remarkable warrior of the Fleur de lis—the fearful enemy who had whispered the most demoniac vengeance in his ears the preceding night,—was the only one that met and riveted the gaze of the governor. He paused not to observe or to think who the flying man could be of whom the mysterious warrior was in pursuit,—neither did it, indeed, occur to him that it was a pursuit at all. But one idea suggested itself to his mind, and that was an attempt at rescue of the condemned on the part of his accomplice; and when at length Halloway, who had at once, as if by instinct, recognised his captain in the fugitive, shouted forth his gratitude to heaven that “he at length approached who alone had the power to save him,” every shadow of mercy was banished from the mind of the governor, who, labouring under a natural misconception of the causes of his exulting shout, felt that justice imperatively demanded her victim, and no longer hesitated in awarding the doom that became the supposed traitor. It was under this impression that he sternly gave and repeated the fatal order to fire; and by this misjudged and severe, although not absolutely cruel act, not only destroyed one of the noblest beings that ever wore a soldier's uniform, but entailed upon himself and family that terrific curse of his maniac wife, which rang like a prophetic warning in the ears of all, and was often heard in the fitful startings of his own ever-after troubled slumbers.

What his feelings were, when subsequently he discovered, in the wretched fugitive, the son whom he already believed to have been numbered with the dead, and heard from his lips a confirmation of all that had been advanced by the unhappy Halloway, we shall leave it to our readers to imagine. Still, even amid his first regret, the rigid disciplinarian was strong within him; and no sooner had the detachment regained the fort, after performing the last offices of interment over their ill-fated comrade, than Captain de Haldimar received an intimation, through the adjutant, to consider himself under close arrest for disobedience of orders. Finally, however, he succeeded in procuring an interview with his father; in the course of which, disclosing the plot of the Indians, and the short period allotted for its being carried into execution, he painted in the most gloomy colours the alarming dangers which threatened them all, and finished by urgently imploring his father to suffer him to make the attempt to reach their unsuspecting friends at Michilimackinac. Fully impressed with the difficulties attendant on a scheme that offered so few feasible chances of success, Colonel de Haldimar for a period denied his concurrence; but when at length the excited young man dwelt on the horrors that would inevitably await his sister and betrothed cousin, were they to fall into the hands of the savages, these considerations were found to be effective. An after-arrangement included Sir Everard Valletort, who had expressed a strong desire to shew his danger in the enterprise; and the services of the Canadian, who had been brought back a prisoner to the fort, and on whom promises and threats were bestowed in an equally lavish manner, were rendered available. In fact, without the assistance of François, there was little chance of their effecting in safety the navigation of the waters through which they were to pass to arrive at the fort. He it was, who, when summoned to attend a conference among the officers, bearing on the means to be adopted, suggested the propriety of their disguising themselves as Canadian duck hunters; in which character they might expect to pass unmolested, even if encountered by any outlying parties of the savages. With the doubts that had previously been entertained of the fidelity of François, there was an air of forlorn hope given to the enterprise; still, as the man expressed sincere earnestness of desire to repay the clemency accorded him, by a faithful exercise of his services, and as the object sought was one that justified the risk, there was, notwithstanding, a latent hope cherished by all parties, that the event would prove successful. We have already seen to what extent their anticipations were realised.

Whether it was that he secretly acknowledged the too excessive sternness of his justice in regard to Halloway (who still, in the true acceptance of facts, had been guilty of a crime that entailed the penalty he had paid,) or that the apprehension that arose to his heart in regard to her on whom he yearned with all a father's fondness governed his conduct, certain it is, that, from the hour of the disclosure made by his son, Colonel de Haldimar became an altered man. Without losing any thing of that dignity of manner, which had hitherto been confounded with the most repellent haughtiness of bearing, his demeanour towards his officers became more courteous; and although, as heretofore, he kept himself entirely aloof, except when occasions of duty brought them together, still, when they did meet, there was more of conciliation in his manner, and less of austerity in his speech. There was, moreover, a dejection in his eye, strongly in contrast with his former imperious glance; and more than one officer remarked, that, if his days were devoted to the customary practical arrangements for defence, his pallid countenance betokened that his nights were nights rather of vigil than repose.

However natural and deep the alarm entertained for the fate of the sister fort, there could be no apprehension on the mind of Colonel de Haldimar in regard to his own; since, furnished with the means of foiling his enemies with their own weapons of cunning and deceit, a few extraordinary precautions alone were necessary to secure all immunity from danger. Whatever might be the stern peculiarities of his character,—and these had originated chiefly in an education purely military,—Colonel de Haldimar was an officer well calculated to the important trust reposed in him; for, combining experience with judgment in all matters relating to the diplomacy of war, and being fully conversant with the character and habits of the enemy opposed to him, he possessed singular aptitude to seize whatever advantages might present themselves.

The prudence and caution of his policy have already been made manifest in the two several council scenes with the chiefs recorded in our previous pages. It may appear singular, that, with the opportunity thus afforded him of retaining the formidable Pontec, —the strength and sinew of that long protracted and ferocious war,—in his power, he should have waived his advantage; but here Colonel de Haldimar gave evidence of the tact which so eminently distinguished his public conduct throughout. He well knew the noble, fearless character of the chief; and felt, if any hold was to be secured over him, it was by grappling with his generosity, and not by the exercise of intimidation. Even admitting that Pontec continued his prisoner, and that the troops, pouring their destructive fire upon the mass of enemies so suddenly arrested on the drawbridge, had swept away the whole, still they were but as a mite among the numerous nations that were leagued against the English; and to these nations, it was evident, they must, sooner or later, succumb.

Colonel de Haldimar knew enough of the proud but generous nature of the Ottawa, to deem that the policy he proposed to pursue in the last council scene would not prove altogether without effect on that warrior. It was well known to him, that much pains had been taken to instil into the minds of the Indians the belief that the English were resolved on their final extirpation; and as certain slights, offered to them at various periods, had given a colouring of truth to this assertion, the formidable league which had already accomplished the downfall of so many of the forts had been the consequence of these artful representations. Although well aware that the French had numerous emissaries distributed among the fierce tribes, it was not until after the disclosure made by the haughty Pontec, at the close of the first council scene, that he became apprised of the alarming influence exercised over the mind of that warrior himself by his own terrible and vindictive enemy. The necessity of counteracting that influence was obvious; and he felt this was only to be done (if at all) by some marked and extraordinary evidence of the peaceful disposition of the English. Hence his determination to suffer the faithless chiefs and their followers to depart unharmed from the fort, even at the moment when the attitude assumed by the prepared garrison fully proved to the assailants their designs had been penetrated and their schemes rendered abortive.

CHAPTER XXIX.

With the general position of the encampment of the investing Indians, the reader has been made acquainted through the narrative of Captain de Haldimar. It was, as has been shown, situate in a sort of oasis close within the verge of the forest, and (girt by an intervening underwood which nature, in her caprice, had fashioned after the manner of a defensive barrier) embraced a space sufficient to contain the tents of the fighting men, together with their women and children. This, however, included only the warriors and inferior chiefs. The tents of the leaders were without the belt of underwood, and principally distributed at long intervals on that side of the forest which skirted the open country towards the river; forming, as it were, a chain of external defences, and sweeping in a semicircular direction round the more dense encampment of their followers. At its highest elevation the forest shot out suddenly into a point, naturally enough rendered an object of attraction from whatever part it was commanded.

Darkness was already beginning to spread her mantle over the intervening space, and the night fires of the Indians were kindling into brightness, glimmering occasionally through the wood with that pale and lambent light peculiar to the fire-fly, of which they offered a not inapt representation, when suddenly a lofty tent, the brilliant whiteness of which was thrown into strong relief by the dark field on which it reposed, was seen to rise at a few paces from the abrupt point in the forest just described, and on the extreme summit of a ridge, beyond which lay only the western horizon in golden perspective.

The opening of this tent looked eastward and towards the fort; and on its extreme summit floated a dark flag, which at intervals spread itself before the slight evening breeze, but oftener hung drooping and heavily over the glittering canvass. One solitary pine, whose trunk exceeded not the ordinary thickness of a man's waist, and standing out as a landmark on the ridge, rose at the distance of a few feet from the spot on which the tent had been erected; and to this was bound the tall and elegant figure of one dressed in the coarse garb of a sailor. The arms and legs of this individual were perfectly free; but a strong rope, rendered doubly secure after the manner of what is termed "whipping" among seamen, after having been tightly drawn several times around his waist, and then firmly knotted behind, was again passed round the tree, to which the back of the prisoner was closely lashed; thus enabling, or rather compelling, him to be a spectator of every object within the tent.

Layers of bark, over which were spread the dressed skins of the bear and the buffalo, formed the floor and carpet of the latter; and on these, in various parts, and in characteristic attitudes, reposed the forms of three human beings; one, the formidable warrior of the Fleur de lis. Attired in the garb in which we first introduced him to our readers, and with the same weapons reposing at his side, the haughty savage lay at his lazy length; his feet reaching beyond the opening of the tent, and his head reposing on a rude pillow formed of a closely compressed pack of skins of wild animals, over which was spread a sort of mantle or blanket. One hand was introduced between the pillow and his head, the other grasped the pipe tomahawk he was smoking; and while the mechanical play of his right foot indicated pre-occupation of thought, his quick and meaning eye glanced frequently and alternately upon the furthest of his companions, the prisoner without, and the distant fort.

Within a few feet of the warrior lay, extended on a buffalo skin, the delicate figure of a female, whose hair, complexion, and hands, denoted her European extraction. Her dress was entirely Indian, however; consisting of a macebocoti with leggings, moccasins, and shirt of printed cotton studded with silver brooches,—all of which were of a quality and texture to mark the wearer as the wife of a chief; and her fair hair, done up in a club behind, reposed on a neck of dazzling whiteness. Her eyes were large, blue, but wild and unmeaning; her countenance vacant; and her movements altogether mechanical. A wooden bowl filled with hominy,—a preparation of Indian corn,—was at her side; and from this she was now in the act of feeding herself with a spoon of the same material, but with a negligence and slovenliness that betrayed her almost utter unconsciousness of the action.

At the further side of the tent there was another woman, even more delicate in appearance than the one last mentioned. She, too, was blue eyed, and of surpassing fairness of skin. Her attitude denoted a mind too powerfully absorbed in grief to be heedful of appearances; for she sat with her knees drawn up to her chin, and rocking her body to and fro with an undulating motion that seemed to have its origin in no effort of volition of her own. Her long fair hair, hung negligently over her shoulders; and a blanket drawn over the top of her head like a veil, and extending partly over the person, disclosed here and there portions of an apparel which was strictly European, although rent, and exhibiting in various places stains of blood. A bowl similar to that of her companion, and filled with the same food, was at her side; but this was untasted.

"Why does the girl refuse to eat?" asked the warrior of her next him, as he fiercely rolled a volume of smoke from his lips. "Make her eat, for I would speak to her afterwards."

"Why does the girl refuse to eat?" responded the woman in the same tone, dropping her spoon as she spoke, and turning to the object of remark with a vacant look. "It is good," she pursued, as she rudely shook the arm of the heedless sufferer. "Come, girl, eat."

A shriek burst from the lips of the unhappy girl, as, apparently roused from her abstraction, she suffered the blanket to fall from her head, and staring wildly at her questioner, faintly demanded,—"Who, in the name of mercy, are you, who address me in this horrid place in my own tongue? Speak; who are you? Surely I should know that voice for that of Ellen, the wife of Frank Holloway!"

A maniac laugh was uttered by the wretched woman. This continued offensively for a moment; and she observed, in an infuriated tone and with a searching eye,—"No, I am not the wife of Holloway. It is false. I am the wife of Wacousta. This is my husband!" and as she spoke she sprang nimbly to her feet, and was in the next instant lying prostrate on the form of the warrior; her arms thrown wildly around him, and her lips imprinting kisses on his cheek.

But Wacousta was in no mood to suffer her endearments. He for the first time seemed alive to the presence of her who lay beyond, and to whose whole appearance a character of animation had been imparted by the temporary excitement of her feelings. He gazed at her a moment, with the air of one endeavouring to recall the memory of days long gone by; and as he continued to do so, his eye dilated, his chest heaved, and his countenance alternately flushed and paled. At length he threw the form that reposed upon his own, violently, and even savagely, from him; sprang eagerly to his feet; and clearing the space that divided him from the object of his attention at a single step, bore her from the earth in his arms with as much ease as if she had been an infant, and then returning to his own rude couch, placed his horror-stricken victim at his side.

"Nay, nay," he urged sarcastically, as she vainly struggled to free herself; "let the De Haldimar portion of your blood rise up in anger if it will; but that of Clara Beverley, at least——"

"Gracious Providence! where am I, that I hear the name of my sainted mother thus familiarly pronounced?" interrupted the startled girl; "and who are you,"—turning her eyes wildly on the starchy countenance of the warrior,—"who are you, I ask, who, with the mien and in the garb of a savage of these forests, appear thus acquainted with her name?"

The warrior passed his hand across his brow for a moment, as if some painful and intolerable reflection had been called up by the question; but he speedily recovered his self-possession, and, with an expression of feature that almost petrified his auditor, vehemently observed,—

"You ask who I am! One who knew your mother long before the accursed name of De Haldimar had ever been whispered in her ear; and whom love for the one and hatred for the other has rendered the savage you now behold! But," he continued, while a fierce and hideous smile lighted up every feature, "I overlook my past sufferings in my present happiness. The image of Clara Beverley, even such as my soul loved her in its youth, is once more before me in her child; that child shall be my wife!"

"Your wife! monster;—never!" shrieked the unhappy girl, again vainly attempting to disengage herself from the encircling arm of the savage. "But," she pursued, in a tone of supplication, while the tears coursed each other down her cheek, "if you ever loved my mother, as you say you have, restore her children to their home; and, if saints may be permitted to look down from heaven in approval of the acts of men, she whom you have loved will bless you for the deed."

A deep groan burst from the vast chest of Wacousta; but, for a moment, he answered not. At length he observed, pointing at the same time with his finger towards the cloudless vault above their heads,—"Do you behold yon blue sky, Clara de Haldimar?"

"I do;—what mean you?" demanded the trembling girl, in whom a momentary hope had been excited by the subdued manner of the savage.

"Nothing," he coolly rejoined; "only that were your mother to appear there at this moment, clad in all the attributes ascribed to angels, her prayer would not alter the destiny that awaits you. Nay, nay; look not thus sorrowfully," he pursued, as, in despite of her efforts to prevent him, he imprinted a burning kiss upon her lips. "Even thus was I once wont to linger on the lips of your mother; but hers ever pouted to be pressed by mine; and not with tears, but with sunniest smiles did she court them." He paused; bent his head over the face of the shuddering girl; and gazing fixedly for a few minutes on her countenance, while he pressed her struggling form more closely to his own, exultingly pursued, as if to himself,—"Even as her mother was, so is she. Ye powers of hell! who would have ever thought a time would come when both my vengeance and my love would be gratified to the utmost? How strange it never should have occurred to me he had a daughter!"

"What mean you, fierce, unpitied man?" exclaimed the terrified Clara, to whom a full sense of the horror of her position had lent unusual energy of character. "Surely you will not detain a poor defenceless woman in your hands,—the child of her you say you have loved. But it is false!—you never knew her, or you would not now reject my prayer."

"Never knew her!" fiercely repeated Wacousta. Again he paused. "Would I had never known her! and I should not now be the outcast wretch I am,"—he added, slowly and impressively. Then once more elevating his voice,—"Clara de Haldimar, I have loved your mother as man never loved woman; and I have hated your father" (grinding his teeth with fury as he spoke) "as man never hated man. That love, that hatred are unquenched—unquenchable. Before me I see at once the image of her who, even in death, has lived enshrined in my heart, and the child of him who is my bitterest foe. Clara de Haldimar, do you understand me now?"

"Almighty Providence! is there no one to save me?—can nothing touch your stubborn heart?" exclaimed the affrighted girl; and she turned her swimming eyes on those of the warrior, in appeal; but his glance caused her own to sink in confusion. "Ellen Halloway," she pursued, after a moment's pause, and in the wild accents of despair, "if you are indeed the wife of this man, as you say you are, oh! plead for me with him; and in the name of that kindness, which I once extended to yourself, prevail on him to restore me to my father!"

"Ellen Halloway!—who calls Ellen Halloway?" said the wretched woman, who had again resumed her slowly meal on the rude couch, apparently without consciousness of the scene enacting at her side. "I am not Ellen Halloway: they said so; but it is not true. My husband was Reginald Morton: but he went for a soldier, and was killed; and I never saw him more."

"Reginald Morton! What mean you, woman?—What know you of Reginald Morton?" demanded Wacosta, with frightful energy, as, leaning over the shrinking form of Clara, he violently grasped and shook the shoulder of the unhappy maniac.

"Stop; do not hurt me, and I will tell you all, sir," she almost screamed. "Oh, sir, Reginald Morton was my husband once; but he was kinder than you are. He did not look so fiercely at me; nor did he pinch me so."

"What of him?—who was he?" furiously repeated Wacosta, as he again impatiently shook the arm of the wretched Ellen. "Where did you know him?—Whence came he?"

"Nay, you must not be jealous of poor Reginald!" and, as she uttered these words in a softening and conciliating tone, her eye was turned upon those of the warrior with a mingled expression of fear and cunning. "But he was very good and very handsome, and generous; and we lived near each other, and we loved each other at first sight. But his family were very proud, and they quarreled with him because he married me; and then we became very poor, and Reginald went for a soldier, and—; but I forget the rest, it is so long ago." She pressed her hand to her brow, and sank her head upon her chest.

"Ellen, woman, again I ask you where he came from? this Reginald Morton that you have named. To what country did he belong?"

"Oh, we were both Cornish," she answered, with a vivacity singularly in contrast with her recent low and monotonous tone; "but, as I said before, he was of a great family, and I only a poor clergyman's daughter."

"Cornish!—Cornish, did you say?" fiercely repeated the dark Wacosta, while an expression of loathing and disgust seemed for a moment to convulse his features; "then is it as I had feared. One word more. Was the family seat called Morton Castle?"

"It was," unhesitatingly returned the poor woman, yet with the air of one wondering to hear a name repeated, long forgotten even by herself. "It was a beautiful castle too, on a lovely ridge of hills; and it commanded such a nice view of the sea, close to the little port of—; and the parsonage stood in such a sweet valley, close under the castle; and we were all so happy." She paused, again put her hand to her brow, and pressed it with force, as if endeavouring to pursue the chain of connection in her memory, but evidently without success.

"And your father's name was Clayton?" said the warrior, enquiringly. "Henry Clayton, if I recollect aright?"

"Eh! who names my father?" shrieked the wretched woman. "Yes, sir, it was Clayton—Henry Clayton—the kindest, the noblest of human beings. But the affliction of his child, and the persecutions of the Morton family, broke his heart. He is dead, sir, and Reginald is dead too; and I am a poor lone widow in the world, and have no one to love me." Here the tears coursed each other rapidly down her faded cheek, although her eyes were staring and motionless.

"It is false!" vociferated the warrior, who, now he had gained all that was essential to the elucidation of his doubts, quitted the shoulder he had continued to press with violence in his nervous hand, and once more extended himself at his length; "in me you behold the uncle of your husband. Yes, Ellen Clayton, you have been the wife of two Reginald Mortons. Both," he pursued with unutterable bitterness, while he again started up and shook his tomahawk menacingly in the direction of the fort,—"both have been the victims of you cold-blooded governor; but the hour of our reckoning is at hand. Ellen," he fiercely added, "do you recollect the curse you pronounced on the family of that haughty man, when he slaughtered your Reginald? By Heaven! it shall be fulfilled; but first shall the love I have so long borne the mother be transferred to the child."

Again he sought to encircle the waist of her whom, in the strong excitement of his rage, he had momentarily quitted; but the unutterable disgust and horror produced in the mind of the unhappy Clara lent an almost supernatural activity to her despair. She dexterously eluded his grasp, gained her feet, and with tottering steps and outstretched arms darted through the opening of the tent, and piteously exclaiming, "Save me! oh, for God's sake, save me!" sank exhausted, and apparently lifeless, on the chest of the prisoner without.

To such of our readers as, deceived by the romantic nature of the attachment stated to have been originally entertained by Sir Everard Valletort for the unseen sister of his friend, have been led to expect a tale abounding in manifestations of its progress when the parties had actually met, we at once announce disappointment. Neither the lover of amorous adventure, nor the admirer of witty dialogue, should dive into these passages. Room for the exercise of the invention might, it is true, be found; but ours is a tale of sad reality, and our heroes and heroines figure under circumstances that would render wit a satire upon the understanding, and love a reflection upon the heart. Within the bounds of probability have we, therefore, confined ourselves.

What the feelings of the young baronet must have been, from the first moment when he received from the hands of the unfortunate Captain Baynton (who, although an officer of his own corps, was personally a stranger to him,) that cherished sister of his friend, on whose ideal form his excited imagination had so often latterly loved to linger, up to the present hour, we should vainly attempt to paint. There are emotions of the heart, it would be mockery in the pen to trace. From the instant of his first contributing to preserve her life, on that dreadful day of blood, to that when the schooner fell into the hands of the savages, few words had passed between them, and these had reference more to the position in which they found themselves, and whenever Sir Everard felt he could, without indelicacy or intrusion, render himself in the slightest way serviceable to her. The very circumstances under which they had met, conducing to the suppression, if not utter extinction, of all passion attached to the sentiment with which he had been inspired. A new feeling had quickened in his breast; and it was with emotions more assimilated to friendship than to love that he now regarded the beautiful but sorrow stricken sister of his bosom friend. Still there was a softness, a purity, a delicacy and tenderness in this new feeling, in which the influence of sex secretly though unacknowledgedly predominated; and even while sensible it would have been a profanation of every thing most sacred and delicate in nature to have admitted a thought of love within his breast at such a moment, he also felt he could have entertained a voluptuous joy in making any sacrifice, even to the surrender of life itself, provided the tranquillity of that gentle and suffering being could be by it ensured.

Clara, in her turn, had been in no condition to admit so exclusive a power as that of love within her soul. She had, it is true, even amid the desolation of her shattered spirit, recognised in the young officer the original of a portrait so frequently drawn by her brother, and dwelt on by herself. She acknowledged, moreover, the fidelity of the painting; but however she might have felt and acted under different circumstances, absorbed as was her heart, and paralysed her imagination, by the harrowing scenes she had gone through, she, too, had room but for one sentiment in her fainting soul, and that was friendship for the friend of her brother; on whom, moreover, she bestowed that woman's gratitude, which could not fail to be awakened by a recollection of the risks he had encountered, conjointly with Frederick, to save her from destruction. During their passage across lake Huron, Sir Everard had usually taken his seat on the deck, at that respectful distance which he conceived the delicacy of the position of the unfortunate cousins demanded; but in such a manner that, while he seemed wholly abstracted from them, his eye had more than once been detected by Clara fixed on hers, with an affectionateness of interest she could not avoid repaying with a glance of recognition and approval.

These, however, were the only indications of regard that had passed between them.

If, however, a momentary and irrepressible flashing of that sentiment, which had, at an earlier period, formed a portion of their imaginings, did occasionally steal over their hearts while there was a prospect of reaching their friends in safety, all manifestation of its power was again finally suppressed when the schooner fell into the hands of the savages. Become the immediate prisoners of Wacosta, they had been surrendered to that ferocious chief to be dealt with as he might think proper; and, on disembarking from the canoe in which their transit to the mainland had been despatched that morning from the fort, had been separated from their equally unfortunate and suffering companions. Captain de Haldimar, Madeline, and the Canadian, were delivered over to the custody of several choice warriors of the tribe in which Wacosta was adopted; and, bound hand and foot, were, at that moment, in the war tent of the fierce savage, which, as Pontecac had once boasted to the governor, was every where hung around with human scalps, both of men, of women, and of children. The object of this mysterious man, in removing Clara to the spot we have described, was one well worthy of his ferocious nature. His vengeance had already devoted her to destruction; and it was within view of the fort, which contained the father whom he loathed, he had resolved his purpose should be accomplished. A refinement of cruelty, such as could scarcely have been supposed to enter the breast even of such a remorseless savage as himself, had caused him to convey to the same spot, him whom he rather suspected than knew to be the lover of the young girl. It was with the view of harrowing up the soul of one whom he had recognised as the officer who had disabled him on the night of the rencontre on the bridge, that he had bound Sir Everard to the tree, whence, as we have already stated, he was a compelled spectator of every thing that passed within the tent; and yet with that free action of limb which only tended to tantalize him the more amid his unavoidable efforts to rid himself of his bonds,—a fact that proved not only the dire extent to which the revenge of Wacosta could be carried, but the actual and gratuitous cruelty of his nature.

One must have been similarly circumstanced, to understand all the agony of the young man during this odious scene, and particularly at the fierce and repeated declaration of the savage that Clara should be his bride. More than once had he essayed to remove the ligatures which confined his waist; but his unsuccessful attempts only drew an occasional smile of derision from his enemy, as he glanced his eye rapidly towards him. Conscious at length of the inutility of efforts, which, without benefiting her for whom they were principally prompted, rendered him in some degree ridiculous even in his own eyes, the wretched Valletort desisted altogether, and with his head sunk upon his chest, and his eyes closed, sought at least to shut out a scene which blasted his sight, and harrowed up his very soul.

But when Clara, uttering her wild cry for protection, and rushing forth from the tent, sank almost unconsciously in his embrace, a thrill of inexplicable joy ran through each awakened fibre of his frame. Bending eagerly forward, he had extended his arms to receive her; and when he felt her light and graceful form pressing upon his own as its last refuge—when he felt her heart beating against his—when he saw her head drooping on his shoulder, in the wild recklessness of despair,—even amid that scene of desolation and grief he could not help enfolding her in tumultuous ecstasy to his breast. Every horrible danger was for an instant forgotten in the soothing consciousness that he at length encircled the form of her, whom in many an hour of solitude he had thus pictured, although under far different circumstances, reposing confidently on him. There was delight mingled with agony in his sensation of the wild throb of her bosom against his own; and even while his soul fainted within him, as he reflected on the fate that awaited her, he felt as if he could himself now die more happily.

Momentary, however, was the duration of this scene. Furious with anger at the evident disgust of his victim, Wacosta no sooner saw her sink into the arms of her lover, than with that agility for which he was remarkable he was again on his feet, and stood in the next instant at her side. Uniting to the generous strength of his manhood all that was wrung from his mingled love and despair, the officer clasped his hand round the waist of the drooping Clara; and with clenched teeth, and feet firmly set, seemed resolved to defy every effort of the warrior to remove her. Not a word was uttered on either side; but in the fierce smile that curled the lip of the savage, there spoke a language even more terrible than the words that smile implied. Sir Everard could not suppress an involuntary shudder; and when at length Wacosta, after a short but violent struggle, succeeded in again securing and bearing off his prize, the wretchedness of soul of the former was indescribable.

"You see 'tis vain to struggle against your destiny, Clara de Haldimar," sneered the warrior. "Ours is but a rude nuptial couch, it is true; but the wife of an Indian chief must not expect the luxuries of Europe in the heart of an American wilderness."

"Almighty Heaven! where am I?" exclaimed the wretched girl, again unclosing her eyes to all the horror of her position; for again she lay at the side, and within the encircling arm, of her enemy. "Oh, Sir Everard Valletort, I thought I was with you, and that you had saved me from this monster. Where is my brother?—Where are Frederick and Madoline?—Why have they deserted me?—Ah! my heart will break. I cannot endure this longer, and live."

"Clara, Miss de Haldimar," groaned Sir Everard, in a voice of searching agony; "could I lay down my life for you, I would; but you see these bonds. Oh God! oh God! have pity on the innocent; and for once incline the heart of yon fierce monster to the whisperings of mercy." As he uttered the last sentence, he attempted to sink on his knees in supplication to Him he addressed, but the tension of the cord prevented him; yet were his hands clasped, and his eyes upraised to heaven, while his countenance beamed with an expression of fervent enthusiasm.

"Peace, babbler! or, by Heaven! that prayer shall be your last," vociferated Wacosta. "But no," he pursued to himself, dropping at the same time the point of his upraised tomahawk; "these are but the natural writhings of the crushed worm; and the longer protracted they are, the more complete will be my vengeance." Then turning to the terrified girl,—"You ask, Clara de Haldimar, where you are? In the tent of your mother's lover, I reply,—at the side of him who once pressed her to his heart, even as I now press you, and with a fondness that was only equalled by her own. Come, dear Clara," and his voice assumed a tone of tenderness that was even more revolting than his natural ferocity, "let me woo you to the affection she once possessed. It was a heart of fire in which her image stood enshrined,—it is a heart of fire still, and well worthy of her child."

"Never, never!" shrieked the agonised girl. "Kill me, murder me, if you will; but oh! if you have pity, pollute not my ear with the avowal of your detested love. But again I repeat, it is false that my mother ever knew you. She never could have loved so fierce, so vindictive a being as yourself."

"Ha! do you doubt me still?" sternly demanded the savage. Then drawing the shuddering girl still closer to his vast chest,—"Come hither, Clara, while to convince you I unfold the sad history of my life, and tell you more of your parents than you have ever known. When," he pursued solemnly, "you have learnt the extent of my love for the one, and of my hatred for the other, and the wrongs I have endured from both, you will no longer wonder at the spirit of mingled love and vengeance that dictates my conduct towards yourself. Listen, girl," he continued fiercely, "and judge whether mine are injuries to be tamely pardoned, when a whole life has been devoted to the pursuit of the means of avenging them."

Irresistibly led by a desire to know what possible connection could have existed between her parents and this singular and ferocious man, the wretched girl gave her passive assent. She even hoped that, in the course of his narrative, some softening recollections would pass over his mind, the effect of which might be to predispose him to mercy. Wacosta buried his face for a few moments in his large hand, as if endeavouring to collect and concentrate the remembrances of past years. His countenance, meanwhile, had undergone a change; for there was now a shade of melancholy mixed with the fierceness of expression usually observable there. This, however, was dispelled in the course of his narrative, and as various opposite passions were in turn powerfully and severally developed.

CHAPTER XXX.

"It is now four and twenty years," commenced Wacosta, "since your father and myself first met as subalterns in the regiment he now commands, when an intimacy suddenly sprang up between us, which, as it was then to our brother officers, has since been a source of utter astonishment to myself. He, all coldness, prudence, obsequiousness, and forethought, all enthusiasm, carelessness, impetuosity, and independence. Whether this intimacy sprang from the adventitious circumstance of our being more frequently thrown together as officers of the same company,—for we were both attached to the grenadiers,—or that my wild spirit was soothed by the bland amenity of his manners, I know not. The latter, however, is not improbable; for proud, and haughty, and dignified, as the colonel now is, such was not then the character of the ensign; who seemed thrown out of one of nature's supplest moulds, to fawn, and cringe, and worm his way to favour by the wily speciousness of his manners. Oh God!" pursued Wacosta, after a momentary pause, and striking his palm against his forehead, "that I ever should have been the dupe of such a cold-blooded hypocrite!"

"As you have just learnt, Cornwall is the country of my birth. I was the eldest of the only two surviving children of a large family; and, as heir to the baronetcy of the proud Mortons, was looked up to by lord and vassal as the future perpetrator of the family name. My brother had been designed for the army; but as this was a profession to which I had attached my inclinations, the point was waived in my favour, and at the age of eighteen I first joined the ——— regiment, then quartered in the Highlands of Scotland. During my boyhood I had ever accustomed myself to athletic exercises, and loved to excite myself by encountering danger in its most terrific forms.

"The wild daring by which my boyhood had been marked was powerfully awakened by the bold and romantic scenery of the Scottish Highlands; and as the regiment was at that time quartered in a part of those mountainous districts, where, from the disturbed nature of the times, society was difficult of attainment, many of the officers were driven from necessity, as I was from choice, to indulge in the sports of the chase. On one occasion a party of four of us set out early in the morning in pursuit of deer, numbers of which we knew were to be met with in the mountainous tracts of Bute and Argyllshire. The course we happened to take lay through a succession of dark deep glens, and over frowning rocks; the difficulties of access to which only stirred up my dormant spirit of enterprise the more. We had continued in this course for many hours, overcoming one difficulty only to be encountered by another, and yet without meeting a single deer; when, at length, the faint blast of a horn was heard far above our heads in the distance, and presently a noble stag was seen to ascend a ledge of rocks immediately in front of us. To raise my gun to my shoulder and fire was the work of a moment, after which we all followed in pursuit. On reaching the spot where the deer had first been seen, we observed traces of blood, satisfying us he had been wounded; but the course taken in his flight was one that seemed to defy every human effort to follow it. It was a narrow pointed ledge, ascending boldly towards a huge cliff that projected frowningly from the extreme summit, and on either side lay a dark, deep, and apparently fathomless ravine; to look even on which was sufficient to appal the stoutest heart, and unnerve the steadiest brain. For me, however, long accustomed to dangers of the sort, it had no terror. I had proceeded about five hundred yards further, when I came to the termination of the ledge, from the equally narrow transverse extremity of which branched out three others; the whole contributing to form a figure resembling that of a trident. Along the ledge I had quitted I had remarked occasional traces where the stricken deer had passed; and the same blood-spots now directed me at a point where, but for these, I must have been utterly at fault. The centre of these new ridges, and the narrowest, was that taken by the animal, and on that I once more renewed my pursuit. I continued my course towards the main body of rock that now rose within a hundred yards. How this was to be gained I knew not; for it shewed out abruptly from the extreme summit, overhanging the abyss, and presenting an appearance which I cannot more properly render than by comparing it to the sounding-boards placed over the pulpits of our English churches. Still I was resolved to persevere to the close, and I but too unhappily succeeded.

"It was evident to me that there must be some opening through which the deer had effected his escape to the precipitous height above; and I felt a wild and fearful triumph in following him to his cover, over passes which it was my pleasure to think none of the hardy mountaineers themselves would have dared to venture upon with impunity. I paused not to consider of the difficulty of bearing away my prize, even if I succeeded in overtaking it. At every step my excitement and determination became stronger, and I felt every fibre of my frame to dilate, as when, in my more boyish days, I used to brave, in my gallant skiff, the mingled fury of the warring elements of sea and storm. Suddenly, while my mind was intent only on the dangers I used then to hold in such light estimation, I found my further progress intercepted by a fissure in the crag. It was not the width of this opening that disconcerted me, for it exceeded not ten feet; but I came upon it so unadvisedly, that, in attempting to check my forward motion, I had nearly lost my equipoise, and fallen into the abyss that now yawned before on either side of me. To pause upon the danger, would, I felt, be to ensure it. Summoning all my dexterity into a single bound, I cleared the chasm; and with one buskined foot (for my hunting costume was strictly Highland) clung firmly to the ledge, while I secured my balance with the other. At this point the rock became gradually broader, so that I now trod the remainder of the rude path in perfect security, until I at length found myself close to the vast mass of which these ledges were merely ramifications or veins: but still I could discover no outlet by which the wounded deer could have escaped. While I lingered, thoughtfully, for a moment, half in disappointment, half in anger, and with my back leaning against the rock, I fancied I heard a rustling, as of the leaves and branches of underwood, on that part which projected like a canopy, far above the abyss. I bent my eyes eagerly and fixedly on the spot whence the sound proceeded, and presently could distinguish the blue sky appearing through an aperture, to which was, the instant afterwards, applied what I conceived to be a human face. No sooner, however, was it seen than withdrawn; and then the rustling of leaves was heard again, and all was still as before.

"A new direction was now given to my feelings. I felt a presentiment that my adventure, if prosecuted, would terminate in some extraordinary and characteristic manner; and obeying, as I ever did, the first impulse of my heart, I prepared to grapple once more with the difficulties that yet remained to be surmounted. Securing my gun between some twisted roots that grew out of and adhered to the main body of the rock, I commenced the difficult ascent; and, after considerable effort, found myself at length immediately under the aperture. My progress along the lower superficies of this projection was like that of a crawling reptile. My back hung suspended over the chasm, into which one false movement of hand or foot, one yielding of the roots entwined in the rock, must inevitably have precipitated me; and, while my toes wormed themselves into the tortuous fibres of the latter, I passed hand over hand beyond my head, until I had arrived within a foot or two of the point I desired to reach. Here, however, a new difficulty occurred. A slight projection of the rock, close to the aperture, impeded my further progress in the manner hitherto pursued; and, to pass this, I was compelled to drop my whole weight, suspended by one vigorous arm, while, with the other, I separated the bushes that concealed the opening. A violent action of every muscle now impelled me upward, and at length I had so far succeeded as to introduce my head and shoulders through the aperture; after which my final success was no longer doubtful."

One of those painful pauses with which his narrative was often broken, here occurred; and, with an energy that terrified her whom he addressed, Wacosta pursued,—"Clara de Haldimar, it was here—in this garden—this paradise—this oasis of the rocks in which I now found myself, that I first saw and loved your mother. Ha! you start: you believe me now. Loved her!" he continued, after another short pause,—"oh, what a feeble word is love to express the concentration of mighty feelings that flowed like burning lava through my veins. Who shall pretend to give a name to the emotion that ran thrillingly—madly through my excited frame, when first I gazed on her, who, in every attribute of womanly beauty, realised all my fondest fancy ever painted? Listen to me, Clara," he pursued, in a fiercer tone, and with a convulsive pressure of the form he still embraced,—"If, in my younger days, my mind was alive to enterprise, and loved to contemplate danger in its most appalling forms, this was far from being the master passion of my soul; nay, it was the strong necessity of pouring into some devoted bosom the overflowing fullness of my heart, that made me court in solitude the positions of danger with which the image of woman was ever associated.

"I have already said that, on gaining the summit of the rock, I found myself in a sort of oasis of the mountains. It was so. Belted on every hand by bold and precipitous crags, that seemed to defy the approach even of the wildest animals, and putting utterly at fault the penetration and curiosity of man, was spread a carpet of verdure, a luxuriance of vegetation, that might have put to shame the fertility of the soft breeze-nourished valleys of Italy and Southern France.

"At about twenty yards from the aperture, and on a bank, formed of turf, covered with moss, and interspersed with roses and honey-suckles, sat the divinity of the oasis. She, too, was clad in the Highland dress, which gave an air of wildness and elegance to her figure that was in classic harmony with the surrounding scenery. At the moment of my appearance she was in the act of dressing the wounded shoulder of a stag that had recently been shot; and from the broad tartan riband I perceived attached to its neck, added to the fact of the tameness of the animal, I presumed that this stag, evidently a favourite of its mistress, was the same I had fired at and wounded. The rustling I made among the bushes had attracted her attention; she raised her eyes from the deer, and, beholding me, started to her feet, uttering a cry of terror and surprise. Fearing to speak, as if the sound of my own voice were sufficient to dispel the illusion that fascinated both eye and heart into delicious tension on her form, I stood for some moments as motionless as the rock out of which I appeared to grow, gazing upon her I was destined to love for ever.

"It was this utter immobility on my own part, that ensured me a continuance of the exquisite happiness I then enjoyed. The first movement of the startled girl had been to fly towards her dwelling, which stood at a short distance, half imbedded in the same clustering roses and honey-suckles that adorned her bank of moss; but when she remarked my utter stillness, and apparent absence of purpose, she checked the impulse that would have directed her departure, and stopped, half in curiosity, half in fear, to examine me once more. At that moment all my energies appeared to be restored; I threw myself into an attitude expressive of deep contrition for the intrusion of which I had been unconsciously guilty, and dropping on one knee, and raising my clasped hands, inclined them towards her in token of mingled deprecation of her anger, and respectful homage to herself. At first she hesitated,—then gradually and timidly retraced her way to the seat she had so abruptly quitted in her alarm. Emboldened by this movement, I made a step or two in advance, but no sooner had I done so than she again took to flight. Once more, however, she turned to behold me, and again I had dropped on my knee, and was conjuring her, with the same signs, to remain and bless me with her presence. Again she returned to her seat, and again I advanced. Scarcely less timid, however, than the deer, which followed her every movement, she fled a third time,—a third time looked back, and was again induced, by my supplicating manner, to return. Frequently was this repeated, before I finally found myself at the foot, and pressing the hand—(oh God! what torture in the recollection!)—yes, pressing the hand of her for whose smile I would, even at that moment, have sacrificed my soul. Such was your mother, Clara de Haldimar; yes, even such as I have described her was Clara Beverly."

Again Wacosta paused, and his pause was longer than usual, as, with his large hand again covering his face, he seemed endeavouring to master the feelings which these recollections had called up. Clara scarcely breathed. Unmindful of her own desolate position, her soul was intent only on a history that related so immediately to her beloved mother, of whom all that she had hitherto known was, that she was a native of Scotland, and that her father had married her while quartered in that country. The deep emotion of the terrible being before her, so often manifested in the course of what he had already given of his recital, added to her knowledge of the facts just named, scarcely left a doubt of the truth of his statement on her mind. Her ear was now bent achingly towards him, in expectation of a continuance of his history, but he still remained in the same attitude of absorption. An irresistible impulse caused her to extend her hand, and remove his own from his eyes: they were filled with tears; and even while her mind rapidly embraced the hope that this manifestation of tenderness was but the dawning mercy towards the children of her he had once loved, her kind nature could not avoid sympathizing with him, whose uncouthness of appearance and savageness of nature were, in some measure, lost sight of in the fact of the powerful love he yet apparently acknowledged.

But no sooner did Wacosta feel the soft pressure of her hand, and meet her eyes, turned on his with an expression of interest, than the most rapid transition was effected in his feelings. He drew the form of the weakly resisting girl closer to his heart; again imprinted a kiss upon her lips; and then, while every muscle in his iron frame seemed quivering with emotion, exclaimed,—"By heaven! that touch, that glance, were Clara Beverly's. Yes, Clara," he proceeded more deliberately, as he scanned her form with an eye that made her shudder, "such as your mother was, so are you; the same delicacy of proportion; the same graceful curvature of limb, only less rounded, less womanly. But you must be younger by about two years than she then was."

There was a cool licence of speech—a startling freedom of manner—in the latter part of this address, that disappointed not less than it pained and offended the unhappy Clara. She shuddered; and sighing bitterly, suffered her tears to force themselves through her closed lids upon her pallid cheek. This change in her appearance seemed to act as a check on the temporary excitement of Wacosta. Again obeying one of those rapid transitions of feeling, for which he was remarkable, he once more assumed an expression of seriousness, and thus continued his narrative.

CHAPTER XXXI.

"It boots not now, Clara, to enter upon all that succeeded to my first introduction to your mother. It would take long to relate, not the gradations of our passion, for that was like the whirlwind of the desert, sudden and devastating from the first; but the burning vow, the plighted faith, the reposing confidence, the unchecked abandonment that flew from the lips, and filled the heart of each, sealed, as they were, with kisses, long, deep, enervating, even such as I had ever pictured that divine pledge of human affection should be. Yes, Clara de Haldimar, your mother was the child of nature then."

"I was not always the rugged being I now appear. Of surpassing strength I had ever been, and fleet of foot; but not then had I attained to my present gigantic stature; neither was my form endowed with the same herculean rudeness; nor did my complexion wear the swarthy hue of the savage; nor had my features been rendered repulsive, from the perpetual action of those fierce passions which have since assailed my soul.

"Your mother had been brought up in solitude, and without having seen the face of another man than her father. Colonel Beverly, of English name, but Scottish connections, was an old gentleman of considerable eccentricity of character. He had taken a part in the rebellion of 1715; but sick and disgusted with an issue by which his fortunes had been affected, and heart-broken by the loss of a beloved wife, whose death had been accelerated by circumstances connected with the disturbed nature of the times, he had resolved to bury himself and child in some wild, where the face of man, whom he loathed, might no more offend his sight. This oasis of the mountains was the spot selected for his purpose; for he had discovered it some years previously, on an occasion, when, closely pursued by some of the English troops, and separated from his followers, he had only effected his escape by venturing on the ledges of rock I have already described. After minute subsequent search, at the opposite extremity of the oblong belt of rocks that shut it in on every hand, he had discovered an opening, through which the transport of such necessities as were essential to his object might be effected; and, causing one of his dwelling houses to be pulled down, he had the materials carried across the rocks on the shoulders of the men employed to re-erect them in his chosen solitude. A few months served to complete these arrangements, which included a garden abounding in every fruit and flower that could possibly live in so elevated a region; and this, in time, under his own culture, and that of his daughter, became the Eden it first appeared to me.

"Previous to their entering on this employment, the workmen had been severally sworn to secrecy; and when all was declared ready for his reception, the colonel summoned them a second time to his presence; when, after making a handsome present to each, in addition to his hire, he found no difficulty in prevailing on them to renew their oath that they would preserve the most scrupulous silence in regard to the place of his retreat. He then took advantage of a dark and tempestuous night to execute his project; and, attended only by an old woman and her daughter, faithful dependants of the family, set out in quest of his new abode, leaving all his neighbours to discuss and marvel at the singularity of his disappearance. True to his text, however, not even a boy was admitted into his household: and here they had continued to live, unseen and unseen by man, except when a solitary and distant mountaineer occasionally fitted among the rocks below in pursuit of his game. Fruits and vegetables composed their principal diet; but once a fortnight the old woman was despatched through the opening already mentioned, which was at other times so secured by her master, that no hand but his own could remove the intricate fastenings. This expedition had for its object the purchase of bread and animal food at the nearest market; and every time she sallied forth an oath was administered to the crone, the purport of which was, not only that she would return, unless prevented by violence or death, but that she would not answer any questions put to her, as to whom she was, whence she came, or for whom the fruits of her marketing were intended.

"Meanwhile, wrapped up in his books, which were chiefly classic authors, or writers on abstruse sciences, the misanthropical colonel paid little or no attention to the cultivation of the intellect of his daughter, whom he had merely instructed in the elementary branches of education; in all which, however, she evinced an aptitude and perfectibility that indicated quickness of genius and a capability of far higher attainments. Books he principally withheld from her, because they brought the image of man, whom he hated, and wished she should also hate, too often in flattering colours before her; and had any work treating of love been found to have crept accidentally into his own collection, it would instantly and indignantly have been committed to the flames.

"Thus left to the action of her own heart—the guidance of her own feelings—it was but natural your mother should have suffered her imagination to repose on an ideal happiness, which, although in some degree destitute of shape and character, was still powerfully felt. What dear acknowledgments (alas! too deceitful) flowed from her guileless lips, even during our first interview.

"Two long and delicious hours," pursued Wacosta, after another painful pause of some moments, "did we pass together, exchanging thought, and speech, and heart, as if the terms of our acquaintance had been coeval with the first dawn of our intellectual life; when suddenly a small silver-toned bell was heard from the direction of the house, hid from the spot on which we sat by the luxuriant foliage of an intervening harnum. This sound seemed to dissipate the dreamy calm that had wrapped the soul of your mother into forgetfulness. She started suddenly up, and bade me, if I loved her, begone; as that bell announced her required attendance on her father, who, now awakened from the mid-day slumber in which he ever indulged, was about to take his accustomed walk around the grounds; which was little else, in fact, than a close inspection of the walls of his natural castle. I rose to obey her: our eyes met, and she threw herself into my extended arms. We whispered anew our vows of eternal love. She called me her husband, and I pronounced the endearing name of wife. A burning kiss sealed the compact; and, on her archly observing that the sleep of her father continued about two hours at noon, and that the old woman and her daughter were always occupied within doors, I promised to repeat my visit every second day until she finally quitted her retreat to be my own for life.

"One morning I had hastily sketched an outline of your mother's features in pencil, with a view to assist me in the design of a miniature I purposed painting from memory. While occupied the second day in its completion, it occurred to me I was in orders for duty on the following, which was that of my promised visit to the oasis; and I despatched my servant with my compliments to your father, and a request that he would be so obliging as to take my guard for me on the morrow, and I would perform his duty when next his name appeared on the roster. Some time afterwards I heard the door of the room in which I sat open, and some one enter. Presuming it to be my servant, (returned from the execution of the message with which he had just been charged,) I paid no attention to the circumstance; but finding, presently, he did not speak, I turned round with a view of demanding what answer he had brought. To my surprise, however, I beheld, not my servant, but your father. He was standing looking over my shoulder at the work on which I was engaged; and notwithstanding in the instant he resumed the cold, quiet, smirking look that usually distinguished him, I thought I could trace the evidence of some deep emotion which my action had suddenly dispelled. He apologised for his intrusion, although we were on those terms that rendered apology unnecessary, but said he had just received my message, and preferred coming in person to assure me how happy he should feel to take my duty, or to render me any other service in his power. I thought he laid unusual emphasis on the last sentence; yet I thanked him warmly, stating that the only service I should now exact of him would be to take my guard, as I was compelled to be absent nearly the whole of the following morning. He observed with a smile, he hoped I was not going to venture my neck on those dangerous precipices a second time, after the narrow escape I had had on the preceding day. As he spoke, I thought his eye met mine with a sly yet scrutinising glance; and, not wishing to reply immediately to his question, I asked him what he thought of the work with which I was endeavouring to beguile an idle hour. He took it up, and I watched the expression of his handsome countenance with the anxiety of a lover who wishes that all should think his mistress beautiful as he does himself. It betrayed a very indefinite sort of admiration; and yet it struck me there was an eagerness in his dilating eye that contrasted strongly with the calm and unconcern of his other features. At length I asked him laughingly, what he thought of my Cornish cousin. He replied, cautiously enough, that since it was the likeness of a cousin, and he dwelt emphatically on the word, he could not fail to admire it. Candour, however, compelled him to admit, that had I not declared the original to be one so closely connected with me, he should have said the talent of so perfect an artist might have been better employed.

"The next day saw me again at the side of your mother, who received me with the same artless demonstrations of affection. After the first full and unreserved interchange of our souls' best feelings, our conversation turned upon lighter topics; and I took an opportunity to produce the fruit of my application since we had parted. Never shall I forget the surprise and delight that animated her beautiful countenance when first she gazed upon the miniature. She expressed a strong desire to retain it; and to this I readily assented; stipulating only to keep it until my next visit, in order that I might take an exact copy for myself. She herself, she said, had not been idle. Although her pencil could not call up my image in the same manner, her pen had better repaid her exertions; and, in return for the portrait she would give me a letter she had written to beguile her loneliness on the preceding day. As she spoke she drew a sealed packet from the bosom of her dress, and placing it in my hand, desired me not to read it until I had returned to my home. But there was an expression of sweet confusion in her lovely countenance, and a trepidation in her manner, that, half disclosing the truth, rendered me utterly impatient of the delay imposed; and eagerly breaking the seal, I devoured rather than read its contents.

"Accursed madness of recollection!" pursued Wacosta, again striking his brow violently with his hand,—"why is it that I ever feel thus unarmed while recurring to those letters? Oh! Clara de Haldimar, never did woman pen to man such declarations of tenderness and attachment as that too dear but faithless letter of your mother contained. All confidence, she sank her head upon my chest, which heaved scarcely less wildly than her own.

"The hour of parting at length arrived, announced, as before, by the small bell of her father, and I again tore myself from her arms."

CHAPTER XXXII.

"Nearly a month passed away in this manner; and at each interview our affection seemed to increase. One day, while preparing to set out on my customary excursion, a report suddenly reached me that the route had arrived for the regiment, who were to march from within three days. This intelligence I received with inconceivable delight; for it had been settled between your mother and myself, that this should be the moment chosen for her departure.

"With a glowing cheek, and a countenance radiant with happiness, did your mother receive my proposal to prepare for her departure on the following day. She was sufficiently aware, even through what I had stated myself, that there were certain ceremonies of the church to be performed, in order to give sanctity to our union, and ensure her own personal respectability in the world; and these, I told her, would be solemnised by the chaplain of the regiment. She implicitly confided in me; and she was right; for I loved her too well to make her my mistress, while no barrier existed to her claim to a dearer title.

"The only difficulty that now occurred was the manner of her flight. I had proposed, as the most feasible and rational plan, that the colonel should be compelled to give us egress through the secret passage, when we might command the services of the old woman to guide us through the passes that led to the town; but to this your mother most urgently objected, declaring that she would rather encounter any personal peril that might attend her escape in a different manner, than appear to be a participator in an act of violence against her parent, whose obstinacy of character she moreover knew too well to leave a hope of his being intimidated into the accomplishment of our object, even by a threat of death itself. This plan I was therefore compelled to abandon; and as neither of us were able to discover the passage by which the deer always effected its entrance, I was obliged to fix upon one, which it was agreed should be put in practice on the following day.

"On my return, I occupied myself with preparations for the reception of her who was so speedily to become my wife. Unwilling that she should be seen by any of my companions, until the ceremony was finally performed, I engaged apartments in a small retired cottage, distant about half a mile from the furthest extremity of the town, where I purposed she should remain until the regiment finally quitted the station. This point secured, I hastened to the quarters of the chaplain, to engage his services for the following evening; but he was from home at the time, and I repaired to my own rooms, to prepare the means of escape for your mother. These occupied me until a very late hour; and when at length I retired to rest, it was only to indulge in the fondest imaginings that ever filled the heart of a devoted lover. Alas! (and the dark warrior again sighed heavily) the day-dream of my happiness was already fast drawing to a close.

"At half an hour before noon, I was again in the oasis; your mother was at the wonted spot; and although she received me with her sunniest smiles, there were traces of tears upon her cheek. She implored me to forgive her weakness; but it was the first time she was to be separated from her parent; and conscious as she was that it was to be for ever, she could not repress the feeling that rose, despite of herself, to her heart. She had, however, prepared a letter, at my suggestion, to be left on her favourite moss seat, where it was likely she would first be sought by her father, to assure him of her safety, and of her prospects of future happiness; and the consciousness that he would labour under no harrowing uncertainty in regard to her fate, seemed, at length, to soothe and satisfy her heart.

"I now led her to the aperture, where I had left the apparatus provided for my purpose: this consisted of a close netting, about four feet in depth, with a board for a footstool at the bottom, and furnished at intervals with hoops, so as to keep it full and open. The top of this netting was provided with two handles, to which were attached the ends of a cord many fathoms in length; the whole of such durability, as to have borne weights equal to those of three ordinary sized men, with which I had proved it prior to my setting out. My first care was to bandage the eyes of your mother, (who willingly and fearlessly submitted to all I proposed,) that she might not see, and become faint with seeing, the terrible chasm over which she was about to be suspended. I then placed her within the netting, which, fitting closely to her person, and reaching under her arms, completely secured her; and my next urgent request was, that she would not, on any account, remove the bandage, or make the slightest movement, when she found herself stationary below, until I had joined her. I then dropped her gently through the aperture, lowering fathom after fathom of the rope, the ends of which I had firmly secured round the trunk of a tree, as an additional safeguard, until she finally came on a level with that part of the cliff on which I had reposed when first she beheld me. As she still hung immediately over the abyss, it was necessary to give a gradual impetus to her weight, to enable her to gain the landing-place. I now, therefore, commenced swinging her to and fro, until she at length came so near the point desired, that I clearly saw the principal difficulty was surmounted. The necessary motion having been given to the balance, with one vigorous and final impulse I dexterously contrived to deposit her several feet from the edge of the lower rock, when, slackening the rope on the instant, I had the inexpressible satisfaction to see that she remained firm and stationary. The waving of her scarf immediately afterwards (a signal previously agreed upon), announced she had sustained no injury in this rather rude collision with the rock, and I in turn commenced my descent.

"Fearing to cast away the ends of the rope, lest their weight should by any chance affect the balance of the footing your mother had obtained, I now secured them around my loins, and accomplishing my descent in the customary manner, speedily found myself once more at the side of my heart's dearest treasure. I prepared to execute the remainder of my task; and again applied the bandage to her eyes, saying that, although the principal danger was over, still there was another I could not bear she should look upon.

"Disengaging the rope from the handles of the netting; I now applied to these a broad leathern belt, and stooping with my back to the cherished burden with which I was about to charge myself, passed the centre of the belt across my chest, much in the manner in which, as you are aware, Indian women carry their infant children. As an additional precaution, I had secured the netting round my waist by a strong lacing of cord, and then raising myself to my full height, and satisfying myself of the perfect freedom of action of my limbs, seized a long balancing pole I had left suspended against the rock at my last visit, and commenced my descent of the sloping ridge. On approaching, the horrible chasm, a feeling of faintness came over me, despite of the confidence with which I had previously armed myself. This, however, was but momentary. Sensible that every thing depended on rapidity of movement, I paused not in my course; but, quickening my pace as I gradually drew nearer, gave the necessary impetus to my motion, and cleared the gap with a facility far exceeding what had distinguished my first passage, and which was the fruit of constant practice alone. Here my balance was sustained by the pole; and at length I had the inexpressible satisfaction to find myself at the very extremity of the ridge, and immediately at the point where I had left my companions in my first memorable pursuit.

"In the deep transport of my joy, I once more threw myself on my knees in speechless thanksgiving to Providence for the complete success of my undertaking. Your mother, whom I had previously released from her confinement, did the same; and at that moment the union of our hearts seemed to be cemented by a divine influence, manifested in the fulness of the gratitude of each. Throwing over her shoulders the mantle of a youth, which I had secreted near the spot, I enjoined her to follow me closely in the path I was about to pursue.

"I have not hitherto found it necessary to state," continued Wacosta, his brow lowering with fierce and gloomy thought, "that more than once, latterly, on my return from the oasis, which was usually at a stated hour, I had observed a hunter hovering near the end of the ledge, yet quickly retreating as I advanced. There was something in the figure of this man that recalled to my recollection the form of your father; but ever, on my return to quarters, I found him in uniform, and exhibiting any thing but the appearance of one who had recently been threading his weary way among rocks and fastnesses. Besides, the improbability of this fact was so great, that it occupied not my attention beyond the passing moment. On the present occasion, however, I saw the same hunter, and was more forcibly than ever struck by the resemblance to my friend. Prior to my quitting the point where I had liberated your mother from the netting, I had, in addition to the disguise of the cloak, found it necessary to make some alteration in the arrangement of her hair; the redundancy of which, as it floated gracefully over her polished neck, was in itself sufficient to betray her sex. With this view I had removed her plumed bonnet. It was the first time I had seen her without it; and so deeply impressed was I by the angel like character of the extreme feminine beauty she, more than ever, then exhibited, that I knelt in silent adoration for some moments at her feet, my eyes and countenance alone expressing the fervent and almost holy emotion of my enraptured soul.

"Immediately we pursued our course; and after an hour's rather laborious exertion, at length emerged from the succession of glens and rocks that lay in our way; when, skirting the valley in which the town was situated, we finally reached the cottage where I had secured my lodging. Previous to entering it, I had told your mother, that for the few hours that would intervene before the marriage ceremony could be performed, I should, by way of alluding the curiosity of her hostess, introduce her as a near relative of my own. This I did accordingly; and, having seen that every thing was comfortably arranged for her convenience, and recommending her strongly to the care of the old woman, I set off once more in search of the chaplain of the regiment. Before I could reach his residence, however, I was met by a sergeant of my company, who came running towards me, evidently with some intelligence of moment. He stated, that my presence was required without delay. The grenadiers, with the senior subaltern, were in orders for detachment for an important service; and considerable displeasure had been manifested by the colonel at my absence, especially as of late I had greatly neglected my military duties. He had been looking for me every where, he said, but without success, when Ensign de Haldimar had pointed out to him in what direction it was likely I might be found.

"With a beating heart did I assume an uniform that appeared, at that moment, hideous in my eyes; yet I was not without a hope I might yet get off this ill-timed duty. Before I had completed my equipment, your father entered my quarters; and when I first glanced my eye full upon him, I thought his countenance exhibited evidences of confusion. This immediately reminded me of the unknown hunter, and I asked him if he was not the person I described. His answer was not a positive denial, but a mixture of raillery and surprise that lulled my doubts, enfeebled as they were by the restored calm of his features. I then told him that I had a particular favour to ask of him, which, in consideration of our friendship, I trusted he would not refuse; and that was, to take my duty in the expedition about to set forth. His manner implied concern; and he asked, with a look that had much deliberate expression in it, 'if I was aware that it was a duty in which blood was expected to be shed? He could not suppose that any consideration would induce me to resign my duty to another officer, when apprised of this fact.' All this was said with the air of one really interested in my honour; but in my increasing impatience, I told him I wanted none of his cant; I simply asked him a favour, which he would grant or decline as he thought proper. This was a harshness of language I had never indulged in; but my mind was sore under the existing causes of my annoyance, and I could not bear to have my motives reflected on at a moment when my heart was torn with all the agonies attendant on the position in which I found myself placed. His cheek paled and flushed more than once, before he replied, 'that in spite of my unkindness his friendship might induce him to do much for me, even as he had hitherto done, but that on the present occasion it rested not with him. In order to justify himself he would no longer disguise the fact from me, that the colonel had declared, in the presence of the whole regiment, I should take my duty regularly in future, and not be suffered to make a convenience of the service any longer. If, however, he could do any thing for me during my absence, I had but to command him.

"While I was yet giving vent, in no very measured terms, to the indignation I felt at being made the subject of public censure by the colonel, the same sergeant came into the room, announcing that the company were only waiting for me to march, and that the colonel desired my instant presence. In the agitation of my feelings, I scarcely knew what I did, putting several portions of my regimental equipment on so completely awry, that your father noticed and rectified the errors I had committed; while again, in the presence of the sergeant, I expressed the deepest regret he could not relieve me from a duty that was hateful to the last degree.

"Torn with agony at the thought of the uncertainty in which I was compelled to leave her whom I so fondly adored, I had now no other alternative than to make a partial confidant of your father. I told him that in the cottage which I pointed out he would find the original of the portrait he had seen me painting on a former occasion,—the Cornish cousin, whose beauty he professed to hold so cheaply. More he should know of her on my return; but at present I confided her to his honour, and begged he would prove his friendship for me by rendering her whatever attention she might require in her humble abode. With these hurried injunctions he promised to comply; and it has often occurred to me since, although I did not remark it at the time, that while his voice and manner were calm, there was a burning glow upon his handsome cheek, and a suppressed exultation in his eye, that I had never observed on either before. I then quitted the room; and hastening to my company with a glow on my brow that indicated the wretchedness of my inward spirit, was soon afterwards on the march from ———."

CHAPTER XXXIII.

"If, hitherto, Clara de Haldimar, I have been minute in the detail of all that attended my connection with your mother, it has been with a view to prove to you how deeply I have been injured; but I have now arrived at a part of my history, when to linger on the past would grieve me into madness, and render me unfit for the purpose to which I have devoted myself.

"Will you credit the monstrous truth," he added, in a fierce but composed whisper, while he bent eagerly over the form of the trembling yet attentive girl, "when I tell you that, on my return from that fatal expedition, during my continuance on which her image had never once been absent from my mind, I found Clara Beverley the wife of De Haldimar? To what satanic arts so calculating a villain could have had recourse to effect his object I know not; but it is not the less true, that she, from whom my previous history must have taught you to expect the purity of intention and conduct of an angel, became his wife,—and I a being accursed among men." Here the agitation of Wacosta became terrific. The labouring of his chest was like that of one convulsed with some racking agony; and the swollen veins and arteries of his head seemed to threaten the extinction of life in some fearful paroxysm. At length he burst into a violent fit of tears, more appalling, in one of his iron nature, than the fury which had preceded it,—and it was many minutes before he could so far compose himself as to resume.

"Think not, Clara de Haldimar, I speak without the proof. Her own words confessed, her own lips avowed it, and yet I neither slew her, nor her paramour, nor myself. On my return to the regiment I had flown to the cottage, on the wings of the most impatient and tender love that ever filled the bosom of man for woman. To my enquiries the landlady replied, that my cousin had been married two days previously, by the military chaplain, to a handsome young officer, who had visited her soon after my departure, and was constantly with her from that moment; and that immediately after the ceremony they had left, but she knew not whither. Wild, desperate, almost bereft of reason, and with a heart bounding against my bosom, as if each agonising throb were to be its last, I ran like a maniac back into the town, nor paused till I found myself in the presence of your father. My mind was a volcano, but still I attempted to be calm, even while I charged him, in the most outrageous terms, with his villany. Deny it he could not; but, far from excusing it, he boldly avowed and justified the step he had taken, intimating, with a smile full of meaning, there was nothing in a connection with the family of De Haldimar to reflect disgrace on the cousin of Sir Reginald Morton; and that the highest compliment he could pay his friend was to attach himself to one whom that friend had declared to be so near a relative of his own. There was a coldness of taunt in these remarks, that implied his sense of the deception I had practised on him, in regard to the true nature of the relationship; and for a moment, while my hand firmly grasped the hilt of my sword, I hesitated whether I should not cut him down at my feet: I had self-command, however, to abstain from the outrage, and I have often since regretted I had. My own blood could have been but spilt in atonement for my just revenge; and as for the obloquy attached to the memory of the assassin, it could not have been more bitter than that which has followed me through life.

"For weeks I was insensible to any thing but the dreadful shock my soul had sustained. A heavy stupor weighed me down, and for a period it was supposed my reason was overthrown: no such mercy was reserved for me. The regiment had quitted the Highlands, and were now stationary in ———, whither I had accompanied it in arrest. The restoration of my faculties was the signal for new persecutions. Scarcely had the medical officers reported me fit to sustain the ordeal, when a court-martial was assembled to try me on a variety of charges. Who was my prosecutor? Listen, Clara," and he shook her violently by the arm. "He who had robbed me of all that gave value to life, and incentive to honour,—he who, under the guise of friendship, had stolen into the Eden of my love, and left it barrenless of affection. In a word, you detested governor, to whose inhuman cruelty even the son of my brother has, by some strange fatality of coincidence, so recently fallen a second sacrifice. Curses, curses, on him," he pursued, with frightful vehemence, half rising as he spoke, and holding forth his right arm in a menacing attitude; "but the hour of retribution is at hand, and revenge, the exclusive passion of the gods, shall at length be mine. In no other country in the world—under no other circumstances than the present—could I have so secured it.

"What were the charges preferred against me?" he continued, with a violence that almost petrified the unhappy girl. "Hear them, and judge whether I have not cause for the inextinguishable hate that rankles at my heart. Every trifling disobedience of orders—every partial neglect of duty that could be raked up—was tortured into a specific charge; and, as I have already admitted I had latterly transgressed not a little in this respect, these were numerous enough. Yet they were but preparatory to others of greater magnitude. Will you, can you believe any thing half so atrocious, as that your father should have called on a petty officer not only to prove some violent and insubordinate language I had used in reference to the commanding officer in my own rooms, but also to substantiate a charge of cowardice, grounded on the unwillingness I had expressed to accompany the expedition, and the extraordinary trepidation I had evinced, while preparing for the duty, manifested, as it was stated to be, by the various errors he had rectified in my equipment with his own hand? Yes, even this pitiful charge was one of the many preferred; but the severest was that which he had the unblushing effrontery to make the subject of public investigation, rather than of private redress—the blow I had struck him in his own apartments. And who was his witness in this monstrous charge?—your mother, Clara. Yea, I stood as a criminal in her presence; and yet she came forward to tender an evidence that was to consign me to a disgraceful sentence. My vile prosecutor had, moreover, the encouragement, the sanction of his colonel throughout, and by him he was upheld in every contemptible charge his ingenuity could devise. Do you not anticipate the result?—I was found guilty, and dismissed the service.

"What agonies of mind I endured,—what burning tears I nightly shed upon a pillow I was destined to press in freezing loneliness,—what hours of solitude I passed, far from the haunts of my fellow-men, and forming plans of vengeance,—it would take much longer time to relate than I have actually bestowed on my unhappy history. To comprehend their extent and force you must understand the heart of fire in which the deep sense of injury had taken root; but the night wears away, and briefly told must be the remainder of my tale. The rebellion of forty-five saw me in arms in the Scottish ranks; and, in one instance, opposed to the regiment from which I had been so ignominiously expelled. Never did revenge glow like a living fire in the heart of man as it did in mine; for the effect of my long brooding in solitude had been to inspire me with a detestation, not merely for those who had been most rancorous in their enmity, but for every thing that wore the uniform, from the commanding officer down to the meanest private. Every blow that I dealt, every life that I sacrificed, was an insult washed away from my attained honour; but him whom I most sought in the mêlée I never could reach. At length the corps to which I had attached myself was repulsed, and I saw, with rage in my heart, that my enemy still lived to triumph in the fruit of his villany.

"Although I was grown considerably in stature at this period, and was otherwise greatly altered in appearance, I had been recognised in the action by numbers of the regiment; and, indeed, more than once I had, in the intoxication of my rage, accompanied the blow that slew or maimed one of my former associates with a declaration of the name of him who inflicted it. The consequence was, I was denounced as a rebel and an outlaw, and a price was put upon my head. Accustomed, however, as I had ever been, to rocks and fastnesses, I had no difficulty in eluding the vigilance of those who were sent in pursuit of me; and thus compelled to live wholly apart from my species, I at length learned to hate them, and to know that man is the only enemy of man upon earth.

"A change now came over the spirit of my vengeance; for about this period your mother died. She was the only being I had ever looked upon with fondness; and deeply even as I had been injured by her, I wept her memory with many a scalding tear. This, however, only increased my hatred for him who had rioted in her beauty and supplanted me in her devotedness. I had the means of learning, occasionally, all that passed in the regiment, and the same account that brought me the news of your mother's death, also gave me the intelligence that three children had been the fruit of her union with De Haldimar. I heard moreover, (and this gave me pleasure,) that their father doted on them; and from that moment I resolved to turn his cup of joy into bitterness, even as he had turned mine. I no longer sought his life; for the jealousy that had half impelled that thirst existed no longer; but, deeming his cold nature at least accessible through his parental affection, I was resolved that in his children he should suffer a portion of the agonies he had inflicted on me. I waited, however, until they should be grown up to an age when the heart of the parent would be more likely to mourn their loss; and then I was determined my vengeance should be complete.

"Circumstances singularly favoured my design. Many years afterwards, the regiment formed one of the expedition against Quebec under General Wolfe. They were commanded by your father, who, in the course of promotion, had obtained the lieutenant-colonelcy; and I observed by the army list, that a subaltern of the same name, whom I presumed to be his eldest son, was in the corps. Here was a field for my vengeance beyond any I could have hoped for. I contrived to pass over into Cornwall, the ban of outlawry being still unrepealed: and having procured from my brother a sum sufficient for my necessities, and bade him an eternal farewell, embarked in a fishing-boat for the coast of France, whence I subsequently took a passage to this country. At Montreal I found the French general, who gladly received my allegiance as a subject of France, and gave me a commission in one of the provincial corps that usually served in concert with our Indian allies. With the general I soon became a favourite; and, as a mark of his confidence, at the attack on Quebec, he entrusted me with the command of a detached irregular force, consisting partly of Canadians and partly of Indians, intended to harass the flanks of the British army. This gave me an opportunity of being at whatever point of the field I might think most favourable to my design; and I was too familiar with the detested uniform of the regiment not to be able to distinguish it from afar. In a word, Clara, for I am weary of my own tale, in that engagement I had an opportunity of recognising your brother. He struck me by his martial appearance as he encouraged his grenadiers to the attack of the French columns; and, as I turned my eye upon him in admiration, I was stung to the soul by his resemblance to his father. Vengeance thrilled throughout every fibre of my frame at that moment. The opportunity I had long sought was at length arrived; and already, in anticipation, I enjoyed the conquest his fall would occasion to my enemy. I rushed within a few feet of my victim; but the bullet aimed at his heart was received in the breast of a faithful soldier, who had flown to intercept it. How I cursed the meddler for his officiousness!"

"Oh, that soldier was your nephew," eagerly interrupted Clara, pointing towards her companion, who had fallen into a profound slumber, "the husband of this unfortunate woman. Frank Halloway (for by that name was he alone known in the regiment) loved my brother as though he had been of the same blood. He it was who flew to receive the ball that was destined for another. But I nursed him on his couch of suffering, and with my own hands prepared his food and dressed his wound. Oh, if pity can touch your heart (and I will not believe that a heart that once felt as you say yours has felt, can be inaccessible to pity), let the recollection of your nephew's devotedness to my mother's child disarm you of vengeance, and induce you to restore us!"

"Never!" thundered Wacosta,—"never! The very circumstance you have now named is an additional incentive to my vengeance. My nephew saved the life of your brother at the hazard of his own; and how has he been rewarded for the generous deed? By an ignominious death, inflicted, perhaps, for some offence not more dishonouring than those which have thrown me an outcast upon these wilds; and that at the command and in the presence of the father of him whose life he was fool enough to preserve. Yet, what but ingratitude of the grossest nature could a Morton expect at the hands of the false family of De Haldimar! They were destined to be our bane, and well have they fulfilled the end for which they were created."

"Almighty Providence," aspirated the sinking Clara, as she turned her streaming eyes to heaven; "can it be that the human heart can undergo such change? Can this be the being who once loved my mother with a purity and tenderness of affection that angels themselves might hallow with approval; or is all that I have heard but a bewildering dream?"

"No, Clara," calmly and even solemnly returned the warrior; "it is no dream, but a reality—a sad, dreadful, heart-rending reality; yet, if I am that altered being, to whom is the change to be ascribed? Who turned the generous current of my blood into a river of overflowing gall?—Your father! But these are idle words. What I have been, you know; what I now am, and through what agency I have been rendered what I now am, you know also. Not more fixed is fate than my purpose. Your brother dies even on the spot on which my nephew died; and you, Clara, shall be my bride; and the first thing your children shall be taught to hiss shall be curses on the vile name of De Haldimar!"

"Once more, in the name of my sainted mother, I implore you to have mercy," shrieked the unhappy Clara. "Oh!" she continued with vehement supplication, "let the days of your early love be brought back to your memory, that your heart may be softened; and cut yourself not wholly off from your God, by the commission of such dreadful outrages. Again, I conjure you, restore us to my father."

"Never!" savagely repeated Wacosta. "I have passed years of torture in the hope of such an hour as this; and now that fruition is within my grasp, may I perish if I forego it! Ha, sir!" turning from the almost fainting Clara to Sir Everard, who had listened with deep attention to the history of this extraordinary man—"for this," and he thrust aside the breast of his hunting coat, exhibiting the scar of a long but superficial wound,—for this do you owe me a severe reckoning. I would recommend you, however,—and he spoke in mockery,—“when next you drive a weapon into the chest of an unresisting enemy, to be more certain of your aim. Had that been as true as the blow from the butt of your rifle, I should not have lived to triumph in this hour. I little deemed,” he pursued, still addressing the nearly heart-broken officer in the same insolent strain, “that my intrigue with that dark-eyed daughter of the old Canadian would have been the means of throwing your companion so speedily into my power, after his first narrow escape. Your disguise was well managed, I confess; and but that there is an instinct about me, enabling me to discover a De Haldimar, as a hound does the deer, by scent, you might have succeeded in passing for what you appeared. But” (and his tone suddenly changed its irony for fierceness) “to the point, sir. That you are the lover of this girl I clearly perceive, and death were preferable to a life embittered by the recollection that she whom we love reposes in the arms of another. No such kindness is meant you, however. To-morrow you shall return to the fort; and, when there, you may tell your colonel, that, in exchange for a certain miniature and letters, which, in the hurry of departure, I dropped in his apartment, some ten days since, Sir Reginald Morton, the outlaw, has taken his daughter Clara to wife, but without the solemnisation of those tedious forms that bound himself in accursed union with her mother. Oh! what would I not give,” he continued bitterly, “to wit-gess the pang inflicted on his false heart, when first the damning truth arrests his ear. Never did I know the triumph of my power until now; for what revenge can be half so sweet as that which attains a loathed enemy through the dishonour of his child? But, hark! what mean those sounds?”

A loud yelling was now heard at some distance in rear of the tent. Presently the bounding of many feet on the turf was distinguishable; and then, at intervals, the peculiar cry that announces the escape of a prisoner. Wacosta started to his feet, and fiercely grasping his tomahawk, advanced to the front of the tent, where he seemed to listen for a moment attentively, as if endeavouring to catch the direction of the pursuit.

"Ha! by heaven!" he exclaimed, "there must be treachery in this, or yon slippery captain would not so soon be at his flight again, bound as I had bound him." Then uttering a deafening yell, and rushing past Sir Everard, near whom he paused an instant, as if undecided whether he should not first dispose of him, as a precautionary measure, he flew with the speed of an antelope in the direction in which he was guided by the gradually receding sounds.

"The knife, Miss de Haldimar," exclaimed Sir Everard, after a few moments of breathless and intense anxiety. "See, there is one in the belt that Ellen Halloway has girt around her loins. Quick, for heaven's sake, quick; our only chance of safety is in this."

With an activity arising from her despair, the unhappy Clara sprang from the rude couch on which she had been left by Wacosta, and stooping over the form of the maniac, extended her hand to remove the weapon from her side; but Ellen, who had been awakened from her long slumber by the yells just uttered, seemed resolute to prevent it. A struggle for its possession now ensued between these frail and delicate beings; in which Clara, however, had the advantage, not only from the recumbent position of her opponent, but from the greater security of her grasp. At length, with a violent effort, she contrived to disengage it from the sheath, around which Ellen had closely clasped both her hands; but, with the quickness of thought, the latter were again clenched round the naked blade, and without any other evident motive than what originated in the obstinacy of her madness, the unfortunate woman fiercely attempted to wrest it away. In the act of doing so, her hands were dreadfully cut; and Clara, shocked at the sight of the blood she had been the means of shedding, lost all the energy she had summoned, and sunk senseless at the feet of the maniac, who now began to utter the most piteous cries.

"Oh, God, we are lost," exclaimed Sir Everard; the voice of that wretched woman has alarmed our enemy, and even now I hear him approaching. Quick, Clara, give me the knife. But no, it is now too late; he is here."

At that instant, the dark form of a warrior rushed noiselessly to the spot on which he stood. The officer turned his eyes in desperation on his enemy, but a single glance was sufficient to assure him it was not Wacosta. The Indian paused not in his course, but passing close round the tree to which the baronet was attached, made a circular movement, that brought him in a line with the direction that had been taken by his enemy; and again they were left alone.

A new fear now oppressed the heart of the unfortunate Valletot, even to agony: Clara still lay senseless, speechless before him; and his impression was, that, in the struggle, Ellen Halloway had murdered her. The latter yet continued her cries; and, as she held up her hands, he could see by the fire-light they were covered with blood. An instinctive impulse caused him to bound forward to the assistance of the motionless Clara; when, to his infinite surprise and joy, he discovered the cord, which had bound him to the tree, to be severed. The Indian who had just passed had evidently been his deliverer; and a sudden flash of recollection recalled the figure of the warrior that had escaped from the schooner and was supposed to have leaped into the canoe of Oucanasta at the moment when Madeline de Haldimar was removed into that of the Canadian.

In a transport of conflicting feelings, Sir Everard now raised the insensible Clara from the ground; and, having satisfied himself she had sustained no serious injury, prepared for a flight which he felt to be desperate, if not altogether hopeless. There was not a moment to be lost, for the cries of the wretched Ellen increased in violence, as she seemed sensible she was about to be left utterly alone; and ever and anon, although afar off, yet evidently drawing nearer, was to be heard the fierce denouncing yell of Wacosta. The spot on which the officer stood, was not far from that whence his unfortunate friend had commenced his flight on the first memorable occasion; and as the moon shone brightly in the cloudless heavens, there could be no mistake in the course he was to pursue. Dashing down the steep, therefore, with all the speed his beloved burden would enable him to attain, he made immediately for the bridge over which his only chance of safety lay.

It unfortunately happened, however, that, induced either by the malice of her insanity, or really terrified at the loneliness of her position, the wretched Ellen Halloway had likewise quitted the tent, and now followed close in the rear of the fugitives, still uttering the same piercing cries of anguish. The voice of Wacosta was also again heard in the distance; and Sir Everard had the inexpressible horror to find that, guided by the shrieks of the maniac woman, he was now shaping his course, not to the tent where he had left his prisoners, but in an oblique direction towards the bridge, where he evidently hoped to intercept them. Aware of the extreme disadvantages under which he laboured in a competition of speed with his active enemy, the unhappy officer would have here terminated the struggle, had he not been partially sustained by the hope that the detachment prayed for by De Haldimar, through the friendly young chief, to whom he owed his own liberation, might be about this time on its way to attempt their rescue. This thought supported his faltering resolution, although nearly exhausted with his efforts—compelled, as he was, to sustain the motionless form of the slowly reviving Clara; and he again braced himself to the unequal flight. The moon still shone beautifully bright, and he could now distinctly see the bridge over which he was to pass; but notwithstanding he strained his eyes as he advanced, no vestige of a British uniform was to be seen in the open space that lay beyond. Once he turned to regard his pursuers. Ellen was a few yards only in his rear; and considerably beyond her rose, in tall relief against the heavens, the gigantic form of the warrior. The pursuit of the latter was now conducted with a silence that terrified even more than the yells he had previously uttered; and he gained so rapidly on his victims, that the tread of his large feet was now distinctly audible. Again the officer, with despair in his heart, made the most incredible exertions to reach the bridge, without seeming to reflect that, even when there, no security was offered him against his enemy. Once, as he drew nearer, he fancied he saw the dark heads of human beings peering from under that part of the arch which had afforded cover to De Haldimar and himself on the memorable occasion of their departure with the Canadian; and, convinced that the warrior of Wacosta had been sent there to lie in ambush and intercept his retreat, his hopes were utterly paralyzed; and although he stopped not, his flight was rather chancal than the fruit of any systematic plan of escape.

He had now gained the extremity of the bridge, with Ellen Halloway and Wacosta close in his rear, when suddenly the heads of many men were once more distinguishable, even in the shadow of the arch that overhung the sands of the river. Three individuals detached themselves from the group, and leaping upon the farther extremity of the bridge, moved rapidly to meet him. Meanwhile the baronet had stopped suddenly, as if in doubt whether to advance or to recede. His suspense was but momentary. Although the persons of these men were disguised as Indian warriors, the broad moonlight that beamed full on their countenances disclosed the well-remembered features of Blessington, Erskine, and Charles de Haldimar. The latter sprang before his companions, and, uttering a cry of joy, sank in speechless agony on the neck of his still unconscious sister.

"For God's sake, free me, De Haldimar!" exclaimed the excited baronet, disengaging his charge from the embrace of his friend. "This is no moment for gratulation. Erskine, Blessington, see you not who is behind me? Be upon your guard; defend your lives!" And as he spoke, he rushed forward with faint and tottering steps to place his companions between the unhappy girl and the danger that threatened her.

The swords of the officers were drawn; but instead of advancing upon the formidable being, who stood as if paralysed at this unexpected rencontre, the two seniors contented themselves with assuming a defensive attitude, retiring slowly and gradually towards the other extremity of the bridge.

Overcome by his emotion, Charles de Haldimar had not noticed this action of his companions, and stood apparently riveted to the spot. The voice of Blessington calling on him by name to retire, seemed to arouse the dormant consciousness of the unhappy maniac. She uttered a piercing shriek, and springing forward, sank on her knees at his feet, exclaiming, as she forcibly detained him by his dress—

"Almighty Heaven! where am I? surely that was Captain Blessington's kind voice I heard; and you—you are Charles de Haldimar. Oh! save my husband; plead for him with your father!—but no," she continued wildly,—"he is dead—he is murdered! Behold these hands all covered with his blood! Oh!"

"Ha! another De Haldimar!" exclaimed Wacosta, recovering his slumbering energies, "this spot seems indeed fated for our meeting. More than thrice have I been banished of my just revenge, but now will I secure it. Thus, Ellen, do I avenge your husband's and my nephew's death. My own wrongs demand another sacrifice. But, ha! where is she? where is Clara? where is my bride?"

Bounding over the ill-fated De Haldimar, who lay, even in death, firmly clasped in the embrace of the wretched Ellen, the fierce man dashed furiously forward to renew his pursuit of the fugitives. But suddenly the extremity of the bridge was filled with a column of armed men, that kept issuing from the arch beneath. Sensible of his danger, he sought to make good his retreat; but when he turned for the purpose, the same formidable array met his view at the opposite extremity; and both parties now rapidly advanced in double quick time, evidently with a view of closing upon and taking him prisoner. In this dilemma, his only hope was in the assistance that might be rendered him by his warriors. A yell, so terrific as to be distinctly heard in the fort itself, burst from his vast chest, and rolled in prolonged echoes through the forest. It was faintly answered from the encampment, and met by deep but noiseless curses from the exasperated soldiery, whose the sight of their murdered officer was momentarily working into frenzy.

"Kill him not, for your lives!—I command you, men, kill him not!" muttered Captain Blessington with suppressed passion, as his troops were preparing to immolate him on their chattering bayonets. "Such a death were, indeed, mercy to such a villain."

"Ha! ha!" laughed Wacosta in bitter scorn; "who is there of all your accursed regiment who will dare to take him alive?" Then brandishing his tomahawk around him, to prevent their finally closing, he dealt his blows with such astonishing velocity, that no unguarded point was left about his person; and more than one soldier was brought to the earth in the course of the unequal struggle.

"By G—d!" said Captain Erskine, "are the two best companies of the regiment to be kept at bay by a single desperado? Shame on ye, fellows! If his hands are too many for you, lay him by the heels."

This ruse was practised with success. In attempting to defend himself from the attack of those who sought to throw him down, the warrior necessarily left his upper person exposed; when advantage was taken to close with him and deprive him of the play of his arms. It was not, however, without considerable difficulty, that they succeeded in disarming and binding his hands; after which a strong cord being fastened round his waist, he was tightly lashed to a gun, which, contrary to the original intention of the governor, had been sent out with the expedition. The retreat of the detachment then commenced rapidly; but it was not without being hotly pursued by the band of warriors the yell of Wacosta had summoned in pursuit, that they finally gained the fort: under what feelings of sorrow for the fate of an officer so beloved, we leave it to our readers to imagine.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

The morning of the next day dawned on few who had pressed their customary couches—on none, whose feverish pulse and bloodshot eye failed to attest the utter sleeplessness in which the night had been passed. Numerous groups of men were to be seen assembling after the reveillé, in various parts of the barrack square—those who had borne a part in the recent expedition commingling with those who had not, and recounting to the latter, with mournful look and voice, the circumstances connected with the bereavement of their universally lamented officer. As none, however, had seen the blow struck that deprived him of life, although each had heard the frantic exclamations of a voice that had been recognised for Ellen Halloway's, much of the marvellous was necessarily mixed up with truth in their narrative,—some positively affirming Mr. de Haldimar had not once quitted his party, and declaring that nothing short of a supernatural agency could have transported him unnoticed to the fatal spot, where, in their advance, they had beheld him murdered. The singular appearance of Ellen Halloway also, at that moment, on the very bridge on which she had pronounced her curse on the family of De Haldimar, and in company with the terrible and mysterious being who had borne her off in triumph on that occasion to the forest, and under circumstances calculated to excite the most superstitious impressions, was not without its weight in determining their rude speculations; and all concurred in opinion, that the death of the unfortunate young officer was a judgment on their colonel for the little mercy he had extended to the noble-hearted Halloway.

Then followed allusion to their captive, whose gigantic stature and efforts at escape, tremendous even as the latter were, were duly exaggerated by each, with the very laudable view of claiming a proportionate share of credit for his own individual exertions; and many and various were the opinions expressed as to the manner of death he should be made to suffer. Among the most conspicuous of the orators were those with whom our readers have already made slight acquaintance in our account of the sortie by Captain Erskine's company for the recovery of the supposed body of Frederick de Haldimar. One was for impaling him alive, and setting him up to rot on the platform above the gate. Another for blowing him from the muzzle of a twenty-four pounder, into the centre of the first band of Indians that approached the fort, that thus perceiving they had lost the strength and sinew of their cunning war, they might be the more easily induced to propose terms of peace. A third was of opinion he ought to be chained to the top of the flag-staff, as a target, to be shot at with arrows only, contriving never to touch a mortal part. A fourth would have had him tied naked over the sharp spikes that constituted the chevaux-de-frise garnishing the sides of the drawbridge. Each devised some new death—proposed some new torture; but all were of opinion, that simply to be shot, or even to be hanged, was too merciful a punishment for the wretch who had so wantonly and inhumanly butchered the kind-hearted, gentle-mannered officer, whom they had almost all known and loved from his very boyhood; and they looked forward, with mingled anxiety and vengeance, to the moment when, summoned as it was expected he shortly would be, before the assembled garrison, he would be made to expiate the atrocity with his blood.

While the men thus gave indulgence to their indignation and their grief, their officers were even more painfully affected. The body of the ill-fated Charles had been borne to his apartment, where, divested of its disguise, it had again been inducted in such apparel as was deemed suited to the purpose. Extended on the very bed on which he lay at the moment when she, whose maniac raving, and forcible detention, had been the immediate cause of his destruction, had preferred her wild but fruitless supplication for mercy, he exhibited, even in death, the same delicate beauty that had characterised him on that occasion; yet, with a mildness and serenity of expression on his still, pale features, strongly in contrast with the agitation and glow of excitement that then distinguished him.

Around the bed were grouped nearly all the officers, standing in attitudes indicative of anxiety and interest, and gazing mournfully on the placid features of their ill-fated friend. All, on entering, moved noiselessly over the rude floor, as though fearful of disturbing the repose of one who merely slumbered; and the same precaution was extended to the brief but heart-felt expressions of sorrow that passed from one to the other, as they gazed on all that remained of the gentle De Haldimar.

Gradually the officers moved away in the same noiseless manner they had approached, either in pursuance of their several duties, or to make their toilet of the morning. Two only of their number remained near the couch of death.

"Poor unfortunate De Haldimar!" observed one of these, in a low tone, as if speaking to himself; "too fatally, indeed, have your forebodings been realised; and what I considered as the mere despondency of a mind crushed into feebleness by an accumulation of suffering, was, after all, but the first presentiment of a death no human power might avert. By heaven! I would give up half my own being to be able to reanimate that form once more,—but the wish is vain."

"Who shall announce the intelligence to his sister?" sighed his companion. "Never will that already nearly heart-broken girl be able to survive the shock of her brother's death. Blessington, you alone are fitted to such a task; and, painful as it is, you must undertake it. Is the colonel apprised of the dreadful truth, do you know?"

"He is. It was told him at the moment of our arrival last night; but from the little outward emotion displayed by him, I should be tempted to infer he had almost anticipated some such catastrophe."

"Poor, poor Charles!" bitterly exclaimed Sir Everard Valletort—for it was he. "What would I not give to recall the rude manner in which I spurned you from me last night. But, alas! what could I do, laden with such a trust, and pursued, without the power of defence, by such an enemy? Little, indeed, did I imagine what was so speedily to be your doom! Blessington," he pursued, with increased emotion, "it grieves me to wretchedness to think that he, whom I loved as though he had been my twin brother, should have perished with his last thoughts, perhaps, lingering on the seeming unkindness with which I had greeted him after so anxious an absence."

"Nay, if there be blame, it must attach to me," sorrowfully observed Captain Blessington. "Had Erskine and myself not retired before the savage, as we did, our unfortunate friend would in all probability have been alive at this very hour. But in our anxiety to draw the former into the ambuscade we had prepared for him, we utterly overlooked that Charles was not retreating with us."

"How happened it," demanded Sir Everard, his attention naturally directed to the subject by the preceding remarks, "that you lay thus in ambuscade, when the object of the expedition, as solicited by Frederick de Haldimar, was an attempt to reach us in the encampment of the Indians?"

"It certainly was under that impression we left the fort; but, on coming to the spot where the friendly Indian lay waiting to conduct us, he proposed the plan we subsequently adopted as the most likely, not only to secure the escape of the prisoners, whom he pledged himself to liberate, but to defend ourselves with advantage against Wacosta and the immediate guard set over them, should they follow in pursuit. Erskine approving, as well as myself, of the plan, we halted at the bridge, and disposed of our men under each extremity; so that, if attacked by the Indians in front, we might be enabled to throw them into confusion by taking them in rear, as they flung themselves upon the bridge. The event seemed to answer our expectations. The alarm raised in the encampment satisfied us the young Indian had contrived to fulfil his promise; and we momentarily looked for the appearance of those whose flight we naturally supposed would be directed towards the bridge. To our great surprise, however, we remarked that the sounds of pursuit, instead of approaching us, seemed to take an opposite direction, apparently towards the point whence we had seen the prisoners disembarked in the morning. At length, when almost tempted to regret we had not pushed boldly on, in conformity with our first intention, we heard the shrill cries of a woman; and, not long afterwards, the sounds of human feet rushing down the slope. What our sensations were, you may imagine; for we all believed it to be either Clara or Madeline de Haldimar fleeing alone, and pursued by our ferocious enemies. To show ourselves would, we were sensible, be to ensure the death of the pursued, before we could possibly come up; and, although it was with difficulty we repressed the desire to rush forward to the rescue, our better judgment prevailed. Finally we saw you approach, followed closely by what appeared to be a mere boy of an Indian, and, at a considerable distance, by the tall warrior of the Fleur de lis. We imagined there was time enough for you to gain the bridge; and finding your more formidable pursuer was only accompanied by the youth already alluded to, conceived at that moment the design of making him our prisoner. Still there were half a dozen muskets ready to be levelled on him should he approach too near to his fugitives, or manifest any other design than that of simply recapturing them. How well our plan succeeded you are aware; but, alas!" and he glanced sorrowfully at the corpse, "why was our success to be embittered by so great a sacrifice?"

"Ah, would to heaven that he at least had been spared," sighed Sir Everard, as he took the wan white hand of his friend in his own; "and yet I know not: he looks so calm, so happy in death, it is almost selfish to repine he has escaped the horrors that still await us in this dreadful warfare. But what of Frederick and Madeline de Haldimar? From the statement you have given, they must have been liberated by the young Ottawa before he came to me; yet, what could have induced them to have taken a course of flight so opposite to that which promised their only chance of safety?"

"Heaven only knows," returned Captain Blessington. "I fear they have again been recaptured by the savages; in which case their doom is scarcely doubtful; unless, indeed, our prisoner of last night be given up in exchange for them."

"Then will their liberty be purchased at a terrible price," remarked the baronet. "Will you believe, Blessington, that that man, whose enmity to our colonel seems almost devilish, was once an officer in this very regiment?"

"You astonish me, Valletort. Impossible! and yet it has always been apparent to me they were once associates."

"I heard him relate his history only last night to Clara, whom he had the audacity to sully with proposals to become his bride," pursued the baronet. "His tale was a most extraordinary one. He narrated it, however, only up to the period when the life of De Haldimar was attempted by him at Quebec. But with his subsequent history we are all acquainted, through the fame of his bloody atrocities in all the posts that have fallen into the hands of Pontiac. That man, savage and even fiendish as he now is, was once possessed of the noblest qualities. I am sorry to say it; but Colonel de Haldimar has brought this present affliction upon himself. At some future period I will tell you all."

"Alas!" said Captain Blessington, "poor Charles, then, has been made to pay the penalty of his father's errors; and, certainly, the greatest of these was his dooming the unfortunate Halloway to death in the manner he did."

"What think you of the fact of Halloway being the nephew of this extraordinary man, and both of high family?" demanded Sir Everard.

"Indeed! and was the latter, then, aware of the connection?"

"Not until last night," replied Sir Everard. "Some observations made by the wretched wife of Halloway, in the course of which she named his true name, (which was that of the warrior also,) first indicated the fact to the latter. But, what became of that unfortunate creature?—was she brought in?"

"I understand not," said Captain Blessington. "In the confusion and hurry of securing our prisoner, and the apprehension of immediate attack from his warriors, Ellen was entirely overlooked. Some of my men say they left her lying, insensible, on the spot whence they had raised the body of our unfortunate friend, which they had some difficulty in releasing from her convulsive embrace. But, hark! there is the first drum for parade, and I have not yet exchanged my Indian garb."

Captain Blessington now quitted the room, and Sir Everard, relieved from the restraining presence of his companions, gave free vent to his emotion, throwing himself upon the body of his friend, and giving utterance to the feelings of anguish that oppressed his heart.

He had continued some minutes in this position, when he fancied he felt the warm tears of a human being bedewing a hand that reposed on the neck of his unfortunate friend. He looked up, and, to his infinite surprise, beheld Clara de Haldimar standing before him at the opposite side of the bed. Her likeness to her brother, at that moment, was so striking, that, for a second or two, the irrepressible thought passed through the mind of the officer, it was not a living being he gazed upon, but the immaterial spirit of his friend. The whole attitude and appearance of the wretched girl, independently of the fact of her noiseless entrance, tended to favour the delusion. Her features, of an ashy paleness, seemed fixed, even as those of the corpse beneath him; and, but for the tears that coursed silently down her cheek, there was scarcely an outward evidence of emotion.

"You are surprised to see me here, mingling my grief with yours, Sir Everard," she at length observed, with the same calm mien, and in tones of touching sweetness. "I came, with my father's permission, to take a last farewell of him whose death has broken my heart. I expected to be alone; but—Nay, do not go," she added, perceiving that the officer was about to depart. "Had you not been here, I should have sent for you; for we have both a sacred duty to perform. May I not ask your hand?"

Dismayed at her collected manner, the young officer gazed at her with the deepest sorrow depicted in every line of his own countenance. He extended his hand, and Clara, to his surprise, grasped and pressed it firmly.

"It was the wish of this poor boy that his Clara should be the wife of his friend, Sir Everard. Did he ever express such to you?"

"It was the fondest desire of his heart," returned the baronet, unable to restrain the emotion of joy that mingled, despite of himself, with his worst apprehensions.

"I need not ask how you received his proposal," continued Clara, with the same calmness of manner. "Last night," she pursued solemnly, "I was the bride of the murderer of my brother, of the lover of my mother,—to-morrow night I may be the bride of death; but to-night I am the bride of my brother's friend. Yes, here am I come to pledge myself to the fulfilment of his wish. If you deem a heart-broken girl not unworthy of you, I am your wife, Sir Everard; and, recollect, it is a solemn pledge, that which a sister gives over the lifeless body of a brother, beloved as this has been."

"Oh, Clara—dearest Clara," passionately exclaimed the excited young man, "if a life devoted to your happiness can repay you for this, count upon it as you would upon your eternal salvation. In you will I love both my friend and the sister he has bequeathed to me. Clara, my betrothed wife, summon all the energies of your nature to sustain this cruel shock; and exert yourself for him who will be to you both a brother and a husband."

As he spoke he drew the unresisting girl towards him, and, locking her in his embrace, pressed, for the first time, the lips, which it had maddened him the preceding night to see polluted by the forcible kisses of Wacosta. But Clara shared not, but merely suffered his momentary happiness. Her cheek wore not the crimson of excitement, neither were her tears discontinued. She seemed as one who mechanically submitted to what she had no power of resistance to oppose; and even in the embrace of her affianced husband, she exhibited the same death-like calm that had startled him at her first appearance. Religion could not hallow a purer feeling than that which had impelled the action of the young officer. The very consciousness of the sacred pledge having been exchanged over the corpse of his friend, imparted a holiness of fervour to his mind; and even while he pressed her, whom he secretly swore to love with all the affection of a fond brother and a husband united, he felt that if the spirit of him, who slept unconscious of the scene, were suffered to linger near, it would be to hallow it with approval.

"And now," said Clara at length, yet without attempting to disengage herself,— "now that we are united, I would be alone with my brother. My husband, leave me."

Deeply touched at the name of husband, Sir Everard could not refrain from imprinting another kiss on the lips that uttered it. He then gently disengaged himself from his lovely but suffering charge, whom he deposited with her head resting on the bed; and making a significant motion of his hand to the woman, who, as well as old Morrison, had been spectators of the whole scene, stole gently from the apartment, under what mingled emotions of joy and grief it would be difficult to describe.

CHAPTER XXXV.

It was the eighth hour of morning, and both officers and men, quitting their ill-relished meal, were to be seen issuing to the parade, where the monotonous roll of the assemblée now summoned them. Presently the garrison was formed, presenting three equal sides of a square. The vacant space fronted the guard house, near one extremity of which was to be seen a flight of steps communicating with the rampart, where the flag-staff was erected. Several men were employed at this staff, passing strong ropes through iron pulleys that were suspended from the extreme top, while in the basement of the staff itself, to a height of about twenty feet, were stuck at intervals strong wooden pegs, serving as steps to the artillerymen for greater facility in clearing, when foul, the lines to which the colours were attached. The latter had been removed; and, from the substitution of a cord considerably stronger than that which usually appeared there, it seemed as if some far heavier weight was about to be appended to it. Gradually the men, having completed their unusual preparations, quitted the rampart, and the flag-staff which was of tapering pine, was left totally unguarded.

The "Attention!" of Major Blackwater to the troops, who had been hitherto standing in attitudes of expectancy that rendered the injunction almost superfluous, announced the approach of the governor. Soon afterward that officer entered the area, wearing his characteristic dignity of manner, yet exhibiting every evidence of one who had suffered deeply. Preparation for a drum-head court-martial, as in the first case of Halloway, had already been made within the square, and the only actor wanting in the drama was he who was to be tried.

Once Colonel de Haldimar made an effort to command his appearance, but the huskiness of his voice choked his utterance, and he was compelled to pause. After the lapse of a few moments, he again ordered, but in a voice that was remarked to falter,—

"Mr. Lawson, let the prisoner be brought forth."

The feeling of suspense that ensued between the delivery and execution of this command was painful throughout the ranks. All were penetrated with curiosity to behold a man who had several times appeared to them under the most appalling circumstances, and against whom the strongest feeling of indignation had been excited for his barbarous murder of Charles de Haldimar. It was with mingled awe and anger they now awaited his approach. At length the captive was seen advancing from the cell in which he had been confined, his gigantic form towering far above those of the guard of grenadiers by whom he was surrounded; and with a haughtiness in his air, and insolence in his manner, that told he came to confront his enemy with a spirit unsubdued by the fate that too probably awaited him.

Many an eye was turned upon the governor at that moment. He was evidently struggling for composure to meet the scene he felt it to be impossible to avoid; and he turned pale and paler as his enemy drew near.

At length the prisoner stood nearly in the same spot where his unfortunate nephew had lingered on a former occasion. He was unchained; but his hands were firmly secured behind his back. He threw himself into an attitude of carelessness, resting on one foot, and tapping the earth with the other; riveting his eye, at the same time, with an expression of the most daring insolence, on the governor, while his swarthy cheek was moreover lighted up with a smile of the deepest scorn.

"You are Reginald Morton the outlaw, I believe," at length observed the governor in an uncertain tone, that, however, acquired greater firmness as he proceeded,— "one whose life has already been forfeited through his treasonable practices in Europe, and who has, moreover, incurred the penalty of an ignominious death, by acting in this country as a spy of the enemies of England. What say you, Reginald Morton, that you should not be convicted in the death that awaits the traitor?"

"Ha! ha! by heaven, such cold, pompous insolence amuses me," vociferated Wacosta. "It reminds me of Ensign de Haldimar of nearly five and twenty years back, who was then as cunning a dissembler as he is now." Suddenly changing his ribald tone to one of scorn and rage:—"You believe me, you say, to be Reginald Morton, the outlaw. Well do you know it. I am that Sir Reginald Morton, who became an outlaw, not through his own crimes, but through your villany. As you may, I heed it not. You may award me death, but shall not chain my tongue. To your whole regiment do I proclaim you for a false, remorseless villain." Then turning his flashing eye along the ranks—

"I was once an officer in this corps, and long before any of you wore the accursed uniform. That man, the fiend, affected to be my friend; and under the guise of friendship, stole into the heart I loved better than my own life. Yes," fervently pursued the excited prisoner, stamping violently with his foot upon the earth, "he robbed me of my affianced wife; and for that I resented an outrage that should have banished him to some lone region, where he might never again pollute human nature with his presence—he caused me to be tried by a court martial, and dismissed the service. Then, indeed, I became the outlaw he has described, but not until then. Now, Colonel de Haldimar, that I have proclaimed your infamy, poor and inefficient as the triumph be, do your worst—I ask no mercy. Yesterday I thought that years of toilsome pursuit of the means of vengeance were about to be crowned with success; but fate has turned the tables on me, and I yield."

To all but the baronet and Captain Blessington this declaration was productive of the utmost surprise. Every eye was turned upon the colonel. He grew impatient under the scrutiny, and demanded if the court, who meanwhile had been deliberating, satisfied of the guilt of the prisoner, had come to a decision in regard to his punishment. An affirmative answer was given, and Colonel de Haldimar proceeded.

Reginald Morton, with the private misfortunes of your former life we have nothing to do. It is the decision of this court, who are merely met out of form, that you suffer immediate death by hanging, as a just recompense for your double treason to your country. "There," and he pointed to the flag staff, "will you be exhibited to the misguided people whom your wicked artifices have stirred up into hostility against us. When they behold your fate, they will take warning from your example; and, finding we have heads and arms not to suffer offence with impunity, be more readily brought to obedience."

"I understand your allusion," coolly rejoined Wacosta, glancing earnestly at, and apparently measuring with his eye, the dimensions of the conspicuous scaffold on which he was to suffer. "You had ever a calculating head, De Haldimar, where any secret villany, any thing to promote your own selfish ends, was to be gained by it; but your calculation seems now, methinks, at fault."

Colonel de Haldimar looked at him enquiringly. "You have still a son left," pursued the prisoner with the same recklessness of manner, and in a tone denoting allusion to him who was no more, that caused an universal shudder throughout the ranks. "He is in the hands of the Ottawa Indians, and I am the friend of their great chief, inferior only in power among the tribe to himself. Think you that he will see me hanged up like a dog, and fail to avenge my disgraceful death?"

"Ha! presumptuous renegade, is this the deep game you have in view? Hope you then to stipulate for the preservation of a life every way forfeited to the offended justice of your country? Dare you to cherish the belief, that, after the horrible threats so often denounced by you, you will again be let loose upon a career of crime and blood?"

"None of your cant, De Haldimar, as I once observed to you before," coolly retorted Wacosta, with bitter sarcasm. "Consult your own heart, and ask if its catalogue of crime be not far greater than my own: yet I ask not my life. I would but have the manner of my fate altered, and fain would die the death of the soldier I was before you rendered me the wretch I am. Methinks the boon is not so great, if the restoration of your son be the price."

"Do you mean, then," eagerly returned the governor, "that if the mere mode of your death be changed, my son shall be restored?"

"I do," was the calm reply.

"What pledge have we of the fact? What faith can we repose in the word of a fiend, whose brutal vengeance has already sacrificed the gentlest life that ever animated human clay?" Here the emotion of the governor almost choked his utterance, and considerable agitation and murmuring were manifested in the ranks.

"Gentle, said you?" replied the prisoner, musingly; "then did he resemble his mother, whom I loved, even as his brother resembles you whom I have so much reason to hate. Had I known the boy to be what you describe, I might have felt some touch of pity even while I delayed not to strike his death blow; but the false moonlight deceived me, and the detested name of De Haldimar, pronounced by the lips of my nephew's wife—that wife whom your cold blooded severity had widowed and driven mad—was in itself sufficient to ensure his doom."

"Inhuman ruffian!" exclaimed the governor, with increasing indignation; "to the point. What pledge have you to offer that my son will be restored?"

"Nay, the pledge is easily given, and without much trick. You have only to defer my death until your messenger return from his interview with Pontac. If Captain de Haldimar accompany him back, shoot me as I have requested; if he come not, then it is but to hang me after all."

"Ha! I understand you; this is but a pretext to gain time, a device to enable your subtle brain to plan some mode of escape."

"As you will, Colonel de Haldimar," calmly retorted Wacosta; and again he sank into silence, with the air of one utterly indifferent to results.

"Do you mean," resumed the colonel, "that a request from yourself to the Ottawa chief will obtain the liberation of my son?"

"Unless the Indian be false as yourself, I do."

"And of the lady who is with him?" continued the colonel, colouring with anger.

"Of both."

"How is the message to be conveyed?"

"Ha, sir!" returned the prisoner, drawing himself up to his full height, "now are you arrived at a point that is pertinent. My wampum belt will be the passport, and the safeguard of him you send; then for the communication. There are certain figures, as you are aware, that, traced on bark, answer the same purpose among the Indians with the European language of letters. Let my hands be cast loose," he pursued, but in a tone in which agitation and excitement might be detected, "and if bark be brought me, and a burnt stick or coal, I will give you not only a sample of Indian ingenuity, but a specimen of my own progress in Indian acquirements."

"What, free your hands, and thus afford you a chance of escape?" observed the governor, doubtingly.

Wacosta bent his steadfast gaze on him for a few moments as if he questioned he had heard aright. Then bursting into a wild and scornful laugh,—"By heaven!" he exclaimed, "This is, indeed, a high compliment you pay me at the expense of these fine fellows. What, Colonel de Haldimar afraid to liberate an unarmed prisoner, hemmed in by a forest of bayonets? 'This is good; gentlemen,' and he bent himself in sarcastic reverence to the astonished troops, 'I beg to offer my very best congratulations on the high estimation in which you are held by your colonel.'"

"Peace, sirrah!" exclaimed the governor, enraged beyond measure at the insolence of him who thus held him up to contempt before his men, "or, by heaven, I will have your tongue cut out!—Mr. Lawton, let what this fellow requires be procured immediately." Then addressing Lieutenant Boyce, who commanded the immediate guard over the prisoner,—"Let his hands be liberated, sir, and enjoin your men to be watchful of the movements of this supple traitor. His activity I know of old to be great, and he seems to have doubled it since he assumed that garb."

The command was executed, and the prisoner stood, once more, free and unfettered in every muscular limb. A deep and unbroken silence ensued; and the return of the adjutant was momentarily expected. Suddenly a loud scream was heard, and the slight figure of a female, clad in white, came rushing from the piazza in which the apartment of the deceased De Haldimar was situated. It was Clara. The guard of Wacosta formed the fourth front of the square; but they were drawn up somewhat in the distance, so as to leave an open space of several feet at the angles. Through one of these the excited girl now passed into the area, with a wildness in her air and appearance that riveted every eye in painful interest upon her. She paused not until she had gained the side of the captive, at whose feet she now sank in an attitude expressive of the most profound despair.

"Tiger!—monster!" she raved, "restore my brother!—give me back the gentle life you have taken, or destroy my own! See, I am a weak defenceless girl: can you not strike!—you who have no pity for the innocent. But come," she pursued mournfully, regaining her feet and grasping his iron hand,—"come and see the sweet calm face of him you have slain!—come with me, and behold the image of Clara Beverley; and, if you ever loved her as you say you did, let your soul be touched with remorse for your crime."

The excitement and confusion produced by this unexpected interruption was great. Murmurs of compassion for the unhappy Clara, and of indignation against the prisoner, were no longer sought to be repressed by the men; while the officers, quitting their places in the ranks, grouped themselves indiscriminately in the foreground. One, more impatient than his companions, sprang forward, and forcibly drew away the delicate hand that still grasped that of the captive. It was Sir Everard Valletort.

"Clara, my beloved wife!" he exclaimed, to the astonishment of all who heard him, "pollute not your lips by further communion with such a wretch; his heart is as inaccessible to pity as the rugged rocks on which his spring-life was passed. For Heaven's sake,—for my sake,—linger not within his reach. There is death in his very presence."

"Your wife, sir!" haughtily observed the governor, with irrepressible astonishment and indignation in his voice; "what mean you?—Gentlemen, resume your places in the ranks. Clara—Miss de Haldimar, I command you to retire instantly to your apartment. We will discourse of this later, Sir Everard Valletort. I trust you have not dared to offer an indignity to my child."

While he was yet turned to that officer, who had taken his post, as commanded, in the inner angle of the square, and with a countenance that denoted the conflicting emotions of his soul, he was suddenly startled by the confused shout and rushing forward of the whole body, both of officers and men. Before he had time to turn, a loud and well-remembered yell burst upon his ear. The next moment, to his infinite surprise and horror, he beheld the bold warrior rapidly ascending the very staff that had been destined for his scaffold, and with Clara in his arms!

Great was the confusion that ensued. To rush forward and surround the flag-staff, was the immediate action of the troops. Many of the men raised their muskets, and in the excitement of the moment, would have fired, had they not been restrained by their officers, who pointed out the certain destruction it would entail on the unfortunate Clara. With the rapidity of thought, Wacosta had snatched up his victim, while the attention of the troops was directed to the singular conversation passing between the governor and Sir Everard Valletort, and darting through one of the open angles already alluded to, had gained the rampart before they had recovered from the stupor produced by his daring action. Stepping lightly upon the pegs, he had rapidly ascended to the utmost height of these, before any one thought of following him; and then grasping in his teeth the cord which was to have served for his execution, and holding Clara firmly against his chest, while he embraced the smooth staff with knees and feet closely compressed around it, accomplished the difficult ascent with an ease that astonished all who beheld him. Gradually, as he approached the top, the tapering pine waved to and fro; and at each moment it was expected, that, yielding to their united weight, it would snap asunder, and precipitate both Clara and himself, either upon the rampart, or into the ditch beyond.

More than one officer now attempted to follow the fugitive in his adventurous course; but, even Lieutenant Johnstone, the most active and experienced in climbing of the party, was unable to rise more than a few yards above the pegs that afforded a footing, and the enterprise was abandoned as an impossibility. At length Wacosta was seen to gain the extreme summit. For a moment he turned his gaze anxiously beyond the town, in the direction of the bridge; and, after peeling forth one of his terrific yells, exclaimed, exultingly, as he turned his eye upon his enemy:—

"Well, colonel, what think you of this sample of Indian ingenuity? Did I not tell you," he continued, in mockery, "that, if my hands were but free, I would give you a specimen of my progress in Indian acquirements?"

"If you would avoid a death even more terrible than that of hanging," shouted the governor, in a voice of mingled rage and terror, "restore my daughter."

"Ha! ha! ha!—excellent!" vociferated the savage.

"You threaten largely, my good governor; but your threats are harmless as those of a weak besieging army before an impregnable fortress. It is for the strongest, however, to propose his terms. If I restore this girl to life, will you pledge yourself to mine?"

"Now!" thundered Colonel de Haldimar, with unusual energy. "Men, procure axes; cut the flag-staff down, since this is the only means left of securing yon insolent traitor! Quick to your work: and mark, who first seizes him shall have promotion on the spot."

Axes were instantly procured, and two of the men now lent themselves vigorously to the task. Wacosta seemed to watch these preparations with evident anxiety; and to all it appeared as if his courage had been paralysed by this unexpected action. No sooner, however, had the axemen reached the heart of the staff, than, holding Clara forth over the edge of the rampart, he shouted,—

"One stroke more, and she perishes!"

Instantaneously the work was discontinued. A silence of a few moments ensued. Every eye was turned upward,—every heart beat with terror to see the delicate girl, held by a single arm, and apparently about to be precipitated from that dizzying height. Again Wacosta shouted,—

"Life for life, De Haldimar! If I yield her shall I live?"

"No terms shall be dictated to me by a rebel, in the heart of my own fort," returned the governor. "Restore my child, and we will then consider what mercy may be extended to you."

"Well do I know what mercy dwells in such a heart as yours," gloomily remarked the prisoner; "but I come."

"Surround the staff, men," ordered the governor, in a low tone. "The instant he descends, secure him: lash him in every limb, nor suffer even his insolent tongue to be longer at liberty."

"Boyce, for God's sake open the gate, and place men in readiness to lower the drawbridge," implored Sir Everard of the officer of the guard, and in a tone of deep emotion that was not meant to be overheard by the governor. "I fear the boldness of this vengeful man may lead him to some desperate means of escape."

While the officer whom he addressed issued a command, the responsibility of which he fancied he might, under the peculiar circumstances of the moment, take upon himself, Wacosta began his descent, not as before, by adhering to the staff, but by the rope which he held in his left hand, while he still supported the apparently senseless Clara against his right chest with the other.

"Now, Colonel de Haldimar, I hope your heart is at rest," he shouted, as he rapidly glided by the cord; "enjoy your triumph as best may suit your pleasure."

Every eye followed his movement with interest; every heart beat lighter at the certainty of Clara being again restored, and without other injury than the terror she must have experienced in such a scene. Each congratulated himself on the favourable termination of the terrible adventure, yet were all ready to spring upon and secure the desperate author of the wrong. Wacosta had now reached the centre of the flag-staff. Pausing for a moment, he grappled it with his strong and nervous feet, on which he apparently rested, to give a momentary relief to the muscles of his left arm. He then abruptly abandoned his hold, swinging himself out a few yards from the staff, and returning again, dashed his feet against it with a force that caused the weakened mass to vibrate to its very foundation. Impelled by his weight, and the violence of his action, the creaking pine gave way; its lofty top gradually bending over the exterior rampart until it finally snapped asunder, and fell with a loud crash across the ditch.

"Open the gate, down with the drawbridge!" exclaimed the excited governor.

"Down with the drawbridge," repeated Sir Everard to the men already stationed there ready to let loose at the first order. The heavy chains rattled sullenly through the rusty pulleys, and to each the bridge seemed an hour descending. Before it had reached its level, it was covered with the weight of many armed men rushing confusedly to the front; and the foremost of these leaped to the earth before it had sunk into its customary bed. Sir Everard Valletort and Lieutenant Johnstone were in the front, both armed with their rifles, which had been brought them before Wacosta commenced his descent. Without order or combination, Erskine, Blessington, and nearly half of their respective companies, followed as they could; and dispersing as they advanced, sought only which could outstrip his fellows in the pursuit.

Meanwhile the fugitive, assisted in his fall by the gradual rending asunder of the staff, had obeyed the impulsion first given to his active form, until, suddenly checking himself by the rope, he dropped with his feet downward into the centre of the ditch. For a moment he disappeared, then came again uninjured to the surface; and in the face of more than fifty men, who, lining the rampart with their muskets levelled to take him at advantage the instant he should reappear, seemed to laugh their efforts to scorn. Holding Clara before him as a shield, through which the bullets of his enemies must pass before they could attain him, he impelled his gigantic form with a backward movement towards the opposite bank, which he rapidly ascended; and, still fronting his enemies, commenced his flight in that manner with a speed which (considering the additional weight of the drenched garments of both) was inconceivable. The course taken by him was not through the town, but circuitously across the common until he arrived on that immediate line whence, as we have before stated, the bridge was distinctly visible from the rampart; on which, nearly the whole of the remaining troops, in defiance of the presence of their austere chief, were now eagerly assembled, watching, with unspeakable interest, the progress of the chase.

Desperate as were the exertions of Wacosta, who evidently continued this mode of flight from a conviction that the instant his person was left exposed the fire-arms of his pursuers would be brought to bear upon him, the two officers in front, animated by the most extraordinary exertions, were rapidly gaining upon him. Already was one within fifty yards of him, when a loud yell was heard from the bridge. This was fiercely answered by the fleeing man, and in a manner that implied his glad sense of coming rescue. In the wild exultation of the moment, he raised Clara high above his head, to show her in triumph to the governor, whose person his keen eye could easily distinguish among those crowded upon the rampart. In the gratified vengeance of that hour, he seemed utterly to overlook the actions of those who were so near him. During this brief scene, Sir Everard had dropped upon one knee, and supporting his elbow on the other, aimed his rifle at the heart of the ravisher of his wife. An exulting shout burst from the pursuing troops. Wacosta bounded a few feet in air, and placing his hand to his side, uttered another yell, more appalling than any that had hitherto escaped him. His flight was now uncertain and wavering. He staggered as one who had received a mortal wound; and discontinuing his unequal mode of retreat, turned his back upon his pursuers, and threw all his remaining energies into a final effort at escape.

Inspired by the success of his shot, and expecting momentarily to see him fall weakened with the loss of blood, the excited Valletort redoubled his exertions. To his infinite joy, he found that the efforts of the fugitive became feebler at each moment. Johnstone was about twenty paces behind him, and the pursuing party at about the same distance from Johnstone. The baronet had now reached his enemy, and already was the butt of his rifle raised with both hands with murderous intent when suddenly Wacosta, every feature distorted with rage and pain, turned like a wounded lion at bay, and eluding the blow, deposited the unconscious form of his victim upon the sward. Springing upon his infinitely weaker pursuer, he grappled him furiously by the throat, exclaiming through his clenched teeth:—

"Nay then, since you will provoke your fate—be it so. Die like a dog, and be damned, for having balked me of my just revenge!"

As he spoke, he hurled the gasping officer to the earth with a violence that betrayed the dreadful excitement of his soul, and again hastened to assure himself of his prize.

Meanwhile, Lieutenant Johnstone had come up, and seeing his companion struggling, as he presumed with advantage, with his severely wounded enemy, made it his first care to secure the unhappy girl; for whose recovery the pursuit had been principally instituted. Quitting his rifle, he now essayed to raise her in his arms. She was without life or consciousness, and the impression on his mind was that she was dead.

While in the act of raising her, the terrible Wacosta stood at his side, his vast chest heaving forth a laugh of mingled rage and contempt. Before the officer could extricate, with a view of defending himself, his arms were pinioned as though in a vice; and ere he could recover from his surprise, he felt himself lifted up and thrown to a considerable distance. When he opened his eyes a moment afterwards, he was lying amid the moving feet of his own men.

From the instant of the closing of the unfortunate Valletort with his enemy, the Indians, hastening to the assistance of their chief, had come up, and a desultory fire had already commenced, diverting, in a great degree, the attention of the troops from the pursued. Emboldened by this new aspect of things, Wacosta now deliberately grasped the rifle that had been abandoned by Johnstone; and raising it to his shoulder, fired among the group collected on the ramparts. For a moment he watched the result of his shot, and then, peeling forth another fierce yell, he hurled the now useless weapon into the very heart of his pursuers; and again raising Clara in his arms, once more commenced his retreat, which, under cover of the fire of his party, was easily effected.

"Who has fallen?" demanded the governor of his adjutant, perceiving that some one had been hit at his side, yet without taking his eyes off his terrible enemy.

"Mr. Delme, sir," was the reply. "He has been shot through the heart, and his men are bearing him from the rampart."

"This must not be," resumed the governor with energy. "Private feelings must no longer be studied at the expense of the public good. That pursuit is hopeless; and already too many of my officers have fallen. Desire the retreat to be sounded, Mr. Lawson. Captain Wentworth, let one or two covering guns be brought to bear upon the savages. They are gradually increasing in numbers; and if we delay, the party will be wholly cut off."

In issuing these orders, Colonel de Haldimar evinced a composure that astonished all who heard him. But although his voice was calm, despair was upon his brow. Still he continued to gaze fixedly on the retreating form of his enemy, until he finally disappeared behind the orchard of the Canadian of the Fleur de lis.

Obedying the summons from the fort, the troops without now commenced their retreat, bearing off the bodies of their fallen officers and several of their comrades who had fallen by the Indian fire. There was a show of harassing them on their return; but they were too near the fort to apprehend much danger. Two or three well-directed discharges of artillery effectually checked the onward progress of the savages; and, in the course of a minute, they had again wholly disappeared.

In gloomy silence, and with anger and disappointment in their hearts, the detachment now re-entered the fort. Johnstone was only severely bruised; Sir Everard Valletort not dead. Both were conveyed to the same room, where they were instantly attended by the surgeon, who pronounced the situation of the latter hopeless.

Major Blackwater, Captains Blessington and Erskine, Lieutenants Leslie and Boyce, and Ensigns Fortescue and Summers, were now the only regimental officers that remained of thirteen originally comprising the strength of the garrison. The whole of these stood grouped around their colonel, who seemed transfixed to the spot he had first occupied on the rampart, with his arms folded, and his gaze bent in the direction in which he had lost sight of Wacosta and his child.

Hitherto the morning had been cold and cheerless, and objects in the far distance were but indistinctly seen through a humid atmosphere. At about half an hour before mid-day the air became more rarified, and, the murky clouds gradually disappearing, left the blue autumnal sky without spot or blemish. Presently, as the bells of the fort struck twelve, a yell as of a legion of devils rent the air; and, riveting their gaze in that direction, all beheld the bridge, hitherto deserted, suddenly covered with a multitude of savages, among whom were several individuals attired in the European garb, and evidently prisoners. Each officer had a telescope raised to his eye, and each prepared himself, shudderingly, for some horrid consummation. Presently the bridge was cleared of all but a double line of what appeared to be women, armed with war-clubs and tomahawks. Along the line were now seen to pass, in slow succession, the prisoners that had previously been observed. At each step they took (and it was evident they had been compelled to run the gauntlet), a blow was inflicted by some one or other of the line, until the wretched victims were successively despatched. A loud yell from the warriors, who, although hidden from view by the intervening orchards, were evidently merely spectators in the bloody drama, announced each death. These yells were repeated, at intervals, to about the number of thirty, when, suddenly, the bridge was again deserted as before.

After the lapse of a minute, the tall figure of a warrior was seen to advance, holding a female in his arms. No one could mistake, even at that distance, the gigantic proportions of Wacosta, as he stood in the extreme centre of the bridge, in imposing relief against the flood that glittered like a sea of glass beyond. From his chest there now burst a single yell; but, although audible, it was fainter than any remembered ever to have been heard from him by the garrison. He then advanced to the extreme edge of the bridge; and, raising the form of the female far above his head with his left hand, seemed to wave her in vengeful triumph. A second warrior was seen upon the bridge, and stealing cautiously to the same point. The right hand of the first warrior was now raised and brandished in air; in the next instant it descended upon the breast of the female, who fell from his arms into the ravine beneath. Yells of triumph from the Indians, and shouts of execration from the soldiers, mingled faintly together. At that moment the arm of the second warrior was raised, and a blade was seen to glitter in the sunshine. His arm descended, and Wacosta was observed to stagger forward and fall heavily into the abyss into which his victim had the instant before been precipitated. Another loud yell, but of disappointment and anger, was heard drowning that of exultation pealed by the triumphant warrior, who, darting to the open extremitly of the bridge, directed his flight along the margin of the river, where a light canoe was ready to receive him. Into this he sprang, and, seizing the paddle, sent the waters foaming from its sides; and, pursuing his way across the river, had nearly gained the shores of Canada before a bark was to be seen following in pursuit.

How felt—how acted Colonel de Haldimar throughout this brief but terrible scene? He uttered not a word. With his arms still folded across his breast, he gazed upon the murder of his child; but he heaved not a groan, he shed not a tear. A momentary triumph seemed to irradiate his pallid features, when he saw the blow struck that annihilated his enemy; but it was again instantly shaded by an expression of the most profound despair.

"It is done, gentlemen," he at length remarked. "The tragedy is closed, the curse of Ellen Halloway is fulfilled, and I am—childless!—Blackwater," he pursued, endeavouring to stifle the emotion produced by the last reflection, "pay every attention to the security of the garrison, see that the drawbridge is again properly chained up, and direct that the duties of the troops be prosecuted in every way as heretofore."

Leaving his officers to wonder at and pity that apathy of mind that could mingle the mere forms of duty with the most heart-rending associations, Colonel de Haldimar now quitted the rampart; and, with a head that was remarked for the first time to droop over his chest, paced his way musingly to his apartments.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Night had long since drawn her circling mantle over the western hemisphere; and deeper, far deeper than the gloom of that night was the despair which filled every bosom of the devoted garrison, whose fortunes it has fallen to our lot to record. A silence, profound as that of death, pervaded the ramparts and exterior defences of the fortress, interrupted only, at long intervals, by the customary "All's well!" of the several sentinels; which, after the awful events of the day, seemed to many who now heard it as if uttered in mockery of their hopelessness of sorrow. The lights within the barracks of the men had been long since extinguished; and, consigned to a mere repose of limb, in which the eye and heart shared not, the inferior soldiery pressed their rude couches with spirits worn out by a succession of painful excitements, and frames debilitated by much abstinence and watching. It was an hour at which sleep was wont to afford them the blessing of a temporary forgetfulness of endurance that weighed the more heavily as they were believed to be endless and without fruit; but sleep had now apparently been banished from all; for the low and confused murmur that met the ear from the several block-houses was continuous and general, betraying at times, and in a louder key, words that bore reference to the tragic occurrences of the day.

The only lights visible in the fort proceeded from the guard-house and a room adjoining that of the ill-fated Charles de Haldimar. Within the latter were collected, with the exception of the governor, and grouped around a bed on which lay one of their companions in a nearly expiring state, the officers of the garrison, reduced nearly one third in number since we first offered them to the notice of our readers. The dying man was Sir Everard Valletort, who, supported by pillows, was concluding a narrative that had chained the earnest attention of his auditory, even amid the deep and heartfelt sympathy perceptible in each for the forlorn and hopeless condition of the narrator. At the side of the unhappy baronet, and enveloped in a dressing gown, as if recently out of bed, sat, reclining in a rude elbow chair, one whose pallid countenance denoted that, although far less seriously injured, he, too, had suffered severely:—it was Lieutenant Johnstone.

The narrative was at length closed; and the officer, exhausted by the effort he had made in his anxiety to communicate every particular to his attentive and surprised companions, had sunk back upon his pillow, when, suddenly, the loud and unusual "Who comes there?" of the sentinel stationed on the rampart above the gateway, arrested every ear. A moment of pause succeeded, when again was heard the "Stand, friend!" evidently given in reply to the familiar answer to the original challenge. Then were audible rapid movements in the guard-house, as of men aroused from temporary slumber, and hastening to the point whence the voice proceeded.

Silently yet hurriedly the officers now quitted the bedside of the dying man, leaving only the surgeon and the invalid Johnstone behind them; and, flying to the rampart, stood in the next minute confounded with the guard, who were already grouped round the challenging sentinel, bending their gaze eagerly in the direction of the road.

"What now, man?—whom have you challenged?" asked Major Blackwater.

"It is I—De Haldimar," hoarsely exclaimed one of four dark figures that, hitherto unnoticed by the officers, stood immediately beyond the ditch, with a burden deposited at their feet. "Quick, Blackwater, let us in for God's sake! Each succeeding minute may bring a scouting party on our track. Lower the drawbridge!"

"Impossible!" exclaimed the major: "after all that has passed, it is more than my commission is worth to lower the bridge without permission. Mr. Lawson, quick to the governor, and report that Captain de Haldimar is here: with whom shall he say?" again addressing the impatient and almost indignant officer.

"With Miss de Haldimar, François the Canadian, and one to whom we all owe our lives," hurriedly returned the officer; "and you may add," he continued gloomily, "the corpse of my sister. But while we stand in parley here, we are lost: Lawson fly to my father, and tell him we wait for entrance."

With nearly the speed enjoined the adjutant departed. Scarcely a minute elapsed when he again stood upon the rampart, and advancing closely to the major, whispered a few words in his ear.

"Good God! can it be possible? When? How came this? but we will enquire later. Open the gate; down with the bridge, Leslie," addressing the officer of the guard.

The command was instantly obeyed. The officers flew to receive the fugitives; and as the latter crossed the drawbridge, the light of a lantern, that had been brought from the guard-room, flashed full upon the harassed countenances of Captain and Miss de Haldimar, François the Canadian, and the devoted Oucanasta.

Silent and melancholy was the greeting that took place between the parties: the voice spoke not; the hand alone was eloquent; but it was in the eloquence of sorrow only that it indulged. Pleasure, even in this almost despaired of re-union, could not be expressed; and even the eye shrank from mutual encounter, as if its very glance at such a moment were sacrilege. Recalled to a sense of her situation by the preparation of the men to raise the bridge, the Indian woman was the first to break the silence.

"The Saganaw is safe within his fort, and the girl of the pale faces will lay her head upon his bosom," she remarked solemnly. "Oucanasta will go to her solitary wigwam among the red skins."

The heart of Madeline de Haldimar was oppressed by the weight of many griefs; yet she could not see the generous preserver of her life, and the rescuer of the body of her ill-fated cousin, depart without emotion. Drawing a ring of some value and great beauty, from her finger, which she had more than once observed the Indian to admire, she placed it on her hand; and then, throwing herself on the bosom of the faithful creature, embraced her with deep manifestations of affection, but without uttering a word.

Oucanasta was sensibly gratified: she raised her large eyes to heaven as if in thankfulness; and by the light of the lantern, which fell upon her dark but expressive countenance, tears were to be seen starting unbidden from their source.

Released from the embrace of her, whose life she had twice preserved at imminent peril to her own, the Indian again prepared to depart; but there was another, who, like Madeline, although stricken by many sorrows, could not forego the testimony of his heart's gratitude. Captain de Haldimar, who, during this short scene, had despatched a messenger to his room for the purpose, now advanced to the poor girl, bearing a short but elegantly mounted dagger, which he begged her to deliver as a token of his friendship to the young chief her brother. He then dropped on one knee at her feet, and raising her hand, pressed it fervently against his heart; an action which, even to the untutored mind of the Indian, bore evidence only of the feeling that prompted it. A heavy sigh escaped her labouring chest; and as the officer now rose and quitted her hand, she turned slowly and with dignity from him, and crossing the drawbridge, was in a few minutes lost in the surrounding gloom.

Our readers have, doubtless, anticipated the communication made to Major Blackwater by the Adjutant Lawson. Bowed down to the dust by the accomplishment of the curse of Ellen Halloway, the inflexibility of Colonel de Haldimar's pride was not proof against the utter annihilation wrought to his hopes as a father by the unrelenting hatred of the enemy his early falsehood and treachery had raised up to him. When the adjutant entered his apartment, the stony coldness of his cheek attested he had been dead some hours.

We pass over the few days of bitter trial that succeeded to the restoration of Captain de Haldimar and his bride to their friends; days, during which were consigned to the same grave the bodies of the governor, his lamented children, and the scarcely less regretted Sir Everard Valletort. The funeral service was attempted by Captain Blessington; but the strong affection of that excellent officer, for three of the defunct parties at least, was not armed against the trial. He had undertaken a task far beyond his strength; and scarcely had commenced, ere he was compelled to relinquish the performance of the ritual to the adjutant. A large grave had been dug close under the rampart, and near the fatal flag-staff, to receive the bodies of their deceased friends; and, as they were lowered successively into their last earthly resting place, tears fell unrestrainedly over the bronzed cheeks of the oldest soldiers, while many a female sob blended with and gave touching solemnity to the scene.

On the morning of the third day from this quadruple interment, notice was given by one of the sentinels that an Indian was approaching the fort, making signs as if in demand for a parley. The officers, headed by Major Blackwater, now become the commandant of the place, immediately ascended the rampart, when the stranger was at once recognised by Captain de Haldimar for the young Ottawa, the preserver of his life, and the avenger of the deaths of those they mourned, in whose girdle was thrust, in seeming pride, the richly mounted dagger that officer had caused to be conveyed to him through his no less generous sister. A long conference ensued, in the language of the Ottawas, between the parties just named, the purport of which was of high moment to the garrison, now nearly reduced to the last extremity. The young chief had come to apprise them, that, won by the noble conduct of the English, on a late occasion, when his warriors were wholly in their power, Pontecac had expressed a generous determination to conclude a peace with the garrison, and henceforth to consider them as his friends. This he had publicly declared in a large council of the chiefs, held the preceding night; and the motive of the Ottawa's coming was to assure the English, that, on this occasion, their great leader was perfectly sincere in a resolution, at which he had the more readily arrived, now that his terrible coadjutor and vindictive adviser was no more. He prepared them for the coming of Pontecac and the principal chiefs of the league to demand a council on the morrow; and, with this final communication, again withdrew.

The Ottawa was right. Within a week from that period the English were to be seen once more issuing from their fort; and, although many months elapsed before the wounds of their suffering hearts were healed, still were they grateful to Providence for their final preservation from a doom that had fallen, without exception, on every fortress on the line of frontier in which they lay.

Time rolled on; and, in the course of years, Oucanasta might be seen associating with and bearing curious presents, the fruits of Indian ingenuity, to the daughters of De Haldimar, now become the colonel of the — regiment; while her brother, the chief, instructed his sons in the athletic and active exercises peculiar to his race. As for poor Ellen Halloway, search had been made for her, but she never was heard of afterwards.

END OF WACOSTA.

REGARD FOR HOME.

In all my wand'rings round this world of care,
In all my griefs, and God has given my share—
I still had hopes, my latest hours to crown,
Amidst these humble bow'rs to lay me down;
To husband out life's taper at the close,
And keep the flame from wasting, by repose:
I still had hopes, for pride attends us still,
Amidst the swains to show my book-learned skill,
Around my fire an evening group to draw,
And tell of all I felt, and all I saw;
And, as a hare, whom hounds and horns pursue,
Pants to the place from whence at first he flew,
I still had hopes, my long vexations past,
Here to return, and die at home at last.

O, blest retirement, friend to life's decline,
Retreat from care that never must be mine!
How blest is he, who crowns, in shades like these,
A youth of labour with an age of ease;
Who quits a world where strong temptations try,
And, since 'tis hard to combat, learns to fly.

Narrative of a Journey

FROM

CALCUTTA TO EUROPE BY WAY OF EGYPT.

IN THE YEARS 1827 AND 1828.

BY MRS. CHARLES LUSHINGTON.

Introduction to the first American edition.

Two ladies claim the honour of being the first to perform the land journey between India and England; Mrs. Lushington from India, and Mrs. Colonel Ellwood to that country. The narrative of the former we have preferred for publication on account of its superior style and greater brevity, having been avowedly condensed from the original notes; whilst Mrs. Ellwood's two ponderous volumes have been immoderately swelled from the writings of other travellers, without embracing more personal adventures than those described in the following pages. Both authors have established in their own personal sketches the possibility and even feasibility of this journey for ladies, and it may be presumed that many others will follow their example.

The perusal of such books enhances our opinion of female intrepidity in thus venturing to pioneer the way through deserts, and among savage hordes; while at the same time our admiration is excited by the display of knowledge and correct taste in those who could not only perform the feat, but furnish the general reader with an agreeable account of it.

The present may be called a travelling century; the English press has teemed for many years with books of tours through every country accessible to the restless, the idle, or the scientific; but "the Continent" has been particularly overrun with book makers. Every one talks familiarly of

"The Alps and Appenines,
The Pyrenean, and the river Po."

It is refreshing to turn from these, and visit the country of the Pyramids, with an intelligent female guide like the lady who has here indited a short and spirited itinerary through regions never before visited by an European female.

AUTHOR'S PREFACE.

When the author left Calcutta, she promised several of her friends there to keep a journal of the occurrences of her journey, and to furnish them with copies of it to enable them to judge of the practicability of the undertaking, especially by ladies, and to determine whether the enjoyment would be likely to compensate for the inconveniences inseparable from travelling alternately by water and by land, and partly through countries unprovided with the comforts and facilities of civilised life. In short, she was expected to give a faithful estimate of the comparative advantages between the long tried passage round the Cape of Good Hope, and what was familiarly called the "Journey overland through Egypt."

In order to comply with these wishes, she kept very detailed notes of all that happened throughout her travels; but when the time of copying them arrived, she found it required some immediate stimulus to compel her not to defer the task of arrangement and transcription. Frequent enquiries respecting Egypt, notwithstanding the numerous excellent books already published relative to that country, induced her to think that a narrative of her journey, in a plain and unpretending form, might be presented to the public, and her engagements to her distant friends be thus fulfilled. These considerations led to the present publication.

The author is deeply sensible how much the defects of her book will demand indulgence, as it has not been revised by any literary person, but was at once delivered by herself into the hands of the publisher; indeed, little alteration has been made in the original journal, beyond adapting its contents to a narrative form, and omitting details that might prove tedious, and descriptions which had been infinitely better executed by established authorities.

Previously to her entering Egypt, the author, of course, consulted the best writers on the subject, and occasionally referred to them when viewing the splendid remains of antiquity of which they treat; yet the reader must not be disappointed, if in the following pages he merely found the record of her own sentiments and observations, as it was her undeviating object to preserve them, as far as possible, unbiased by the opinions she had read. Although, therefore, her imperfect work will prove quite unworthy the notice of the scientific, and those who require deep research, and acute disquisition, still it may not, she flatters herself, be found useless to those who contemplate a similar journey, nor wholly unamusing to people fond of light reading.

Lastly, the author has naturally calculated that some persons, who are friendly to her, will be interested in the narrative; it is possible that others may derive benefit from her experience; and it is too probable that many may disapprove of her presumption in publishing at all: but it is impossible (and she fearlessly asserts it) that the work can give one moment's pain to a single individual.

CHAPTER I.

Reflections on leaving Calcutta—Departure in the Ganges Steam Vessel—Voyage to Trincomalee—Disolate appearance of the place—Point de Galle—Beauty of the scenery—Mrs. Gibson's school.

For many years the plan of returning to England from India by the Red Sea and Egypt had been familiar to my imagination. The facility of the undertaking had been satisfactorily demonstrated by a gentleman who edited one of the Calcutta newspapers, and who recommended the route on his own experience of its eligibility; and I constantly dwelt on the delightful contrast of employing the necessary period of passing from Asia to Europe, in exploring the novelties of the Desert; in viewing the stupendous monuments of Egypt; and in visiting the lovely countries of Sicily and Italy; instead of devoting five long months to the monotony of a voyage round the Cape of Good Hope, in a ship crowded with passengers, little known, or too well known, and distracted by the mirth or frictions of numerous children.

Whether from early prejudice, from frequent illness, from witnessing the generally dreadful devastation of the climate, or from the loss of friends, I had not done justice to India, nor appreciated the advantages which, notwithstanding its various drawbacks, it still afforded. To return to England was the incessant yearning of my heart; and, while compelled to remain in Bengal, I merely exercised a resignation similar to that of the sufferers in Dante's Purgatory, who were

Nel fuoco, perchè speran di venire
Quando che sia, alle beate genti.

But, although the hope of returning home had latterly buoyed me up, and rendered all the sufferings from the climate light, yet, when the event actually arrived, it was attended with far different feelings. The dissolution of long-established associations was acutely painful. The recollection of the many years of youth and happiness passed away; the sober anticipations of the future which had taken place of expectations of unbounded enjoyment; (and who at one period of life does not look forward in the same manner?) the parting with numerous valued friends endeared by similarity of habits and pursuits, so weakened, for the time, my anxiety to quit the country, that I no longer wondered at that determination, or rather change of determination, so fatal to many, of "remaining one year more."

In leaving India, after many years' residence, there is, perhaps, no greater demand on sensibility and good feeling than a sale of one's property. Time is seldom allowed for much consideration before the house is thrown open to the public; and as the inconvenience of sending home much baggage admits of little selection, many tokens of remembrance must be parted with; paper after paper sacrificed; the bundle of letters put by for future consideration, taken up again, and again put by to be reconsidered, still, in the end, must share the same fate; and thus are destroyed kind expressions, and assurances of regard and affection, which were to solace many an evening in future life. Those only who have been similarly situated can understand all the distress which such scenes occasion, even under the least annoying circumstances; but when these take place in consequence of the death of the master of the family, the case is greatly aggravated. In India it is almost invariably the practice to sell by auction the effects of a person deceased, a few days after his demise; and it often happens, by the precipitation of an unconcerned executor, that the unfortunate survivor is irretrievably deprived of what might have best conducted to her consolation.*

In England, on the contrary, the son, or some near relative, generally succeeds to the estate, and the widow is not immediately ejected from the house to which she has been accustomed. At all events, there is a home where the family circle can assemble; every local tie is not in a moment discovered: whereas, in India, the widow, within a few weeks, if not a few days from the fatal event, is hurried on board ship, almost ignorant of the spot where her husband's remains are deposited, and can only teach her children that their father lies buried in a distant land, and that to them his tomb is now inaccessible.

Travellers proceeding to England from Bengal by the Red Sea, find it difficult to reconcile the several favourable seasons for sailing. To arrive at Bombay early in December, which is the best time for leaving it for the Red Sea, it is necessary to quit Bengal before the north-east monsoon has begun; hence a sailing ship has a very tedious, and probably a boisterous passage. We were, however, so fortunate as to procure accommodation in one of the company's steam vessels, which had been ordered round to Bombay just at the very time it suited our purpose. My prudent Calcutta friends peared in upon me remonstrances against the whole of the undertaking. They represented to me the discomfort and risk of the steamer, the shoals of the Red Sea, the horrors of the desert, and the uncertainties of the Turkish government; but I had duly weighed all these difficulties, which I was satisfied I had sufficient courage and fortitude to encounter. In addition to this, the stimulus of performing a journey which no female from our side of India had achieved before me, joined to the advantage of travelling with the party which was expecting us at Bombay, made every peril appear light;—so promising to some, whom I was about to leave, a narrative of my adventures, I embarked on board the Ganges, on the 26th of September, 1827.

As the Ganges was an experimental vessel, it may not be amiss shortly to describe her. She was built of teak, pierced for ten guns; carried two engines of forty-horse power each, and was intended for either a vessel of war or despatch. Unfortunately, however, in qualifying her for the former purpose, too much regard had been paid to solidity, and the object of celerity was thus defeated; the force of our steam in calm weather impelling us little more than five miles an hour against the swell. Nevertheless this very defect proved a benefit to us in the cabin, as the strength of her build prevented our feeling the tremulous motion so generally complained of on board steam vessels.

I was surprised to find that we experienced much less heat in the steamer than we should have done at the same season in a sailing vessel. Her perpetual motion caused a current of air even during the calms, and we found the climate still cooler when the wind was contrary, than when it was fair, as we have had to press forward against it, and the steam was carried off much above our heads.

It was originally intended that we should proceed directly to Point de Galle, for which end we had, as we supposed, taken in a supply of coal for fifteen days' con-

* Among the Europeans in India there are scarcely any old persons, as almost every body is a temporary resident. Hence, if you search the well tenanted burying grounds of the large cities, you will discover few besides the graves of the youthful, who have been cut off by some violent disease amid the buoyancy of health, or the tombs of those of middle age arrested by death when just about to reap the fruit of long toil and privation by returning to their native land. It is this which renders our Indian cemeteries so peculiarly melancholy; for though we bow to the decree which summons away the aged and the infirm, yet, humanly speaking, and in our blindness, we are apt to pronounce the death of the young to be premature, and a fit subject of aggravated regret.

"——For oh, it goes against the mind of man,
To be turn'd out from its warm, wonted house,
Ere yet one rent admits the winter's chill.

sumption; but after we had been out ten days, during which nothing material occurred, it was ascertained that, from the defective quality of the coal, we should not have a sufficient stock of it to take us to that harbour. On the 7th of October, therefore, the fires were extinguished, and we made the best of our way to Trincomalee by beating under sail, reserving the remainder of our coal for steam with which to stem the current off the port.

The entrance into Trincomalee is highly picturesque; but the inner bay, which is the secure harbour, is so surrounded by hills that the sea becomes quite smooth, and the atmosphere heavy and confined. I had heard this spot so much extolled, that I was a good deal disappointed. There is little about it remarkable, in my opinion, except the size of the harbour itself, and the view from Fort Ostenburg; and these have been so often described that I need not dwell on them. At Trincomalee we first saw the vessels of the coast with their singular outrigger, being a sort of frame-work of four crossed beams or oars thrown over the side, extending about eight feet to windward for the purpose of steadying the vessel, which is very narrow, and would, without it, upset when under sail. It is extraordinary the people should prefer this clumsy contrivance to the simple method of making the boat a little wider. The presence of our steamer excited no interest among the natives, few of the boatmen laying aside their apathy sufficiently to approach the ship.

On the afternoon of the 10th of October, we quitted Trincomalee with the most glorious sunset I had ever witnessed. We passed the formidable rocks called the Basses, during the night of the 12th, at the distance, it was calculated, of only three miles, and anchored in the harbour of Point de Galle on the 13th, having perceived our vicinity to it long before we reached the shore, from the spicy perfumes wafted by the land-breeze. The view of the town from the sea, though not so magnificent, is more cheerful than that of Trincomalee. The garrison and inhabitants were assembled on the ramparts to see us come in, and afforded a very lively spectacle; whereas at Trincomalee the place seemed deserted, and disappointment and dejection to prevail. The entrance to Point de Galle is marked by several bold rocks, against which the sea beats with great violence. The exasperation of the waves must be tremendous in a southerly gale.

Though long accustomed to India, I was struck on landing with the beauty of the scenery, for though quite oriental, it was in a style essentially differing from that of Hindostan; the roads cut through tops of cocoa-nut trees, rustic bridges over winding streams, hills and deep dells, and huts made of palm-leaves, woven in a variety of different plaits. The natives are an elegant, but an effeminate race; the men scarcely to be distinguished from the women by their dress, which consists of a vest and loose robe of cotton; their hair long, and gathered up in knots and braids, fastened behind with gold bodkins, or large combs of tortoise-shell, of a fanciful shape. Instead of the umbrellas, the more wealthy natives have a gigantic fan, made of the talipot leaf, carried to protect them from the sun; and this had a curious effect. I remarked here a handsome tree, the leaves resembling a vine in shape, but very much larger, and the colour of a brilliant dark green; and was greatly gratified by finding it the fir-famed bread fruit. The fruit resembled in appearance a small jack (artocarpus integrifolia;) and, though not equal to a French roll, was nearly as good, when baked or roasted, as a yam or oatmeal cake.

The rain prevented our driving out in the evening; a privation only understood in a tropical climate, where the heat is an insurmountable obstacle to anything like sight-seeing during the day. Next morning, however, our kind host (Mr. Twynham) lent us a conveyance, in which we took a delightful drive, partly along the sea-shore, and up to a hill where Mrs. Gibson had erected school-rooms for male and female children,—an admirable work of charity, as till then no school existed on the island. Mrs. Gibson was not only unassisted at the commencement of her undertaking, but discouraged by those who, with less zeal, excused their own indolence, by expressing a belief "that nothing could be done." Nevertheless, this excellent woman persisted, till at the expiration of twenty-five years she was enabled to show how much could be accomplished. The girls perform household occupations, and are taught plain and fancy work with their needle, and the boys are brought up to several trades. The girls are so usefully educated, that the missionaries are glad to select wives from among them for their assistants. I left Point de Galle with much regret. The scenery was so novel and so beautiful, that I would gladly have remained some days longer, particularly as, unlike regions nearer home, it was not probable that my destiny would ever lead me again—

"Beyond where Ceylon lifts her spicy breast."

The morning after our departure from Point de Galle, Adam's Peak, situated in the centre of Ceylon, was still visible from the deck, though at the estimated distance of one hundred miles. I was surprised to find that Cape Comorin, instead of being a high promontory, as I had imagined, is very low land; but the mountains in the vicinity are extremely picturesque. Those called the Ghauts are universally admired; but had they presented a less beautiful appearance, they would still have delighted one who had so long been accustomed to the flat surface of Bengal.

Our course leading along the shore, we had, for several days, the majestic Ghauts in sight; and we beheld in succession the towns of Cochin, Tellicherry, and Quilon; and the forts of Mangalore, Ghieriah, and Severndroog; and at last, at mid-day, the high land of Bombay was descried.

CHAPTER II.

Arrival at Bombay.—The interest excited by the appearance of the steamer—Addresses and entertainment to Mr. Elphinstone, on his relinquishing the government—Departure from Bombay—Straits of Babel Mandeb.

The arrival of the first steamer which had ever visited Bombay was expected with the greatest anxiety; two guns were to be fired from the ramparts on her heaving in sight, that the public might have timely notice; and at twelve o'clock the signal announced the appearance of the long looked-for Ganges. Towards sunset, on the 21st of October, one of the most delightful evenings of a tropical autumn, we approached the harbour, after a prosperous voyage of twenty-three days, without an hour of bad weather, or accident, or inconvenience of any kind. The whole population, European and native, were in motion. The scene was truly exhilarating; the exquisite natural beauties of the harbour, the delightful serenity of the weather, the variety of vessels, the thousands of natives crowded on the shore, while the sea was covered with boats, some full of European officers in their scarlet uniforms, some laden with Parsees in their singular costume, and others swarming with the common Hindoos, Coucanes, and Malabars, gave an indescribable life and brilliancy to the scene.

In the midst of this confusion of excitement, a superior kind of boat was seen approaching, and our kind friend, Mr. Elphinstone, who had come so far to welcome us, was soon on the deck of the Ganges. We then landed, and accompanied him to his country-house at Parrell.

Bombay has been so fully described, that I will dismiss it with proper brevity. During our stay, we visited the island of Salsette. The timber on it is so fine, and nature has been so liberal in bestowing every feature essential to the formation of a beautiful landscape, that I could scarcely have selected a spot which might not have been converted into an English park. A delightful drive through Gorechandeb, and Tannah, brought us to the fort and town of Basdeen. Within the walls are the ruins of fourteen chapels. This is a striking place: one would think the whole town had been inhabited by monks, and depopulated by plague; a curse seems to have fallen upon it, and its only tenants are a single sepooy, and an enormous Cobra di Capella, which is said to haunt an ancient Hindoo temple in the centre. The walls of the fort are perfect, and those of the monasteries and chapels in excellent preservation: these, with a few additions, might form handsome and substantial dwellings for the people in the neighbourhood, who now live in miserable huts. I hear that Basdeen was abandoned from the unhealthiness of its situation; one cause of which I can perfectly understand, if the fishing were carried on in its vicinity formerly as it is now: the smell was so dreadful as we passed, that I was compelled to leave the deck of the vessel, and go below. The fish when caught is strewed more than ankle deep upon the shore, where it is left to dry; and in such a climate, the mass of corruption thus engendered may well be imagined. It is an ancient privilege which the people claim of manuring the ground with fish, founded on a stipulation at the first transfer of the island from the Portuguese. Hence the governor has never interfered with it, even to protect the environs of his country-house; in consequence, the air there is often disagreeably infected.

We drove to Malabar Point, a situation which commands a full view of Bombay and its harbour. The moment I approached the edge of the Point, and the magnificent scene broke upon my sight, I exclaimed, "This reminds me of the descriptions of Naples!" and I was then informed that the comparison had often been before made. This similarity, on reaching Naples, I was enabled to verify. Malabar Point would form a delightful residence in the hot months, were the dwelling-house anything but what it now is, literally composed of a few huts. Mr. Elphinstone was, however, so economical of the Company's funds, that he had been content to inhabit it in its present state, rather than allow the government to incur expense for his own personal comfort.

Sir John Malcolm having arrived, the 15th of November was fixed for presenting to Mr. Elphinstone the addresses of the clergy and the European and native inhabitants of Bombay, and in the evening I attended an entertainment given to him by the English society. I do not think it possible that in any country the illuminations, the decorations of the rooms, and the arrangements altogether, could have been more elegant or splendid; suffice it to say, these were the combined production of the twelve heads best qualified as to taste and gastronomy in Bombay.

Sir John Malcolm, in a speech after supper, declared that he should be at a loss to say whether, in evincing all this enthusiasm towards Mr. Elphinstone, the society did him or themselves most honour.*

In addition to a service of plate, a picture, and a statue voted at a meeting of the European inhabitants, the compliment most congenial to Mr. Elphinstone's feelings must have been that which he received from the natives within the presidency, of all religious denominations, who subscribed upwards of a lac of rupees, or 10,000/., for one or two professorships in the native college, to be filled from England, and to be called after his name; to perpetuate, as they said, to their children's children the memory of one who had been to them a friend and a father.

We left the ball-room to embark on board the vessel on which we were to accompany Mr. Elphinstone to Cossier. Deep and universal was the sorrow his departure excited: many persons followed him to the boat, and as it left the shore, an illuminated stage, on the very verge of the pier, exhibiting the words, "Once more farewell," gave a last affecting proof of attachment and regret.

Our little vessel, the Palinurus, of 190 tons, was fitted up in the yacht style; and our party consisted of Mr. Elphinstone, Mr. Steele of the civil service, Messrs. Wallace and Gordon of the medical department, Mr. L. and myself.

Favoured by the prevalent winds of the season, we made as much progress as the inferior sailing of our brig permitted; passed in a few days Cape Aden and the Straits of Babel Mandeb, and reached Mosha on the 1st of December.

The entrance into the Straits of Babel Mandeb afforded a sight equally unique and grand. A rush of the sea appears to have divided a bed of hard black rock, and thus to have forced a channel for itself of two or three miles in breadth. This rock rises on each side, black, barren, and cheerless; and while surveying this desolate spot, I learnt that the left shore was the island of Perim, where, during the expedition of the Indian army into

* The late Bishop Heber, in his Journal of a Tour through India, has portrayed Mr. Elphinstone's character in a manner which all who have the happiness of knowing the latter, must recognise as eminently correct. May I be permitted thus incidentally to express my own sorrow at the loss of Bishop Heber?—but to describe the grief which pervaded all India at the death of this amiable prelate, would be as difficult as justly to depict his excellence.

Egypt, a detachment was encamped. No station could possibly be more dreary—in some places a few blades of grass endeavoured to force themselves through the crevices of the rock; but even fresh water was brought from the Abyssinian shore, the scarcity of this most necessary article being thus added to many other privations.

CHAPTER III.

MOCHA.

The view of Mocha in the setting sun was very beautiful. The buildings, of one unvaried white, gave it the semblance of being excavated from a quarry of marble, and no tree or shrub broke the uniformity of colour. The fort is built along the shore, with a circular tower at each end, projecting into the sea; the whole forming nearly a semi-circle. The contrast of the lustrous white with the dark blue sea, a colour unknown to those who have not left the coast of England, was very remarkable, and it was only on a near approach that we discovered the houses were constructed of unbaked brick, and then plastered and whitewashed. From the absence of rain the buildings retain their freshness for a length of time; but one heavy tropical shower would wholly change the aspect of the town, and render its appearance as deplorable as it is now the reverse.

Mr. Elphinstone landed in the evening, through a tremendous sea, and proceeded immediately to the house of the Dowla, or Governor, where he was received with rude honours nearly similar to the pageantry exhibited by Indian chieftains on state occasions. I did not go on shore till the morning, at which time the wind usually moderates, and then proceeded to a small house provided for us by the Resident.

After breakfast I was present when the Dowla returned the visit Mr. Elphinstone had paid him the night before. His appearance was that of a fat native of Bengal; he was accompanied into the room by two or three Arabs, fine intelligent looking men, and the secretary, whom I should have taken for a dull quiet lad of eighteen, had I not heard he was very clever, and was sent from Senna as a sort of spy upon the Dowla.

Having ascertained there was no objection, I sat veiled, at the upper end of the room, during the conference; at which nothing passed beyond the usual ceremonies of smoking, exchanging of hookas, &c., but I observed the Arabs preferred the tea, provided by the Resident, to their own coffee.

After dinner, some Arab minstrels, armed with pistols and daggers, were introduced. Their instruments were a rude guitar, a ruder flageolet, and a common tabor. The songs were of love and war, occasionally animated, but generally the music was soft and monotonous, and the cadences at the end of the stanzas reminded me of the Spanish bolero. The guitar was played sometimes with the fingers, and sometimes with little crooked sticks.

The love-song began, as I was informed, with a complaint to heaven of the lover's hard fortune: "O God, who restoredst the kingdom of Soolimann, restore my peace, &c.;" it next described the fair lady as "killing with a glance," and concluded with "great is the intoxication of friendship, wine, or war, but that of love is greatest."

Among the visitors at the Residency were some Indian merchants, who appeared very much out of their element. They stated, that, except on the side of the sea, the expenses, on account of carriage, guards, &c., absorbed the profits of the inland trade. It must, therefore, have been the gains of their maritime speculations which tempt them to remain, as is their practice, with scarcely any society, and unmarried, in a land obnoxious to their religious and domestic feelings. The exact nature of the trade which they exercise I could not ascertain.

The coffee bean is cultivated in the interior of the provinces, whence supplies of it are taken to Judda, for the consumption of Egypt, and the quantity required for the European and American markets is conveyed to Mocha. The Arabs themselves, either from economy or preference, generally use an infusion made from the husk, and, judging from the indifferent specimen of the coffee made from the bean, which I drank at the Residency, this latter method of preparing it was rare, even among the higher classes. I had, of course, expected to taste coffee at Mocha in the highest perfection, and was therefore disappointed to find it of an inferior quality.

Besides coffee, dates, honey, and a few shells are articles of export; and from the coast of Aden or Abyssinia are derived supplies of grain, horses, asses, and large-tailed sheep. A good horse costs about four hundred dollars. Slaves also are procured from that coast. Some of its inhabitants, called Somalees, were then at Mocha; they are, of course, very black, with the usual thick lip, but tall and well made. One of them wore, with perfect gravity, an immense wig of brown wool; others had their own hair highly frizzled and whitened with a kind of powder.

Vegetables are grown round the town; and fruits, especially grapes, are brought in the summer season from Senna and the interior. The date tree requires watering, and lasts about twenty years.

The Wahabees, once so notorious, had, it was reported, merged into other tribes, and ceased to profess the heretical opinions which had caused so much bloodshed.

There are twelve schools in Mocha; and it was said that, inland, near Senna, there were several colleges, where the twelve branches of Mahomedan sciences are taught, as usual in Turkey and India.

The Arab women marry about the age of sixteen. They are allowed great liberty, visiting each other till late at night without interruption; indeed, being in company with a female is considered by the Arabs as the best protection. A woman is enabled to divorce her husband on very slight grounds; a bad temper on his part is a sufficient reason; and if no serious offence can be proved against the wife, she is entitled to receive back her dower. Every lady, when she visits, carries on her arm a little bag of coffee; this is boiled at the house where she spends the evening, thus enabling her to enjoy society without putting her friend to expense.

The Arab troops seemed very disorderly. They wore turbans, dirks, swords, and fire-arms. They had a curious method of walking, supporting each other four abreast, and each resting the hand on the other's shoulder. As I saw them swagger, or rather reel along, I could scarcely imagine them to be the warlike soldiers they are described. The people in the streets were inoffensive, and allowed me to walk without molestation, when there might have been some excuse for a rude indulgence of their curiosity, as only two European ladies had ever been seen at Mocha before. Were an Arabian female, in full costume, to make her appearance in Hyde Park, I suspect she would not have to speak so favourably of the courtesy of John Bull.

A short time before our arrival, during a tumult which took place in the town, a member of the Residency shot a Turk at the moment of his breaking into the house and aiming a pistol at one of the servants. This act of resolution, combined with the judicious conduct of the Resident, might have conducted to the estimation in which the British were then held; for, a few years back, a Christian could scarcely appear in the streets without being spit upon. The Turks vowed vengeance on Mr. —, and, in the emphatic language of the country, sent him word that his grave was dug; but, though the threat was not much regarded, the gentleman was persuaded, after keeping on the alert for some days, to leave Mocha. No blame, however, could be attached to him, as he shot the man in self-defence. The Arabs took no part in the fray, preferring even the infidels to the Turks.

The day after we landed, arrived an Arab ship with some British officers, bent on the same expedition as ourselves. She got on shore, and by the mismanagement of the captain it was thought she would have been stranded. A hundred Indian pilgrims, men, women, and children, were on board, and the scene of confusion, as related to me, cannot be imagined. It is supposed that not a hundred out of the many thousands of the miserable wretches, who annually visit Mecca, ever return, multitudes perishing by the way from famine and fatigue.

Numbers of these people pressed upon us on the quay, looking squalid and poor. We thought they were part of the population of the town, and it was not until we had again embarked that we heard they were the pilgrims. Perhaps it was as well, for had we given them money, they probably would have fought for it among themselves, have been punished for the disturbance, and have had to resign to the Dowla's myrmidons any trifle they might have obtained.

While some of the gentlemen rode into the country, I remained on the terrace of the Resident's house, watching the setting sun, and the moon at the same time nearly at its full. The town formed one mass of white. The façades and cornices of the houses were varied in every shape of fretwork and arabesque. The terraces of each building, as white and as fresh as the walls, with little verandahs closed, or open, in many fantastic patterns—the sea calm near the shore, (the colour varying on the different shoals,) and a little farther, curling and glittering in the sun, and then, as it were, in the paler light of the moon—a grove of green dates on one side, and the curious bee-hive shaped huts of the Bedouins and Jews on the other, formed altogether a novel and charming scene. I was forcibly struck with the extreme stillness, interrupted only by the muezzin calling to prayers, and the tinkling of a few bells on the trappings of the horses, as our party returned from their ride. I saw not a creature on the terraces, nor one at the windows or loop-holes. On entering the harbour, I had remarked that the city appeared destitute of inhabitants; and at this moment, as I cast my eyes around, I felt the impression still more strongly.

Mountains, woods, rivers, and seas, are, to the general reader, no more than high ground, trees and water; beautiful certainly, but conveying still the same ideas. To the spectator, each of these objects presents itself under numerous different aspects; and if the reader be an experienced traveller and an observer of nature, he may, perhaps, be able to imagine some of the beauty which is intended to be expressed by a narrator. But the difficulty of accurately communicating to others one's own notions of scenery particularly struck me on beholding the hills and mountains behind the town; they were picturesque, but merely so from the variety of their form, and the curious undulation on every ridge. I do not think, however, any description would have enabled me to form a conception of the three ranges of hills which were then before my eyes. Thunder and lightning, and rain in torrents, occur frequently on these hills: the two former never reach the town, and seldom the latter. How perpetually during the hot season must its inhabitants be tantalised with a view of these refreshing streams, while they are smothered with dust, and the thermometer never lower than 78°! It seldom, however, rises above 84°. The dust, indeed, is so distressing, that even at the favourable season my eyes suffered; and I heard several of the gentlemen on board the ship complaining of its effects, though we were at anchor a considerable distance from the shore.

On the whole, however, I was much pleased with Mocha. Had not my friends been of the same opinion, I might have doubted my own taste; for all previous travellers had viewed the place in a far different light, and had given me such an unfavourable impression of it, that at first I had not wished even to land, and I should thus have been deprived of a great gratification.

CHAPTER IV.

Voyage up the Red Sea—Dangers of the navigation—Discovery of a new shoal—Arrival at Coesir.

On leaving Mocha, we received another passenger, Lieut. McMahon, of the 87th regiment. He brought with him, as an attendant, an old Chinaman, thus adding a new language to the already numerous jargons prevalent on board, which now consisted of Italian, Portuguese, Hindoostanee, Arabic, Persian, Chinese, and Abyssinian; and the horrible confusion of tongues may easily be imagined, when these men quarrelled and abused each other, in all the variety of their respective dialects.

This, however, was an annoyance necessarily tolerated, as it is difficult to procure in India servants properly qualified, especially as interpreters, to perform such a journey.

We passed our time very pleasantly in the Red Sea, most of us being closely occupied in acquiring knowledge of the countries which we were so eager to explore. In the morning, regular lectures on Italian were held on deck; and after tea, one of the party read out portions of Turkish history, till it was time to retire to rest.

The wind was tolerably fair till we reached the latitude of St. John's, the point at which all mariners expect to be baffled, and where they are seldom wrong in their expectations. We had fifteen journals on board, which all spoke of storm and tempest from St. John's to Coesir. In consequence, we were daily and nightly prepared for bad weather. The least puff of wind more than ordinary caused the dead lights to be put in; and in truth these precautions, though troublesome, were necessary—for about this position the danger becomes most frequent just as the wind becomes most adverse.

Lascars were stationed at night on the fore-castle and on the gangways, to look out for shoals, and every half hour exclaimed to each other, "Khoob dekh augil," (Keep a good look out forward;—but I apprehend that, with the characteristic apathy of the natives of Bengal, who are generally fatalists, they answered, like Baron Trenck, in their sleep, and that our security was in the remoteness of the shoals, not in their vigilance.)

The captain and officers were, I believe, as anxious as myself, the Red Sea being but imperfectly surveyed: for instance, after it was supposed we had passed a notorious reef more than once, while beating about against a foul wind, we beheld it somewhat unexpectedly; and on the 18th of December, the uncertainty of the navigation was still further evinced by the discovery of a dangerous shoal close to us, which was not mentioned on the chart. At half past three, while we were at dinner, breakers were reported from the mast head, and at four they were visible from the deck, at the distance of one mile. We went between this reef and the shore; but towards night, the breeze diminishing, we stood to the southward to round the shoal, not being able to get to windward of it. We were soon becalmed, and it was impossible to anchor, from the great depth of water. Hence our position became very precarious, being at one time within half a mile of the shoal, the breakers on which we heard occasionally; and on drifting away from it, we came within reach of the sound of those on the shore side. Truly thankful was I when a slight breeze extricated us from our perilous situation.

After ten days more buffeting against our old enemy, the northeast wind, we reached Cosseir on the 26th of December, having made a passage of twenty-three days from Mocha, and thirty-nine from Bombay.

The appearance of Cosseir is unpromising; the hills, houses, and sands, are all of the same colour. The houses are mostly in the form of public ovens, small and wretched in the extreme. Some of the gentlemen said they could fancy themselves in the Dekkan, the aspect of the buildings being so exactly similar. The officer next in rank to the effendi came on board as soon as we anchored, and brought a civil message from the latter to Mr. Elphinstone. The Turk accepted a glass of brandy, and on his departure received a present of six bottles of it for the honour of the faith! As he said the horses and mules, which were to have been sent from Cairo, had not arrived, we feared something untoward had happened, and were sorry to learn that it was the death of Mr. Salt which had caused the disappointment. We had relied so much on experiencing from him the kindness which he invariably showed to travellers, that this alone would have made us regret his death; but, in addition, we heard rumours of the unsettled state of affairs between Great Britain and the Turks, which might interrupt our progress, and we naturally depended on him for advice and assistance.

Early the next morning Mr. Elphinstone and the other gentlemen called on the effendi, who received them courteously in the upper room of a miserable mud hut, (the best house in the place,) but nothing occurred beyond the usual ceremonies. The next morning the effendi walked to the tents to return Mr. Elphinstone's visit. After some conversation, he imparted to him, in an under tone, the intelligence of the battle of Navarino, adding—"Please God, friendship will yet continue with the English." It was impossible to be more civil; he told Mr. Elphinstone "he was in a desert, and could furnish but little on earth; yet if he wanted any thing from heaven, he would go there to fetch it." Then assuring Mr. Elphinstone that the pasha had ordered every thing to be provided for the party, his excellency begged a bag of potatoes, and took his leave.

On landing, I found our tents pitched, and every thing within them as comfortable as I could have wished—not so without, for we were on a barren plain, close to the town, surrounded by the dead carcasses of camels, asses, and goats, and in the midst of all kinds of filth. The perpetual barking of the ferocious Egyptian dogs, one of which made its way into the outer tent, and drank up a bucket of water, my next day's allowance, the strangeness and novelty of the situation, the anticipation of what might be our future lot, and some vague thoughts that my destination might be the Seven Towers, prevented my sleeping; and notwithstanding illness and fatigue, I was glad to rise at five o'clock; indeed, in spite of the coldness of the mornings, I found it necessary, during the whole journey across the desert, to leave my bed even before that hour.

CHAPTER V.

Preparations for the journey across the Desert—Tukhte Rowan—Exhilarating climate—Entertainment on New Year's Day in the Desert—Surprise at unexpectedly seeing Carnac—Tranquil encampment at Luxor.

Some time elapsed before so large a party as ours could be accommodated with camels; they were procurable in any number, though they could not be collected without a little delay. They were white and black, besides the usual dun colour. I may here remark, that the distinction between the dromedary and camel is no further known in Egypt, than that the former is used for the purposes of riding and despatch, the latter for the conveyance of burthens.

Our cavalcade consisted of ninety-six camels, besides many asses,—no great number, when it is to be recollected we carried with us tents, clothes, wine, water, and provisions. The captain, and one of the officers of the Palinurus, had joined our party, and with them several Lascars, who were of great use in pitching our tents, &c. &c.

For Mr. L., myself, and two servants, we had twenty-two camels and three donkeys. I was to travel in a covered litter, called a Tukhte rowan, somewhat resembling a Sicilian lettiga: this was made at Bombay of the strongest possible materials, and, in consequence of its weight and size, it was necessary to employ the largest and tallest camels for its conveyance. The machine, from its height, presented a formidable appearance, being raised six feet above the ground; and I had to ascend to it by a ladder, which, from the unsteadiness of the camels, was rather a difficult undertaking.

The Arabs having lashed the trunks after their own method, to my astonishment I found myself in actual progress about noon on the 28th. But, without Mr. Elphinstone's servant, Antonio, and the additional assistance of Mr. Porter, the officer of the Palinurus, I think I might have been in the Desert still. The concourse of people, the roaring of the camels, the vociferation of the servants and Lascars, in their vain endeavours to make the Arabs understand and move—and, as usual, the less they could make them understand the louder they bawled—one camel rising with half its load, another throwing down the whole of his, others making off altogether—every driver screeching as much of the cord that was given him as he could hide, snatching from the man next to him the quantity required,—the combat that ensued, the one universal clamour for bucksees, their struggle against each other to obtain it,—presented a scene of confusion and uproar, which, though to the gentlemen, from its strangeness, might prove amusing; to me was somewhat alarming, particularly as I was, for a short time, left alone with the drivers.

My interpreter, who was a Darfour man, and who professed to understand Hindoostanee, could not comprehend one word I said to him, which increased my discomfort. At this moment my tukhte rowan was assailed by five or six dancing girls, called Almehs. I immediately lowered the silk blind, which, however, I thought they would have torn off in the same clamour and struggle for bucksees.^{*} I could not help seeing them as I strove to keep down the curtain; and it was impossible to behold them without disgust. Their countenances appeared inflamed by drinking, their persons were greatly exposed, and altogether they more resembled common robust English women under the influence of liquor, rather than what I had fancied of the delicate and elegant Egyptian females. They wore the same full petticoat as the nautch girls of India. I may seem capriciously affected by the customs of the inhabitants amongst whom I travelled, but to me these women appeared doubly bold and degraded from the absence of the veil. It is so entirely contrary to the prejudices of the country for a female to appear without it, that the lowest peasant's wife will not allow any one to pass without drawing her muffler of coarse blue cloth closer round her face; and to expose it thus must be the height of abandonment.

"In the tukhte rowan," says Hajji Baba, "when the mules take to trotting, or when the one proceeds willingly and the other refuses to go except by beating, the sufferer in the cage between both undergoes strange motions." The motion, at times, in the camel tukhte rowan, was so violent that it put me to great pain. I was the more surprised at this, as on first setting off the animals stepped well together, and we moved on most comfortably. Every half hour I had to complain, and Mr. Porter, the officer before alluded to, kindly "new-rigged the tackling," as he phrased it. It was at last discovered by mere accident, that as soon as the drivers thought they could do so without detection, they slipped off part of the cord harness which kept the litter steady, although they saw how much I suffered; yet, for the sake of this trifling acquisition, they would have harassed me during the whole journey. The next morning, one of the same Arabs harnessed a vicious camel to the tukhte rowan;—away flew my litter over the plain, fortunately without me, and was with difficulty recovered; and then, while the camels were in this unsteady state, I was hoisted in at the door in a very unceremonious manner, my ladder having been forgotten in the confusion.

The whole business required some courage, as owing to the delay I was left nearly alone, and was fearful of being benighted. This, however, was the last of my disasters; for I found, on my arrival at the halting ground, that the delinquent had been reformed by a bastinado, inflicted by the Chioush who attended us,—the usual Turkish recipe for all misdeemeanours.

My maid was placed the first two days in a sort of basket with a hood, fastened on the back of a camel, but, though well padded, she found the motion so severe that she was glad to descend, and she performed the rest of the journey, with perfect ease, on a donkey. The gentlemen, also, except two, having tried the camels, preferred this humble conveyance, walking and halting as they felt inclined. Indeed, were I to undertake the journey again, I should dispense with the tukhte rowan, and adopt this mode of travelling.

Though much variety of country or occurrence cannot be expected in the desert, I may say, with truth, that the passage through it was to me very interesting and agreeable. For the first three stages the road was diversified by some inequalities of ground and remarkable passes through the rocky mountains; but the course of our journey, in general, lay through an arid plain of sand and stones, about two or three miles in breadth, bounded by rocks of sandstone of an almost uniform appearance. On the second day's march I saw one or two trees; and the road was so varied, that I could then scarcely believe myself in a desert, which I had always pictured to my imagination as a dreary and interminable plain, with heavy loose sand curled into clouds by every breath of wind.

Our second place of encampment was truly singular, our tents being pitched in a sort of circus, about two miles in extent, completely closed in (except at two passages) by rugged mountains, part of which rose above our heads almost perpendicularly. I left my bed before daylight, when the whole camp was buried in sleep, and indulged my astonishment at the novel spectacle of tents surrounded by numerous camels, with their drivers and burthens, ranged in a circle, according to the position of their respective masters. I wondered to find myself thus tranquilly situated in the desert, whose difficulties had been so magnified; and I looked up to the canopy of stars, the view of which was so remarkably bounded by the belt of mountains, with feelings which I shall not now attempt to recall in their original intensity.

I cannot imagine that any climate in the world can excel that of the desert at the season we crossed it. I never found the heat of the sun injurious, nor did any of the gentlemen of the party, who were exposed to it many hours each day. The air was so bracing, that although I had caught a severe cold the day of my arrival at Cosseir, which caused acute pain in my face, and ended in an abscess, yet I felt the fatigue of being so long on the road, the want of sleep, and the labour of packing, &c. less than I should an evening's drive in a carriage in the hot weather in India.

Anniversaries passed in strange countries, and at a long distance from home, are generally celebrated by travellers with extraordinary zest and cordiality; and though I am apprehensive of being considered tedious in dwelling upon what indifferent persons may deem uninteresting, yet I will venture to describe the fête which Mr. Elphinstone gave us on New-year's day, 1828. Ill as I was, and fatigued by pain rather than the journey, I wished on this day to join the gentlemen in the dinner tent; and I confess I was amused by the contrast of the narrative which I had been reading with the appearance of the table and party before me. The author of the book in question described the delight of the traveller on arriving at the wells where we were then encamped, and his satisfaction, after all his privations, at quenching his thirst with plenty of water; and, in short, would have impressed us with the notion that the desert he had passed, and in which we then were, was such a one as depicted by Burckhardt, abounding in sand, hunger, and thirst. But, behold our party, consisting of ten persons, sitting in a comfortable tent lined with yellow baize, and cheerfully lighted up; a clean table-cloth, and the following bill of fare:—roast turkey, ham, fowls, mutton in various shapes, curry, rice, and potatoes, damson tart, and a pudding; madeira, claret, sherry, port, and Hodgson's beer. For the dessert, Lemann's biscuits, almonds and raisins, watermelons, pumplenose (or shaddock), and a plumcake as a finale!

What astonished me, was the ease with which the whole arrangement of our meals was conducted; however, I believe this was principally to be attributed to the skilful superintendence of Mr. Elphinstone's head servant, Antonio. He was active and strong; a good tailor, and a good cook; speaking a little of most languages, but being master of Arabic, French, and Italian. He mended my harness like a practised saddler; and, in short, could do any thing and every thing as it was required. The cook, dining tent, and apparatus, were sent forward early in the morning, before we started ourselves, and at six in the evening our dinner was ready.

While traversing the desert we met numerous droves of camels, the Arabs belonging to which offered us for sale grapes, dates, watermelons, and ready boiled hard eggs. Every person was so inoffensive, that after the first day, the gentlemen laid aside their arms as useless incumbrances, and travelled with such perfect security, that individuals were occasionally separated from the caravan without any fear of molestation.

We did not gain a sight of the fertile country and of the Nile till about twelve or fifteen miles from Legayta, just before our arrival at Hujaza, the next stage to Luxor; but the contrast with the desert did not appear to me very striking. This part of the journey, though interesting, afforded little of novelty, as the face of the country resembled so much that on the banks of the Ganges. Indeed, but for the curious method of my own conveyance, and the road, which was a causeway raised above the inundation, and crowded with camels, I could have scarcely believed I was not in India. The date-groves, at a little distance, were perfectly similar to tops of cocoa-nut trees. The young wheat was of a brilliant pomona green, interspersed with the dried-up stubble of the preceding crop. There were also fields of sugar-cane and Indian corn, and little water-courses, for irrigation, winding in every direction. The wheel used for this purpose, turned by oxen, was in perpetual motion. It had small pots attached to it which raised up the water, and as the wheel revolved, threw it into the channels above noticed. It was curious to hear the noise of these wheels, which made a constant creaking like the singing of crickets, not disagreeable, and which never ceased by day or by night. I observed the same at Bombay. The plough, also, is quite Indian.

The day was particularly fine, and the first sight of the numerous cattle, so truly English, caused me a sensation of joy which those only can appreciate who have long been absent from home. I was never tired of looking at, and admiring, these beautiful cows, each of which would have been worth forty or fifty pounds in Calcutta. They were of a fine black and white or bay colour;—how unlike the little miserable, half-starved, dirty-white animals of Bengal, with humps on their necks!

We met many Turks, their horses gaily caparisoned, some with four or five pistols stuck in their girdles, all with a martial air, but perfectly civil, yet forming a great contrast to the simplicity of our quiet, unarmed Englishmen.

While I was leisurely travelling along, thinking only of our arrival at Luxor, one of the party who had preceded us, called to me from a rising ground to turn to the left, and having gone a few hundred yards off the road, I beheld, unexpectedly, the temple of Carnac. It was long after I reached my tent ere I recovered from the bewilderment into which the view of these stupendous ruins had thrown me. No one, who has not seen them, can understand the awe and admiration they excite even in unscientific beholders. When I compare the descriptions of Denon and Hamilton, I find them essentially correct, yet without giving me any adequate idea of the glorious reality. They fail in describing what never has been, and what I think never can be, described. No words can impart a conception of the profusion of pillars, standing, prostrate, inclining against each other, broken and whole. Stones of a gigantic size, propped up by pillars, and pillars again resting upon stones, which appear ready to crush the gazer under their sudden fall; yet, on a second view, he is convinced nothing but an earthquake could move them; all these pillars, covered with sculpture, perhaps three thousand years old, though fresh as if finished but yesterday, not of grotesque and hideous objects, such as we are accustomed to associate with ideas of Egyptian mythology, but many of the figures of gods, warriors, and horses, much larger than life, yet exhibiting surpassing beauty and grace.* As I had seen none but English and Welsh ruins, and some of the caves at Elephanta and Salsette, I might have doubted my own judgment, had I not found every one else, learned and unlearned, struck with the same admiration. Some of the gentlemen returned to view Carnac at night. I was too unwell to partake of this pleasure. They all came back highly gratified, observing that the detached ruins derived advantage from the moonlight, though the temple itself could not be seen with sufficient distinctness. One only of the four obelisks, mentioned by Pococke, is now standing; it is not equal to either of the two at Luxor, which are the most perfect in the world.

Our tents were pitched under the walls of Luxor, close to the banks of the Nile. The sight of the few boats on the peaceful waters,—our own encampment,—the contented appearance of the camels, which had thrown off their loads, and were luxuriating on the fresh herbage,—and of their drivers, who knew they were to have one or two days' rest, and had a reward in prospect,—composed as cheerful a scene as well can be imagined, and imparted a sensation of tranquillity and repose quite refreshing to a weary traveller like myself.

The houses at Luxor are built with sun-burnt bricks and baked clay pipes; and, about three or four feet from the top, branches of trees are inserted, either to bind the structure, or to accommodate the pigeons, which flock to the town in myriads, and perching on these branches, add to the curious appearance of the place. The walls are battlemented, and in the port-holes are piled up six clay pipes, which, at a distance, have the appearance of small cannon. On the very top of the parapet circular pots are placed, which, also viewed from afar, looked like so many men's heads; so that when I first discovered the town, it seemed to me that all its inhabitants had mounted the roofs of their houses to see us. The pigeons of the country belong to no particular proprietors, but are not destroyed, in consequence of the manure which they produce. Some time ago an English traveller, ignorant of the value attached to these birds, having killed one with his gun, was maltreated and wounded by the people of the village. It was remarkable to see the miserable mud huts of the moderns built on some of the magnificent pillars of the ancient city.

CHAPTER VI.

Crossed the Nile—Encampment near Goornoo—Visit to the Tombs of the Kings—Memnonium—Midinet Haboo—Colossal Statues.

The next day, having crossed the river, I mounted my donkey, and, in company with Mr. Wilkinson, who had resided several years in Egypt, employed in scientific pursuits, visited the Tombs of the Kings at Biban el Moolk. Candles being lighted, we descended first into the tomb discovered by Belzoni, and called by him that of Psammis.

I suffered greatly from oppression at first entering,—as much, perhaps, from fear, as from the closeness of the air,—and returned after proceeding some way. Another party, however, descending, inspired me with more courage, and I made a second attempt. The uncomfortable sensation, arising from the lowness of the roof, and being under ground, decreased as I advanced, and as the beauty and wonder of the place soon banished every feeling but curiosity, I was enabled to enjoy all its strange and novel sights without qualification.

culables de tant de somptuosité." M. Champollion, also, in a letter, a translation of which has recently been published in the Literary Gazette, thus adverts to the indescribable grandeur of Carnac:—"I at length went to the palace, or rather, the city of monuments at Carnac: I here beheld all the magnificence of the Pharaohs, the grandest productions ever conceived and executed by man. All that I had seen at Thebes, all that I had admired with enthusiasm on the left bank, appeared miserable in comparison with the gigantic conceptions with which I was surrounded. I shall take care not to attempt to describe any thing; for either my description would not express a thousandth part of what ought to be said when speaking of such objects; or, if I drew a faint sketch of them, I should be taken for an enthusiast, or perhaps for a madman. It will suffice to add, that no people, either ancient or modern, ever conceived the art of architecture on so sublime and so grand a scale as the ancient Egyptians: their conceptions were those of men a hundred feet high; and the imagination, which in Europe rises far above our porticoes, sinks abashed at the foot of the hundred and forty columns of the Hypostyle Hall of Carnac."

The paintings, with colours as vivid as those of any modern artists,—and the engravings, in alto and basso-relievo, in perfect preservation, did not delight me so much as an unfinished chamber, the walls of which were covered with drawings previously to their being cut in the stone. These were mere outlines in black or red, but sketched with such boldness and lightness, that the more I looked the more I admired. Scarcely yet can I believe the hand that traced them to have been dead so many centuries. Many of the figures are as large as life, and though mere outlines, wrought with as much expression as a finished painting. Flaxman's illustrations may serve to give an idea of the sort of thing in miniature; but I doubt whether even these must not yield in spirit and grace to the Egyptian composition.

After leaving this tomb, we visited that opened so long ago by Bruce, supposed to be the tomb of Ramses III.; it was also exceedingly curious, and in tolerable preservation. The whole of the walls are covered with paintings; and there I beheld tables, chairs and sideboards, patterns of embossed silk and chintz, drapery with folds and fringe, precisely as an upholsterer would have fitted up a room when Egyptian furniture was in vogue. Indeed, it was an amusement to us all when I discovered some patterns exactly similar to those which I had sent, only seven years before, to a gentleman of our party.

Of the Harpers, mentioned by Bruce, one is almost defaced; and the other, I fear, will not last long; but they interested me as showing the antiquity of the instrument on which they are represented to be playing.

Mr. Wilkinson told me, that the destruction which we had observed in Belzoni's tomb, and which was evinced by large fragments lying on the ground, had taken place within three months of our visit.

No book could better have portrayed the usages of the Egyptians than these tombs. Every thing is described—in one chamber, preparing and dressing the meat, boiling the cauldron, making the bread, lighting the fire, fetching water. Another chamber presents scenes in a garden, a boy being beaten for stealing fruit, a canal, pleasure-boats, fruit, flowers, the process of various arts, such as sculpturing, painting, mixing colours, &c. Here most of the people are standing at their work, while in India, the gardener, painter, sculptor, blacksmith, cook, all sit. They do not plough the ground sitting, but I think they would if they could.

After seeing two more tombs, I was compelled to return home from fatigue. The gentlemen remained exploring till a late hour, but I could not gather from their conversation that they had met with any novelties.

In order to avoid the importunity of the town's people, we removed the next day across the Nile, and encamped on a quiet spot, close to the banks of the river, commanding a fine view of Luxor, Carnac, Goornoo, (the great repository of the dead), the Memnonium, Midinet Haboo, and the two colossal statues seated on the plain, like brother genii, in solitary grandeur.

These two statues seem to have formed the side pillars, or entrance, of some enormous gateway. I understand the learned are much puzzled to discover which of the two is the one from which the sound is said to have proceeded every morning at sunrise; but I, who do not enter deeply into these discussions, am content to believe the vocal Memnon to be that which bears so many Greek inscriptions on its foot, stating that certain persons had heard the sounds, and specifying the day and the hour on which the prodigy took place. Unless these names be considered as fabrications, I do not perceive how the doubt could have arisen.

While viewing these two statues one morning, the sight of a gentleman-like looking Turk coming towards us (Turks are seldom to be seen in such a lonely place as we were then in) surprised me a good deal. He made the usual Mahomedan salutations, and I was for the moment startled at hearing him address us in good English. The enigma, however, was soon solved, when the stranger introduced himself as Major Temple, of the 15th Hussars, lately returned from Nubia. He, with Mr. Wilkinson, who was also attired in a Turkish dress, had fitted up two tombs, in one of the Goornoo mountains, for their residence. The Turkish garb may command some respect among the Arabs of Upper Egypt, but certainly has not the same effect in the lower provinces, where the English and French nations are so much esteemed, that a Frank dress is considered the best protection.

The villagers in our vicinity, and who chiefly live in the caves of Goornoo, had a wild and resolute appearance. Every man was at this time armed with a spear, to resist, it was said, the compulsory levies of the Pasha, who found it vain to attack them in their fastnesses. I, who was so delighted with the beauty and peace of our new abode, felt quite disturbed to discover that the very spot where we were encamped had, four years before, witnessed the massacre of many hundreds of Arabs, then in resistance against this recruiting system, and who were blown from guns, or shot while endeavouring to make their escape by swimming across the river. The poor people around, however, behaved with civility to us, and I felt no apprehension at going among them with a single companion, or even alone. To be sure, we were obliged to take especial care of our property, for which purpose the chief of Luxor assisted us, by furnishing half a dozen men to watch by night round the encampment. Nevertheless, once after I had gone to sleep, I was awakened by the extinguishing of the light, and felt my little camp bed raised up by a man creeping underneath; he fled on my crying out, and escaped the pursuit, as he had the vigilance, of our six protectors.

I was greatly delighted with the temple of Medinet Haboo. A detention of some days, on account of boats, gave us ample time to expatiate among these glorious sights; but I grieved to observe, on comparing them with the descriptions of Hamilton and Denon, how much mischief had been done to all these ruins within the last twenty years. Of the eight statues at Medinet Haboo, mentioned by the former, I could not, on my first visit, discover a vestige. His explanations of the battle and hunting scenes are so much in detail, that but for the real beauty and magnificence of the whole, I should have felt some disappointment from finding that, owing to the recent dilapidations, I could seldom, after a minute inspection with his book in my hand, make out any thing like a connected story.

On a subsequent visit to Medinet Haboo, I discovered one of the statues above adverted to. They appear, by this relic, to have been of the same form (and had, in a like manner, the arms crossed over the chest) with those of the Memnonium. The circumstance of this statue being built up is likely to ensure its preservation, for it is perfectly hid from the view of any one standing in the court, by the wall in which it is inclosed.

Notwithstanding the great pains taken by Cambyzes to destroy these temples, and he left 25,000 men behind him for this purpose, the sculpture is so superabundant, that much remains uninjured. In many places the outlines of the figures, which are cut in granite, two or three inches deep, have been filled up with mud; and this, when dislodged with a small stick, showed the colours underneath in vivid preservation. I considered even this slight act an approach to profanation, but one of the gentlemen at this time of our party, imbued with a far different spirit, would, but for my remonstrance, have broken off, with sacrilegious hand, a fragment from the vocal Memnon; and another, in the same manner, while crossing the desert, threw stones into the well at Lagayta, to ascertain its depth; not recollecting that if every traveller adopted the same mode of measurement, little water would remain for the thirsty wanderer, less plentifully supplied than ourselves.

I need say little of Ebek, and the Memnonium, which already have been so well and so frequently described by others. Smitten with the superior grandeur of Carnac, I had visited the Memnonium several times before I would admit its temple to any share of my admiration, or do justice to its beauty, for the sculpture on it is in singular perfection. I was at first more occupied in wondering at the cut and graven stones, great and small, which lay scattered on the ground; huge blocks of granite, inscribed with hieroglyphics, and bearing marks of having once formed sphinxes, obelisks, pillars, &c. The large mutilated statue, called by the French the Memnon, is really stupendous, and I would have fain learned how such a block could have been removed, how it could have been chiseled, (for it is supposed the Egyptians had no iron tools) and how it could have been put up. The fragments (for I must call them such, though the smallest is large enough to form a statue for our pigmy ideas) still retain a fine polish, and will probably remain as landmarks long after the buildings in the vicinity have disappeared.

This country must be different from any other. We here lived and rode amidst a city of the dead; and from the ruins around, so much larger than life, both in the human and animal form, I could scarcely believe the former race of inhabitants not to have been of a mightier stature, and of a nature superior to our own; yet we are assured that these very people "cut off their hair upon the death of a dog, and shaved their eyebrows for a dead cat."

CHAPTER VII.

Detention at Thebes—Departure of the gentlemen for Edfoo—Arrival of a deputation of Turks from Kennah—Their astonishment at seeing a lady write—The author witnesses the opening of a mummy.

Having been thus detained a fortnight at Thebes, I was enabled to visit its various antiquities at perfect leisure. The colossal statues became like old friends, between which we used to sit down and take our refreshment, enjoying the heavenly climate; and, while repeatedly examining the majestic Carnac, we gratified our imaginations by reposing in the hall of Sesostris.

The detention, as I have before mentioned, was occasioned by the want of boats. We arrived at the time of the conscription, when every vessel was pressed for the conveyance of the recruits; and the boats sent up to us having shared the same fate, most of the gentlemen took advantage of this delay to visit Eneah and Edfoo, in a canoa belonging to Mr. Wilkinson, so small that it could not afford me accommodation also. Denon had given such an inviting description of these temples, that I regretted this disappointment greatly; and my heart failed a little when I saw my friends depart and leave me nearly alone, for the tent of the only gentleman who remained was pitched so far from mine, that I felt almost without protection. Besides, as evening shut in, the wilderness of the country, and the men by whom I was surrounded, rendered my situation somewhat lonely; but, with returning light, returned my usual cheerfulness; and while planning an excursion for the day, I perceived a party of Turks land from a handsome boat, decorated with streamers: altogether it was the gayest set out I had seen since I arrived in Egypt; and on enquiring the reason of such an invasion of our peaceful camp, it proved to be a deputation from the Cacheef of Kennah, with letters, and a long complimentary message to Mr. Elphinstone. The difficulty, however, was how to convey these, and when arrived at their destination, what would be their utility, as they were in the Turkish language, and the gentlemen had taken no interpreter on their excursion. At last, after a consultation with Antonio, it was agreed that I, being the only scribe then in camp, the letter and message should be explained to me, that I might communicate them to Mr. Elphinstone. Accordingly, having put on my veil, accompanied by Antonio, and encompassed with all the state I could summon, I entered the tent where four Turks and a Greek lad were sitting. They did not attempt to rise, but regarded me with their usual imperturbable countenances. The letter was opened in due form, and, with the message, was translated from Turkish into Arabic by the young Greek, (for the Turks, as usual, could not read,) and then explained to me in Italian by Antonio, when, after much writing, folding, sealing, and directing, I despatched my letter, amusing myself during the whole process, which I purposely protracted, with the astonishment which I knew I created—and so it proved: for though these grave Mussulmen did not betray their wonder at the time, they subsequently inquired whether other Frank ladies were so accomplished, as to read, write, fold, and seal; marvelling that, while their own women could not even talk sense, an unbelieving female should possess a knowledge of which Khadijah, the prophet's wife, was destitute.

In the evening, I accepted the invitation of Signor Piccinini, a Lucchese, in the service of the Swedish consul at Alexandria, who had resided about nine years at Thebes, to see the opening of a mummy, that I might myself take out the scarabeus, or any such sacred ornament as might be found in the coffin. The signor's dwelling was nothing more than a mud hut on the hills of Goornoo. I ascended to the only apartment by a few steps; this room contained his couch, his arms, his wine, his few drawings, and all his worldly goods. The window shutters, steps, and floor, were composed of mummy coffins, painted with hieroglyphical figures, perhaps four thousand years old; and it was curious to observe the profuse expenditure of materials to which I had been accustomed to attach ideas of value, from seeing them only in museums and collections of antiquities.

I had accompanied Signor Piccinini with great gloe, thinking what a fine thing it would be to tell my friends in England. What my notions of opening a mummy were I cannot define,—something, however, very classical and antique—certainly any thing but what it proved in reality.

Half a dozen Arabs were standing around, panting under heat, dust, and fatigue. They had only just brought in their burthen, and were watching with eager look the examination of its contents, (their profits depending upon the value of the prize,) while the candles which they held to assist the search lighted up their anxious countenances.

The outside case of the mummy was covered with hieroglyphics, and the inner one consisted of a figure as large as life, with the face and eyes painted like a mask. On lifting up this cover, nothing was seen but a mass of dark yellow cloth, which, though it must have consisted of at least fifty folds, yielded like sand to the merciless hand of the operator, and the skeleton appeared to view. It was some time before I could recover from the horror with which the scene impressed me; I saw no more, but this little was sufficient to make me consider the employment as disgusting as that of a resurrection man, and the manner of performing it not less unfeeling. It may be called the pursuit of science, but to me it appeared nothing more than rifling the dead for the sake of the trifling ornaments with which the corpse is generally buried. This, indeed, was the fact; for the moment it was ascertained that the mummy contained no ornament, the skeleton, together with the papyrus, on which were inscribed numerous distinct hieroglyphics, and the other materials, was cast forth as worthless rubbish. Sufficient papyrus and relics have been procured for the interests of science; and I think it would redound to the pasha's credit if he were to issue an edict, to clear his country from these mummy scavengers. He had, indeed, ordered all the corpses to be reinterred; but according to evident demonstration, this order was habitually disregarded. Scarabæi are scarce; a few were brought us by the Fellahs, while wandering about the ruins, though none of value. Ancient coins are procurable in abundance, but they were too numerous to prove curious, and they had certainly no beauty to attract us to be purchasers.

Signor Piccinini had found on a mummy some bracelets, about an inch wide, of small coloured beads, which were remarkable, from resembling so much the fashion of the present day, yet, from the absence of all device, not nearly so pretty. The beads, which were of coral, cornelian, garnets, amethysts, and vitreous porcelain of a bright blue colour, were strung together, and separated at every inch by a gold wire, or link, to which they were attached, in order to keep the bracelets flat on the arm. The signor thought them very handsome; but they appeared to me of no value, except for their antiquity. During the many years he had resided at Thebes, he had only discovered one mummy likely to indemnify him for the labour of excavation.

Passing through his miserable kitchen, the shelves of which were also made of ancient coffins, we entered a tomb, where lay the mummy in question, supposed to be that of a high priest. It was placed in a stone case, the lid of which was removed, and inclosed in three coffins, each having a gilt mask at the upper end. The entire lid of the last coffin was also covered with gilding, in vivid preservation, and the body was wrapped in a garment curiously wrought with gold lace, and apparently of a tough texture. The whole figure seemed as fresh as if it had been prepared a few months before, but the envelopment remained unfolded. Signor Piccinini said he might obtain five hundred dollars for this mummy at Alexandria, but he considered it of such value, that he thought of taking it himself to Tuscany. Whether or not this appreciation was to excite the cupidity of purchasers, I pretend not to determine.

The mountains in this neighbourhood, called Goornoo, have for centuries been the cemeteries for the dead: and notwithstanding the havoc which during some years has been made amongst them, their contents appear inexhaustible. It would scarcely be an exaggeration to say, the mountains are merely roofs over the masses of mummies within them. The coffins serve as fire wood to the whole neighbourhood: I saw nothing else burnt. At first I did not relish the idea of my dinner being dressed with this resurrection wood, particularly as two or three of the coffin lids,—which, as I said before, were in the shape of human figures,—were usually to be seen standing upright against the tree under which the cook was performing his operations, staring with their large eyes as if in astonishment at the new world upon which they had opened. The coffins were usually made of sycamore wood, which may serve, in some degree, to account for the almost total extinction of that tree in Upper Egypt, that, under which my tent was pitched, being the only one in the neighbourhood. This extinction, perhaps, may also be explained by the increasing aridity of the soil. As numerous pits full of mummies have been discovered in the heart of the mountains, without coffins and merely embalmed, it may be inferred that these were the bodies of the poorer classes, who could not afford that expensive mode of interment.

* This unfortunate individual is since dead, after having passed so many years of painful and revolting labour, struggling with poverty, deprived of the alleviations of civilised life, and exposed to the insults and oppression of the Turkish authorities.

"Poorly, poor man, he lived—poorly, poor man, he died."

CHAPTER VIII.

Return of the gentlemen from Edfoo—Misconduct of the Turks regarding boats for the party—Condition of the Arabs of Upper Egypt—Fertility of the soil—Paucity of inhabitants about Thebes—Description of the boat in which the author embarked for Cairo.

After an absence of six days the gentlemen returned from Edfoo. On their way thither, they saw Erment, or Hermonthis, to the inner temple of which they could not gain admittance, as it was occupied by the Turks. Near this place the Nile is remarkably narrow, not exceeding, in appearance, the breadth of one hundred and fifty yards. They seemed to have been somewhat disappointed with Edfoo; owing, perhaps, to Denon's exaggerated praise of it. After reading his description, I had set my heart upon seeing it; and I therefore was not sorry when I learned that the ardent Frenchman had, in some degree, supplied the dilapidations of time and barbarous destruction by his own vivid imagination. I feel no inclination, however, to speak of Denon but with the greatest respect; the general accuracy of his drawings and descriptions is wonderful;—indeed so much so, that I know not how he could have accomplished the task under the privations to which he was exposed. Forced marches after a flying enemy,—the heat of an Egyptian summer, blinded as he was by dust and ophthalmia,—deprived of all remedies or alleviations,—unaccustomed, from his previous habits, to the hardships of a soldier's life, and at an age when such habits are neither easily formed, nor is the constitution enabled to bear them: his good humour and activity, aided by zeal and talent, under all these adverse circumstances, are really worthy of admiration.

An elaborate account of the Temple of Edfoo would now be superfluous. It will, however, soon altogether cease to correspond with the existing delineations of it, as the inner part of the temple is occupied by people of the village, who have disfigured it by building mud partitions between the pillars, almost up to their exquisite lotus capitals, and desecrate it by every species of abomination.

On their return they landed at Eleithias. The chief objects of curiosity in these caves have been enumerated by Hamilton; but the gentlemen were much interested in tracing the striking similarity of the representations of ancient Egyptian manners and occupations with those which actually prevail among the Hindoos. The Egyptian temples, too, resemble the Hindoo in the general structure, the form of the pillars, and the darkness of the interior. The representation of mythological figures is another coincidence, though there is no decided similarity between the deities represented. There are not wanting, on the other hand, strong points of distinction—the absence of pyramidal structures, and obelisks, and hieroglyphics, in India, where the inscriptions, if any, are in alphabetical writing. It may also be observed, that the most celebrated Hindoo temples are generally excavated, whereas the Egyptian are erected.

At Esneh, or Latopolis, the person in charge of the temple readily offered the gentlemen admission, and conducted them wherever the place was accessible. But it was occupied as a storehouse for cotton, large bales of which were piled against its beautiful columns, and the hieroglyphics were much defaced by smoke.

The kaimakan of the city was extremely civil; invited the party to drink coffee, sent a present of a sheep, and lent them horses to convey them to Aphroditopolis. A full grown lioness, quietly basking in the sun, was chained to one of the pillars of the gallery through which they passed; and apparently, from the length of her chain, there was no other protection to passengers, in such a dangerous vicinity, than the animal's forbearance.

They landed at Crocodilopolis, but, notwithstanding its significant name, did not see one of the animals which abounded there formerly, and from which the place took its appellation. Indeed, if I recollect right, we saw only one crocodile during the time we were on the Nile.

After ten days' delay, the boats from Kennah arrived, but the cacheef had fixed so large a price for them, and the reis, or captain, required so much more in addition, that Antonio went off to procure others. He succeeded; but these boats, with several more which joined him on his passage, anchored two miles below Thebes, the crew being fearful of approaching till those belonging to the cacheef had been hired. When this was discovered, some of the gentlemen rode down to the spot, took possession each of a boat, and brought them up in triumph. The Turks of the cacheef's boats were so incensed when they saw this, that they fired three shots over one of the cangias* to intimidate the men. Matters, however, were at last accommodated, and all the boats were divided among the party; those of the cacheef being taken at an exorbitant price, with the intimation, however, that a complaint respecting the exaction would be made to the pasha. The above arrangements brought us to the 18th of January, an unfortunate loss of time, as I feared to encounter the plague at Alexandria, and in consequence a lengthened quarantine at Malta. Moreover, the state of politics made us anxious to leave Egypt, though it was scarcely possible to fancy a more peaceful country at that time. If I were to judge from what I saw, I should call the Arabs of Upper Egypt a happy people, notwithstanding the dwellings of the poorer class were wretched in the extreme; indeed, they generally lived in holes in the mountains, in order to place themselves in security from the inundation of the Nile. But as I wandered through the villages on the plain, the donkey drivers constantly offered me to partake of excellent wheaten bread; the sheep and cattle were abundant; the milk rich; and eggs were in such plenty that we need to obtain eighty for a piastre.†

The soil of Egypt may truly be called luxuriant, and the surprising variety of the crops give a pleasing novelty to our rides. Plains of the richest clover, in which the cattle revelled uncontrolled, besides fields of wheat, maize, beans of the sweetest scent, indigo, cotton, flax, (and I must not omit the blue lupine, which is here used as an article of food,) were to be seen extending in every direction. Still, amidst all this fruitfulness, I could not help remarking the loneliness of Thebes itself, (if I may so denominate Carnac and Luxor,) and how few animals and birds, pigeons alone excepted, broke the universal stillness. To my eye, accustomed to the swarming multitudes of Calcutta, the paucity of inhabitants here was very conspicuous. The absence, also, of all fishermen on the Nile was yet more remarkable. On the Ganges, hundreds of fishermen may be observed, and vessels are frequently obliged to alter their course, to avoid injuring the numerous nets; but at Thebes I never perceived any person engaged in that employment, and the Nile flows silently and tranquilly along, undisturbed by a single boat. Meditating on this diversity, my imagination, rapidly passing over the occurrences of many weeks, transported me back to India, and forced upon me the contrast of Calcutta, the city of palaces, in the very pruriency of traffic and population, with the once magnificent Thebes, the city of a hundred gates, devoid of inhabitants, without commerce, and lying waste, in all the desolation of ruined majesty.

Our servant had the whole morning been cleaning the maash selected for us, from the mud and dirt, which adhered to it at least two inches thick. The outside had already dispelled any illusions I might have had of its resemblance to Cleopatra's galley, but when I entered it, I confess I was quite dismayed. A common coal barge on the river Thames would have afforded better accommodation. Two small cabins in the stern, the wooden partitions besmeared with dirt, every plank divided, some entirely broken out, admitting sun, wind, and rats, and the lowness of the ceiling, which did not allow of my standing upright, made me look round in hopeless discomfort. Few minutes, however, elapsed before our tent was dismantled, the walls thrown over the top of the boat, and a projecting pole added, which, with the help of our trunks for a platform, and a carpet over them, formed a sort of verandah. We nailed table-cloths on the ceiling and sides of the cabin, and the openings most exposed to cold I closed with little coloured mats, which I happened to have brought with me from India. The carpet was spread; our two little brass camp beds soon looked like sofas, and it was no small gratification to me to see a clean, comfortable, nay, almost pretty habitation, instead of the dirty dismal hole I had entered an hour before.

* The boats employed on the Nile are maashes, djerms, dahabears, and cangias. The maash is a barge, used for accommodation or for burthen; the djeerm, somewhat lighter and swifter, for the latter purpose exclusively. Dahabears and cangias differ little in size and construction; the latter being smaller, and better calculated for expedition: both are employed solely for the conveyance of passengers.

† Fifteen piastres one dollar—one piastre, not quite three pence.

CHAPTER IX.

Departure from Thebes—Dendera—Accident on return from thence—Want of cleanliness in the Arabs—Instances of their inoffensiveness and distrust—Siout—Bennihassen—First sight of the Pyramids.

Having thus long pitched our tents at Thebes I looked upon it as a home, and quitted it with much regret. We embarked on the 18th of January, and on the 19th arrived at Dendera, situated just opposite to Kennah, the cacheef of which place had behaved so ill about the boats, that we determined not to land. It was not without threats, however, that we made the reis pass on, Kennah being the usual place for obtaining supplies; but no sooner did we cast anchor, than the boat's crew, our servant, and interpreter, all deserted us. Next morning, after tracking in a boat an hour and a half, and riding another hour, we reached the temple of Dendera. But the first view in the distance was less striking than I had anticipated. The portico alone was visible, and it was only upon a closer examination that I found much to admire, as the building itself is heavy, and the pillars, though they have been so highly praised, cannot justly be called beautiful.

The Egyptians being unacquainted with the scientific principles of the arch,* their pillars are always too much crowded together, but their height, and elegant proportions, and the absence of ceiling, generally diminish this defect. Not so at Dendera: the portico, which is roofed in, and in perfect preservation, consists of twenty-four pillars, three in a row, and the four enormous faces of the goddess Isis, upon the capital of each, give the building a very clumsy appearance. The sculpture on the walls is extremely fine; and though most of the figures have been defaced with peculiar care, some intervening event must have arrested the progress of the destroying hand. The very spot is marked, one half of a figure in the middle of a row is defaced, and the other half, with two ranges of figures above, remains entire. When I discovered the western wall of the temple, my admiration was unbounded. It is in perfect preservation. The figures are finer, the proportions better, and the carving much superior to those on any building I had yet seen. The wall consists of immense blocks of stone, so smooth, and well put together, that the joints do not break the line of exquisite sculpture. One warrior is represented with a flowing robe, of such transparent workmanship, that the limbs are visible through it. But the whole of this noble edifice has already been described, and well justifies the praises bestowed upon it by Hamilton and Denon. It is equally wonderful in its magnitude, and the profusion of its ornaments, as in the combination it exhibits of the refined taste of the Greeks, with the solidity and splendour of more ancient times; and it is a curious fact that the Greeks and Romans continued to adopt the Egyptian style of architecture in the sacred edifices raised by them after the country had come under their dominion. The names deciphered at Dendera are comparatively modern,—Ptolemy, Tiberius, Claudius, Domitian, Trajan, and Antonine.

On our return from the temple, I was nearly meeting with an awkward adventure. After a long ride, we found we had missed the place where we had left the ferry-boat, and that we had to cross a quicksand before we could reach our maash. In a minute, my donkey sank up to the saddle, and one second more saw me off its back, and thrown across the shoulder of an Arab: no sack of corn could have been treated with less ceremony. At any other time, I should have shuddered at the approach of his garment to within a yard of my person. But when I had recovered from my first surprise, my ridiculous position would have made me laugh audibly, had I not been fearful that, if the man had caught the contagion, he might have let me fall into the stream. Fortunately I did not recollect, at that moment, the confession of an Arab boatman, with whom I remonstrated on his want of cleanliness, and who, on my questioning him how often he washed, answered, with apparent simplicity, that he had only done so three times in his life, when the ceremonies of his religion peremptorily required it. What a contrast to the practice of the Hindoos, who never allow a day to pass without plenary ablution, and who, in the coldest weather, bathe their shivering limbs in the Ganges, allowing the clothes, which they wash with themselves, to dry on their persons!

I should not forget to mention that the deputy of the governor of Kenneh, fearing the consequence of our threatened appeal to the pasha, who severely punishes extortion on the part of his officers towards strangers, came on board to offer his apologies, which were of course accepted, as the principal motive for resisting the demands for the boats was to preserve future travellers from similar exactions.

Passing How, where the French defeated the Mamelukes, we reached Girgeh on the 23d. This town contains a convent, the superior and monks of which dress in the Arab style. One of them, Padre Ladelao, a Roman, who was at Cairo when the English prisoners taken in General Fraser's unfortunate expedition were there, had resided fifteen or sixteen years at Girgeh. He mentioned that there were in the place, eight hundred or one thousand Christians, of whom about four hundred were Catholics, the rest Copts, at least in name. The Coptic church is descended from the ancient Eutyrians and Jacobites of the Monophysite heresy.

The wind being very high, we were obliged to anchor under a range of mountains, in which were many holes, or mammy pits, inhabited by Arabs apparently very poor. Mr. L. and I walked about a mile from the boat, and fell in with some of these men, of the wildest appearance, feeding their flocks. We selected a sheep which we wished to purchase, and agreed on the terms, but no persuasion could induce the Arabs to take it to the boat till they had the money in hand. We had none with us, as our interpreter as well as our signs explained, but we promised to pay them the moment we reached the boat, which was then in sight. Their incredulity, however, was such that, poor as they were, they permitted us to depart, rather than depend upon our promise.

Belzoni mentions that a promise to an Arab is a thing of nought, and this, I could imagine, might be the case at Philæ; but not within a short distance of Cairo, where traffic cannot, I should presume, always be carried on in ready money. Perhaps they apprehended oppression similar to that which they experienced from the Turks, who, I believe, forcibly seize every thing they stand in need of.

Our boat's crew breakfasted on coffee, poached or hard eggs, and bread. They frequently purchased meat in addition to that which we gave them; which surprised me, as I had heard so much of their poverty. Although there is plenty of fish in the Nile, some of which I tasted and found good, the Arabs do not trouble themselves to take it, as they find the cultivation of the soil more profitable. The mention of these circumstances reminds me of an instance of the unceremoniousness of our insubordinate crew. Having procured a sheep, I promised them a portion of it; but while I was giving directions to the servant as to what parts to retain, I found they had spared me the trouble of subdivision, by appropriating, without further authority, the best half to themselves.

The north wind continued so strong that the boat made little progress, and we were enabled to land generally when we felt inclined. Frequently, accompanied only by my female servant, I wandered to a considerable distance from the boat. The reis at first remonstrated with me upon my temerity, and recommended me to have an armed attendant, but notwithstanding I disregarded his warnings, I met with no alarms. The Fellahs, carrying loads of forage on their asses or camels, permitted us to pass without interruption, and their wives generally stopped to open their baskets filled with rice, eggs, and bread, in hopes of sale. Were it not for the voyage from Alexandria to Malta, and the quarantine, I could fancy, to a person fond of change, no less than variety than passing a winter in Egypt. The climate is exhilarating in the extreme; the sailing and floating down the Nile attended with no trouble; the scenery beautiful; and, indeed, the lasting gratification of seeing such objects as Thebes and the Pyramids is worth greater sacrifices than a sea voyage and a temporary imprisonment.

We were soon obliged to desire the Reis to anchor below a town or village, for, on approaching Lower Egypt, we had come to the vicinity of the Turks, who were more curious and presuming than the Arabs, and usually assembled to see what the boat contained. The women, too, were importunate, coming down to beg, and whining out "Meskeen Khawajah," which means "I am poor, merchant," an appellation they give to every one in a Frank dress, for it never enters into their contemplation that a person can travel for pleasure, or from any other motive than gain; perhaps, however, this term is intended as one of respect when applied to Christians.

Sicut, the capital of Upper Egypt, where we landed on the 27th, is a nice looking town, with several good minarets. The house of Ibrahim Pasha, the governor, who is also son-in-law to Mahomed Ali, was far superior to any we had seen in this country; but the materials of it were not more substantial. The people were not uncivil, and apparently accustomed to Europeans. A Turkish boy, however, of about fifteen years old, deprived us of a couple of asses we had just hired, by intimidating the driver. Being in front of the Turkish main guard, it was prudent to submit to this act of insolence.

Signor Massari, a Neapolitan physician employed here by the pasha as a vaccinator, informed us that the ambassadors of England, France and Russia, had left Constantinople; a piece of intelligence which rendered me more anxious than ever to proceed.

On the night of the 28th we were off Antinoë, built by Hadrian, in honour of his favourite, Antinous, who was supposed to have been drowned in the Nile near this spot. Its ruins, described by Hamilton, induced some of the gentlemen, though it was so late as eleven o'clock, to visit them. After a good deal of trouble, they procured a guide from the village; and, at the end of a desolate walk, they were disappointed by finding every relic of value removed, it was said, for materials for the new buildings at Sicut, and to embellish the duffurdar's palace at Cairo. It would have been gratifying to have seen these ruins, and thus been enabled to compare the architecture of Hadrian's city on the banks of the Nile, with Hadrian's magnificent villa near Rome.

On reaching Bennisnassen, we anchored just below the grottoes which are half-way up the mountain. Within a square cut in the rock, is seen a temple supported by pillars, on which rests a pediment. These pillars, which are more in the Grecian than the Egyptian style, are singularly elegant, having their shafts composed of four rods compressed at the neck of the capital which is formed by their expansion. The scenes on the walls are excellently described by Hamilton. The colours were a good deal covered by dirt and smoke, but when we removed these with a wet towel, fixed to the end of a pole, we were all surprised at a brilliant picture making its appearance. The colours are occasionally very vivid; the green, lilac, and light blue, of the plumage of some birds, represented in the act of being snared, are particularly fine. I observed no mythological figures here, and few hieroglyphics. On this spot I was struck with the quantities of little flattened stones, or, as it were, pieces of burnt clay of a sand colour, about the size of a shilling, and called by the natives angels' money; they were as numerous on these mountains as shingles on the seashore.

As we advanced towards Cairo, the navigation of the Nile became more precarious, and the maash frequently got aground, where our course, from a partial depth of the stream, seemed least liable to interruptions. Two maashes, sunk in a rocky and dangerous part of the river, almost a whirlpool, proved the risk we encountered in going on at night; and yet this we were compelled to do, from the violence of the contrary wind which prevailed during the day.

The next morning, on looking out of the maash, I was struck by seeing what appeared to me a mountain of singular shape, inclining to one side, as if the foundation had partially given way. A little below, the view of the Pyramids of Ghizeh first broke upon me; and as the mountain above mentioned made them look small, they did not fill me with that degree of astonishment which I had expected them to excite. Great, therefore, was my surprise to find that what I had imagined to be a mountain, was called the false pyramid—which, from being nearer, and built upon a mound, seemed, though the reverse, of a larger size than the others. Had I at first known the truth, the effect would, perhaps, have been far more imposing; but, as it was, I looked and looked, and endeavoured to raise myself to something like enthusiasm, but I could not succeed. The Pyramids still continued to be, in my eyes, no more than the pigmy efforts of human imperfection to rival the surrounding mountains.

CHAPTER X.

Approach to Cairo—Ride from the boats to the Consulate—Apprehension of the Plague—Excursion through the city and its environs—Duffurdar—Anecdote of the Pasha's summary justice—Tombs of the Mamaluke Sultans—Wretched condition of the Children—Visit to Shoobra—Anecdote of the Pasha's affection for his late wife.

Our approach to Cairo was not under favourable auspices. The rain which, for the last three days, had so unusually prevailed, continued to drizzle, and the cloudy sky added to the melancholy appearance of the decayed and deserted barrack-looking houses on each side the Nile, in which the casements were broken, if they had ever been glazed. A few stragglers along the banks, and no boats in activity on the river, gave but little idea of our vicinity to a capital.

The first thing which attracted my attention after the Pyramids, was a castellated building, perched on the summit of the mountain on the right bank of the river—so high and so obscured by the mist, that I had no idea of what it was till I looked through a telescope, when it proved a picturesque fort, of the same colour as the mountain on which it stood; and, from the latter being scarped from top to bottom, the ascent outside appeared very difficult. We pulled on till two hours after dark, and remained all night in a creek of the river, to avoid the noise of the numerous craft in the principal stream, and also to escape a visit from the rats, which are ever ready to shift their quarters on the arrival of a new vessel. A steam-boat was lying opposite the island of Rhoda, where the Indian army was encamped in 1801. Next morning we landed at Bulae, and found horses and donkeys provided for us by the kindness of Mr. Malas, acting for Mr. Barker, the English consul, then at Alexandria. The gentleman went first, and after despatching our baggage to Cairo, I mounted my dapple, and, attended by Antonio the Italian servant, followed to the consulate.

I felt some little nervousness at the idea of riding through the crowded streets at noon; but there proved no just cause of apprehension from the people, who, though they looked intently, and one or two Turks made observations to each other, offered not the slightest incivility.

I believe the women I met eyed me with as much interest as I regarded them. They resembled friars more than women; appearing generally coarse and fat, riding en cavalier, and enveloped in a loose, shapeless garment of black silk, which covered the head as well as the figure, and on the forehead joined a piece of white linen, which descended in a peak to the waist, and which, without sticking close, concealed the face like a mask. Two holes were cut in this for the eyes, sometimes so large that one might guess at the character of the face beneath; and the cloth, from the forehead down to the tip of the nose, was adorned with a row of sequins, or other ornaments. Altogether the whole dress was grotesque and ugly. Many streets were so narrow that, but for the blows of the donkey drivers, I think I should have been squeezed to death by the camels and their loads. Men, horses, donkeys, and camels, all hurried on, without the least regard to whom or what might be in their way, and yet all appeared to escape with safety. The day was still overcast, and the sight of so many narrow streets and deserted houses, both then and the day before, filled me with a melancholy I could not shake off, and which was not diminished by the appearance of the consulate where we were to lodge. Mr. Salt being lately dead, the house was consequently uninhabited, and, to an English eye, unfurnished.

The conversation, in the evening, turned on the plague; and we heard that one accident (the term used for a death by plague) had already occurred. It was natural, therefore, on retiring to my gloomy chamber at night, to dwell on this awful subject. These meditations were not cheered by the sight of an iron bedstead and several bottles of camphor on a bureau, indicating the precautions observed against infection; and I felt an increased dejection from having, in the morning, received letters which transported me in idea to England, and all the smiling comforts of a home, where happily such dreadful afflictions are unknown. Casting off, however, these lugubrious reflections, I joined my friends next day in an excursion to view the various objects of interest within our reach.

Crossing the Esbequier, or great square, we came to the house of the duffurdar who married the pasha's daughter, to which a garden is attached, with a summer-house or pavilion in it, and a marble fountain. The orange trees were in full fruit: the most conspicuous flowers were French marigolds, interspersed in the same beds with large cabbages; the fruit, flower, and kitchen garden being thus combined in one.

It was in this garden where General Kleber was assassinated. We saw the spot where he was standing, and the well to which his murderer fled for concealment. It is well known that the assassin was impaled, and that he survived three days in agony. The adjoining house to this palace is a humble one, but it was that in which Bonaparte held his head-quarters while at Cairo. The dasturidar is much disliked; he was said to be of a sanguinary disposition, and only kept in check by the pasha. It was generally stated that, since Mahomed Ali had felt himself secure in the pashalic, he had ceased to be cruel; seldom, of late years, taking away life, and never with torture; and if the subordinate Turks were as well disposed as himself, the Arabs, notwithstanding the oppressive taxes, would feel their property more secure. One instance of his prompt justice excited much astonishment; yet a more deliberate method would not probably, with such a people, have produced an equal effect. A Cachef, who had not long been accustomed to the Pasha's rule, punished one of his own servants with death. The chief was called before Mahomed, who asked him by what authority he committed this outrage. He replied that the man was his own servant. "True," retorted the Pasha, "but he was my subject;" and with that he passed sentence, and had the unfortunate Cachef immediately beheaded—an effectual warning to the rest of the grandees present. The above act of severity has saved the life of many of the Arabs, who, in former times, would have been sacrificed by their Turkish masters on the most trifling pretences.

Passing near the ancient mosque called Sultaun Hakim's, and the lofty gateway denominated Babool Futah, we proceeded by the Babool Nusar, the handsomest gate of the city, and built in the grand Saracenic style. It is impossible to see Cairo without being struck with the size and durability of the ancient edifices, compared with the fragility of those of modern date. However, these are relative terms, for the times of Saladin, which in England I should call ancient, I must in Egypt term modern, and shall express my meaning more clearly if I say the fragility of the buildings erected within the last one hundred and fifty years: all these are going to decay, while those of seven or eight hundred years ago are standing, and if left to time, without being dilapidated by man, will, to all appearance, last for some centuries to come. On our way we passed by a small red and white striped house, in which Buckhardt died. His name is never mentioned without paenegyric, and expressions of deep regret.

The ultimate object of our excursion was the tombs of the Mamaluke Sultauns. These are situated, as it would appear, in the very heart of the desert; and it struck me as one of the most singular features of Grand Cairo, that, from the very centre of population, from a scene of luxuriant cultivation, we in a moment, without the slightest preparation, passed on to a plain and hills of sand. Not a tree, not a habitation breaks the uniformity of the surface: nothing is visible but a district of graves, extending as far as the eye can reach; and, where the stones are no longer perceptible, little hillocks of sand mark the places of sepulture.

Amidst this desolation arise the tombs of the Mamalukes. The largest is that of Sultan Beerkook and his followers. It is in the form of a square, and its walls are in excellent preservation. On one side, in an arched and vaulted room inlaid with coloured marbles, are placed his remains; at the extremity of an open gallery is a similar room, now used as a mosque. The square is embellished with a minar and dome. The latter especially, with the pulpit or muezzin, is cut in the most elegant and delicate fretwork of stone.

The rest of the building was occupied by poor Arabs, who lived by begging, and in this dwelling are safe from taxes and extortion.

The wretchedness of the children was beyond anything I had ever seen; several were totally blind, others almost so, and some who had lost one eye, and evidently, from disease and dirt, were losing the other, excited my utmost compassion. It was in vain I explained to their parents the necessity of cleanliness; they replied, "water was cold, water would make them worse," and returned to the clamour for buckraes, which they appeared to value above the blessing of sight. Many of these little wretches wore strings of blue beads as necklaces and bracelets, and others had bunches of them hung on their ears, while their eyes swarmed with flies, rendering them the most piteous objects I ever beheld.

As I had already seen an Egyptian garden, I looked forward to an excursion to Shooobra, the country seat of the pasha, with little or no curiosity. Proceeding, however, by a fine road, planted on each side with acacias and sycamores, whose growth, owing to the richness of the soil, kept pace with the impatient disposition of the pasha, who had, at one sweep, cut down the avenue of mulberry trees three years before, we arrived at the house, which is situated close to the Nile, and commands a fine prospect of the river and city.

The exterior of the building exhibited nothing remarkable. On ascending a terrace a few feet square, we passed through a rough wooden door, such as is fit only for an outhouse, and found ourselves in the pasha's room of audience. It was matted, and round the walls was fixed a row of cushions, on two corners of which were placed satin pillows, marking the seat the pasha occupied according to the position of the sun. Just over a low ledge in the door, we stepped into a small room with a bedding on the floor; this was his sleeping chamber. Surely never monarch had so little luxury or state. Thence we came at once to the magnificent suite of apartments appropriated to the chief lady of the harem.

The centre of the principal room formed a sort of octagon, with three recesses, all inlaid with marble. From the four corners opened four smaller rooms, fitted with splendid divans and cushions of velvet, and cloth of gold; and a set of marble baths completed this series of elegant apartments.

The ceilings, executed by a Greek artist, were lofty and vaulted, ornamented with gold and representations of landscapes, or of palaces and colonnades, the whole painted in light and pleasing colours.

The sultana's private sitting room was still more sumptuous. The ceiling consisted of a circus of palaces, the columns and arches of which were delineated with a most successful regard to perspective. These apartments were until lately occupied by the pasha's deceased wife, mother of Ibrahim Pasha, by a former husband. Their splendour was singularly contrasted with the plainness of those inhabited by the pasha himself. This led one of my friends to ask if I was not penetrated with so convincing a proof of the gallantry of the Turk: and he challenged me to cite the English husband who would have done so much for the exclusive gratification of his wife. To which I could only reply that, with my erratic propensities, I should not willingly resign the privilege of locomotion for such proofs of affection; and that I apprehended few English women would answer either the pasha's or Sancho Panza's idea of a good wife, by continually remaining, according to the latter's proverb, "like an honest woman at home, as if her leg were broken."

Mahomed Ali's late consort had great influence over him during her life, as he considered his marriage with her the foundation of his good fortune. She was esteemed and beloved by the people, for her influence was ever employed on the side of justice and mercy. Much of her time was occupied in receiving petitions; but it was seldom she had to refer them to the pasha, as her power was too well known by the ministers to require this last appeal. If, however, in consequence of any demur on their part, she had to apply to him, he answered their remonstrance by saying—"It is enough. By my two eyes! if she requires it, the thing must be done; be it through fire, water, or stone."

His highness, during the heats of summer, sits below, in a room particularly adapted for coolness, and having a marble fountain in the centre. On one of the walls is inscribed, in large Arabic characters, a verse from the Koran, signifying "An hour of justice is worth seventy days of prayer."

The gardens of Shooobra, with their golden fruit and aromatic flowers, having already been described by former travellers, I shall pass on to the magnificent pavilion, which constitutes the chief embellishment of the place, and which was completed only a few weeks before my visit. This pavilion is about two hundred and fifty feet long by two hundred broad. On its sides run four galleries, or colonnades, composed of elegant pillars of the finest white marble (of an order resembling the composite), surrounding a sunken court of six feet deep, paved throughout with the same beautiful material. At each corner of the colonnade is a terrace, over which water passes into the court below in a murmuring cascade, having on its ledges figures of fish, sculptured so true to nature that, with the flowing stream, they appear to move. The whole supply of water rises again through a fountain in the centre, and re-appears in a beautiful jet-d'eau, lofty, sparkling, and abundant. One seldom sees an exhibition of this character without apprehending a failure of water; but here the works are fed by the Nile, and the spectator is aware that its exuberance will not cease.

In fine weather, the pasha occasionally resorts to this splendid fountain with the ladies of his harem, who row about in the flooded court for the amusement of his highness, while he is seated in the colonnade. Great is the commotion when the ladies descend into the garden. A signal is given, and the gardeners vanish in an instant. We were all struck with the ruddy cheeks and healthy appearance of these men. They were principally Greeks; and the gay colours of their fanciful costume—each with a nosegay or bunch of fruit in his hand—combined with the luxuriant scenery around, gave them more the semblance of actors in a ballet representing a fête in Arcadia, than the real labourers of a Turkish despot.

CHAPTER XI.

Visit to the citadel—Labour of the women and children—Splendid view from the terrace—The pasha's palace—Slave market—Cemetery of the pasha's family—Tusoon Pasha—Immel Pasha.

The next day, while the gentlemen were gone to visit the governor of Cairo,* I followed to the citadel, accompanied by Osman, the Scotsman, so often mentioned by travellers in Egypt, who now practises physic in the city, and has received the title of effendi from the pasha. After passing many splendid mosques, we ascended through a gate, which still retained shot-marks and other indications of former warfare, and entered at once on a paved road, very steep, and inclosed between high walls. "Here it was," whispered Osman, "that those persons, whose names I will not mention, were massacred on their return from visiting the pasha." A painful feeling made me look round to see if there was no escape; there was none; and no resistance could have availed, as the assailants were above, protected by the walls, whence they fired in perfect security on the Mamalukes—who, with their attendants and horses pressing on each other, formed a dense mass below. I shuddered as I beheld in imagination the slaughter of these unfortunate people, utterly helpless, unable to fly, indeed scarcely able to move.

Osman made the only excuse which could be given for this treacherous act—that policy required it, for that the Mamalukes were conspiring against the pasha, and if he had not killed them they would have destroyed him. Those best acquainted with the pasha, say he was himself much disturbed during the day, and reproved, by his silence and a look, one of his Frank physicians who alluded to the subject with levity.

The citadel, which was much shaken four years ago by the explosion of a magazine, is now undergoing a thorough repair. We here saw many vestiges of this destructive accident, the effects of which were aggravated by its having occurred when the plague was at its height; for persons, who had shut themselves up to avoid contagion, were obliged to fly from their houses, mingle with the crowd, and assist in extinguishing the fire which followed the explosion. Among the ruins about to be pulled down, I grieved to observe some interesting relics of the reign of Saladin: one of these, his hall, which might long have stood the ravages of time, is to make room for a square. The roof of this edifice is very beautiful. It is formed of a succession of little domes made of wood, into which are introduced concave circles, containing octagons of blue and gold. The corners and arches of the building are carved in the best Gothic manner, and in many places the colours and gilding continue perfectly bright.

Parties of women and children were running up and down the precipitous rock on which the citadel stands, on planks, without railing, removing the rubbish, and carrying mortar for the new building. My heart ached when I saw these poor creatures struck with a thick stick which the overseer flourished in his hand; though but for the blows I should scarcely have known they were not all in play, as they were singing in the loudest key; this, however, I afterwards learned, was compulsory. The different parties, in presenting themselves for work, almost tore the overseer to pieces, screaming out their song, and never ceasing to run round and round, like so many dervishes, in a circle, till their hods were emptied or filled. Moved by their apparently hard fate, I was lamenting my inability to relieve the whole of the wretched crowd, when, after a longer inspection, I observed with astonishment how little either the children or women seemed to care for it themselves—the former, with all the hilarity of their early age, were dancing about, and running up and down without their burthens, evidently for pleasure. While the women slunk away, hiding under the guns, and behind the rubbish, and when detected by the harassed overseer, only fled from the expected blow with a loud laugh; in the end, I scarcely knew who was most to be pitied, the overseer or themselves. Each village sends a certain number of inhabitants for the public works, and also an overseer, who being of the same village, and a countryman, might be expected to feel more compassion than a Turk. The labourers are supplied with as much bread as they can eat, in fact are better fed than they would be at home; and on the collection of the taxes, a small sum is remitted to them, equal, I believe, to a penny a day each. Leaving the above scene, so painful to an English eye, I joined the party at Joseph's well, the work of Saladin's vizier, whose name was Yusuf, (the Arabic for Joseph,) easily, but erroneously, transformed into that of the patriarch Joseph.

* The governor received the party very courteously, and patted one of them on the back incredulously, when he said he had been thirty years in India, and did not mean to return; not understanding how any person could tear himself from that country after so long a residence. The Italian interpreter knelt at his feet. On leaving the audience-chamber, the gentlemen saw about twenty of the household ranged in a line, saying prayers, according to the motions of a Moolah placed in front as a fugleman.

After examining this famous well, too much known by the description of former travellers to require any comments of mine, we ascended to the terrace leading to the pasha's palace, whence there is a magnificent view of Cairo and the surrounding country; white palaces, old and decayed houses, numerous mosques, with their lofty and elegant minarets, the Nile flowing through fields in perfect verdure, and bearing on its bosom the boats of the country, with their picturesque lateen sails,* the distant pyramids, the huge mosque of Sultan Hassan almost at the foot of the terrace, the burying grounds outside the city studded with white tombs, the busy market places, the white and green tents of the military, the elegant mausoleums of the Mameluke caliphs,—even the large mounds of rubbish from their contrast, formed a prospect in itself almost worth a journey from India to behold. We then entered the palace, infinitely more splendid and capacious than that at Shoobra; the grand hall measuring between the divans one hundred and fifty by one hundred and twenty feet, with large plate-glass windows, and paved with marble slabs, of the extraordinary size of eighteen feet in the square. The furniture of the side-rooms was cloth of gold embossed with tulips and roses, in purple and green velvet, and had been brought from Constantinople.

I conclude that persons, by a long residence in Egypt, become callous to the fear of the plague; but I confess it had not decreased with me, for as, on my return from the citadel, I rode along the crowded bazaar, the coming in contact with some of the wretched and diseased people filled me with apprehension. Nor could this collision always be avoided, although I had a man walking on each side of my donkey, and a chioush in front to clear the way. Nobody seems surprised in the streets, whatever may be the encounter, whether with a brick-loaded camel, (a tremendous opponent in a narrow lane,) a water-carrier's mule, or a couple of bullocks abreast. When, however, in addition to the customary obstacles, I was stopped by a marriage procession, I despaired of escape, for these mendicants are in the habit of silently touching you to attract attention, and, by way of asking charity, or thanking you for it, they take your hand and kiss it before you are aware of their intention. These incidents may appear of little moment to those who quietly read of them by their fireside, but happening to the traveller in a land of contagion, are subjects of anxiety.

The slave market is a small square, in which were a few people eating very comfortably together, some of whom, it was said, were slaves, but no distress or misery was to be discovered, and the whole scene had so little singularity about it, that our party soon passed on, partaking of that indifference which seemed to pervade all the inmates of the place in question. On a terrace above were perceived a few girls and children from Darfour, stated to be for sale, who were laughing very heartily, and amusing themselves at the curiosity they excited. Feeling hearts need not grieve over such a state of slavery. Slaves are usually treated with kindness in Asia, and in most other countries, except where Europeans are concerned, and are, in many instances, happier in that condition than in their original state, which is generally one of extreme penury and wretchedness. Let me not, however, be supposed to say any thing in extenuation of West India slavery, or its horrible mode of supply.

Among the curiosities of Cairo is the cemetery of the pasha's family. It is a vaulted stone building, consisting of five domes, under which, in splendid marble tombs, ornamented with painting and gold, repose the bodies of the pasha's two sons, Tussoon Pasha and Ismael Pasha. Here also is buried Mahomed Ali's first and favourite wife, mother of the present Ibrahim Pasha, so well known in Greece. The pasha's sister is buried in a tomb he had intended for himself. On a pillar, erected at the foot of this tomb, which, as usual, looks towards Mecca, is the distinguishing mark of the grave of a female. A turban at the top of the pillar designates that of a man.

The body of Tussoon Pasha, who died suddenly in Upper Egypt, was forwarded in a cangia to Shoobra. The pasha was then at Ghizeh, and only hearing that his son was ill, instantly sent to Cairo for an Italian physician, and hurried to Shoobra in the greatest anxiety. When arrived, he immediately called for his son, and the attendants, unwilling to tell the distressing news, pointed to the cangia—rushing in, the pasha ascertained the afflicting truth. Having followed the corpse on foot to the place of interment, he shut himself up, and was for some time inconsolable; on the third day, however, he called his ministers around him, and said that his grief had been such, that at first he could have killed himself, but that now he must no further yield to affliction, nor longer cease to recollect that he was the father of his people. After this he proceeded to business, and gave his orders as usual. Independent of the pasha's affection for this young man—and every one represents him as being a fond and indulgent father—he must have deplored his death in a political point of view, as he had now only one surviving son. Tussoon was also much regretted by the people. He was said to be mild, kind, and generous; indeed, his liberality amounted to such profusion, as not always to please the old pasha;—for instance, once when some arms, splendidly inlaid, had arrived from Europe for sale, Mahomed Ali enquired the price of one of the guns, and being told it was 10,000 piastres, refused to take it for that sum. "But," said he, "I will deal fairly; I will weigh the gun against piastres, and will pay for the value of the materials and workmanship in gold." It weighed 9000 piastres.

The pasha then heard Tussoon order the rest of the arms into his tent, without enquiring their cost, to be distributed in presents to his Meem Bashees, and other followers. "Aha!" exclaimed the pasha, "to whom do these arms belong? who sends into Tussoon's tents presents to the value of 10,000 piastres? where is his head? Take care," turning to Mr. Walmas, the purveyor of these articles, "that presents only to the amount of one purse, or one purse and a half at most, be placed at the disposal of that foolish young man."—"Who am I?" replied Tussoon, "that I should be thus restricted? Am I not a pasha of three tails? and shall I not give presents according to my rank?" This story has no particular point, except as showing the arbitrary character of the pasha, and how it yielded to indulgence towards his son, for it ended in allowing him to appropriate the presents; nor should I mention it, but as tending to refute the improbable tale that he had hastened the death of his favourite child;—however, when the pasha talks of taking off heads, even in jest, I suspect the surrounding crowd cannot feel themselves quite at their ease.

The guards made some demur before they allowed me to pass into the cemetery of Ali Pasha, the great predecessor of Mahomed Ali. I was more pleased with these tombs than those of Mahomed Ali's family, as they were delicately carved in fret-work of marble, while the simplicity of the others was spoiled by ornaments of painting and gold.

Nobody thought it worth while to ascend the mountain which overhangs the city, to visit Jebbel Jehusi, said to be the site of the Egyptian Babylon.

CHAPTER XII.

Ascent of the great pyramid of Ghizeh—Sphinx—Rude behaviour of the Arabs—Pyramids of Abousir, Sacarra, and Dashedour—Visit to Signor Cavaglia—Site of Memphis—Stone Quarries.

After crossing the river a gentle ride of three hours brought us to the pyramids of Ghizeh. The ascent of the great pyramid, the only one that can be called accessible,* had been so differently represented, that I could form no just idea of its facility or difficulty. Savary talks of the great pains and many efforts necessary to effect it, and mentions that, after having descended, without falling into the abyss below, he looked up to the

* The upper part of the other large pyramid (that of Cephrenes) is covered with a coating of stones or marble, which scarcely affords any footing. It has, however, been ascended by one or two Englishmen, besides Arabs. The entrance is now closed by stones which have fallen in.

pyramid with horror. Count de Noé again, says, that he arrived at the summit, "avec la plus grande peine, épuisé de fatigue, et dans un état d'étourdissement difficile à décrire." Dr. Clarke* relates that one of his military companions was so overcome by the arduousness of mounting the pyramid, that he abandoned the attempt in despair, until his friends, returning from the top, urged him to resume his efforts, which were at last successful. On the other hand, Major Sherer asserts that the pyramid is ascended without further inconvenience than is caused by the great height of the steps, and that there is no sort of danger. Dr. Richardson goes still further:—"Lady Belmore," he remarks, "ascended it with the most perfect ease, and none of the party experienced the smallest difficulty or vertigo. Indeed, every step recedes so much from the one below it, and affords such excellent footing, that the mind has the most perfect conviction of security, and I am disposed to think that giddiness has but rarely occurred to those who have attempted to climb this lofty pile." The reader, therefore, will, I think, not be displeased, after these contradictory testimonies, with a faithful description of my experience in achieving the same enterprise.

On my arrival, I saw some persons nearly at the top, and some just commencing the ascent. They were all at the very edge, and, certainly, their apparently perilous situation justified me in the conviction that I should never be able to mount. However, determining to make the attempt, I commenced outside from where the entrance has been formed, and walked along the whole length of one side of the square, about forty feet from the ground, to the opposite corner; the ledge being narrow, and in one place quite broken off, requiring a long step to gain the next stone. As the pyramid itself formed a wall to the right hand, and consequently an apparent defence, I felt no want of courage till I reached the corner where the ascent is in many places absolutely on the angle, leaving no protection on either side. About this time I began to be heartily frightened; and when I heard one gentleman from above call to me to desist, and another tell me not to think of proceeding, right glad was I to return, and to attribute my want of success to their advice rather than to my own deficiency of spirit. Each of the gentlemen as they descended told me the difficulty and fatigue were great, and they evidently were heated and tired; but, at length, in answer to my question a hundred times repeated of, do you think I could go? they proposed to me to try at least, and kindly offered to accompany me. Away I went, and by the assistance of a footstool in some places, and the aid of the guides, and the gentlemen to encourage me, I succeeded in arriving half-way, all the time exclaiming I should never get down again; and, indeed, my head was so giddy that it was some minutes after I was seated, at the resting stone half-way, before I could recover myself. Being a little refreshed, I resumed the ascent, but the guides were so clamorous that I turned back, finding their noise, and pushing, and crowding, as dangerous as the height. The gentlemen at length brought them to some degree of order, partly by remonstrance, and partly by carrying the majority to the top, and leaving only two with me. This quiet in some degree restored my head, and the footing, as I advanced, becoming more easy, I reached the summit amidst the huzzas of the whole party. It was a considerable time, however, before I gained confidence to look around, notwithstanding I was on a surface thirty feet square.

The prospect, though from so great an elevation, disappointed me. I saw, indeed, an immense extent of cultivated country, divided into fields of yellow flax, and green wheat, like so many squares in a chess-board, with the Nile and its various canals which cause their luxuriance, and a vast tract of desert on the other side; I must, however, acknowledge that this scenery I enjoyed on recollection, for I was too anxious how I was to get down, to think much of the picturesque. A railing even of straws might give some slight idea of security, but here there was absolutely nothing, and I had to cross and re-cross the angle, as the broken ledges rendered it necessary; for it is a mistake to suppose there are steps: the passage is performed over blocks of stone and granite, some broken off, others crumbling away, and others, which, having dropped out altogether, have left angles in the masonry; but all these are very irregular. Occasionally the width and height of the stones are equal, but generally the height greatly exceeds the width; in many parts the blocks are four feet high. Once the stone was so high, that as I slipped off I feared that my feet would shoot beyond the ledge on which they were next to rest, and which certainly was but a few inches wide. Another time I was in great peril: I had stretched one foot down with much exertion as far as it could reach, and as the other followed, the heel of the shoe caught in a crevice of the rock, and I had nearly lost my balance in the effort to extricate myself. In a few places the width of the ledges enabled me to use the footstool, which considerably diminished the fatigue, but the greater number were far too narrow for its three feet to rest upon, and I thought it too insecure to allow an Arab to support it with his hands, while I stepped upon it.

* It is now too late to enquire why Dr. Clarke omitted, in subsequent editions, the sublime passage relative to the impressions excited by these monuments, which occurs in the quarto volume of his Travels in Egypt:—

"Ideas of duration, almost endless; of power inconceivable; of majesty supreme; of solitude most awful, of grandeur, of desolation, and of repose."

* These sails, so different from the large square one of Bengal, I observed first at Ceylon. They continued with us from that latitude up the Red Sea, and we recognised them again in the Mediterranean.

After all this it may be supposed I was glad when I had accomplished the undertaking; for, to tell the truth, the greatest pleasure I felt in ascending the pyramid, was to be enabled to say at some future time that I had been at its summit. I cannot, however, understand on what grounds it can be asserted that the ascent or descent is not attended with danger. I may not be considered a competent witness, but it was the unanimous opinion of the gentlemen who mounted with me, that in many places if a person made a false step he would be dashed to pieces. Two of our party paced one side of the pyramid simultaneously, and both made the length two hundred and sixty yards. The area of Lincoln's-Inn-Fields has been adduced as a means of judging of the bulk of this pyramid; and I heard at Alexandria of a calculation made by a Frenchman, that it contains stone enough to build a wall round the whole of France, ten feet high, and one foot broad. I conclude he meant the France of the Bourbons, not that of Bonaparte.*

The pyramid of Cephrenes is about ten minutes' walk from the great one, (called that of Cheops.) The celebrated Sphinx, which is at the foot of the former, has only its face and part of the back uncovered; the inscription, and the temple between the fore paws, have been purposely closed up with sand, to preserve them. The third of the pyramids of Ghizeh, called that of Mycerinus, is much smaller than the other two, and, after them, is no object of curiosity. Upon the whole, I was disappointed with these wonders of the world; probably, because my anticipations had been too much raised. We read and hear of them from our earliest youth, and are told constantly of their magnitude, till our imagination exalts them so much, that no reality is likely to come up to our expectations.

Leaving the rest of our party to proceed to the pyramids of Dashour and Saccara, I prepared to return home, accompanied by Mr. Maltes (the vice-consul,) my maid, and the chiosh. We were followed by troops of Arabs, who had been our guides at the pyramids, and who now endeavoured to outstrip each other, that they might be employed to carry us across an intervening stream, too deep for the dunkeys to wade. The largeness of the party had kept them under restraint in the morning, when I crossed without danger, but at this time they actually fought for the bucksees. Two seized me on their shoulders, a third took my feet, a fourth my parasol, another my bag, and in their anxiety for the rewards which were distributed by Mr. Maltes, who crossed first, they almost dropped me into the water—as it was, their impatience was so great, that they put me down in the mud, and rushed upon poor Mr. Maltes, who was almost pulled to pieces in the conflict which ensued. I was mentioning the above circumstance, when I was told of their stopping a gentleman when half-way up the pyramid, and throwing his hat over, saying at the same time, if he did not give them bucksees, he should follow!

As the evening was shutting in fast after we had re-crossed the Nile, we expected to find some difficulty in entering the city gates, which are always closed two hours after sunset, and nobody is then permitted to pass without a lantern.*

We, however, reached the Frank quarter just in time, and escaped the fate of a military friend, who, on returning from a similar expedition, without this necessary equipment, was lodged in the guard-house, where he remained all night with the soldiers, who treated him civilly, giving him coffee and pipes, and at daylight allowed him to depart.

I learnt from the gentlemen, on their return, that the pyramids of Abousir and Saccara were scarcely worth seeing after those at Ghizeh, particularly the pyramids at Abousir, which are very small; though that at Saccara, which is built in stages, has a singular appearance. The interior is said to consist of two chambers, gradually inclining to a great height. Near were some sarcophagi, lately excavated by Signor Caviglia, in beautiful preservation. Several in limestone resemble the wooden mummy coffins in form, and in the figure of the head on the lid. One of granite has the roof-shaped operculum, the sides within and without covered with hieroglyphics, figures of Anubis, &c., mystical boats and processions, as in the tomb of the kings, and on the bottom is a large figure of Isis all cut in intaglio.

The double-angled pyramid of Dashour was described to me as an admirable structure, possessing more beauty than that of Cheops, though yielding to it in magnitude by about eighty or ninety feet in the square. This superiority is caused by a coating of stone, which gives its surface the appearance of unbroken masonry. In visiting these monuments people go expressly to wonder at their size: this object accomplished, they rarely look to any thing beyond. Hence the Dashour pyramid seldom meets with that attention which its elegant construction seems to deserve. Its upper angles are still perfect, but the lower corners and sides of the northwestern angle have been deplorably injured, as before mentioned, to furnish stone for the duffurda's palace. It is lamentable that he should have selected this pyramid, which is the most perfect, for his purpose, while there are several in the vicinity already in a state of dilapidation. The interior is said to be inaccessible.

The brick pyramid is nearer the river, and its form has been much altered by the falling in of its materials. The bricks are of a large size, formed of earth and straw, bits of which latter are every where perceptible. It is said formerly to have borne an inscription upon it, the purport of which is as follows:—

"Despise me, not in comparison with pyramids of stone: for I excel them as far as Jupiter surpasses the other gods. Men thrust poles into the swamp, and collecting the mud that adhered to them, formed bricks, and in this manner was I constructed."

The very mention of straw and bricks carries us back to the times of Pharaoh, in whose reign the unhappy children of Israel heard that nought of their tasks should be diminished, and who were at one period supposed to have been the builders of these mighty fabrics; and I should have liked to yield to the error, which I have sometimes heard mentioned, that one of these monuments was erected to the memory of that Joseph, who had, by his predictions saved the land from the extreme effects of famine.

It is impossible but that the pyramids must have been the work of some despotic monarch, who could command the unlimited services of his subjects, in the same manner as the present Pasha enforced the labour of his Arab vassals to construct the canal of Mahoudiah;† an undertaking so wonderful in reference to the celerity with which it was completed. If any excuse can be alleged for such oppression, it should be made, not for the pyramids by which mankind have no wise benefited, but in favour of a work of immense utility, which deserves an infinitely higher place in our estimation, than those huge but useless monuments of caprice and ostentation.

* These lanterns, which are far different from the same articles used in England, are made of white or coloured paper, in the shape of the old fashioned elastic powder-puffs: when lighted and ornamented with streamers, they give to a crowded street a very gay and Arabian nights-like appearance.

† This work is about forty-eight miles in length, ninety feet in breadth, and from fifteen to eighteen in depth. At one time above 250,000 men were employed in the excavation, which was completed in about six weeks!

From the pyramids, the gentlemen visited Signor Caviglia, a man most disinterestedly devoted to the pursuits of science. He was living in a miserable hut, reconciled to ill health, and almost every privation, by the satisfaction of having, through his discoveries, fixed the long doubtful site of the city of Memphis. Close to his hut was lying the colossal statue, which he excavated three or four years ago. This statue has the name of Ameen mi Ramses (or Sesostris) engraved on it in six places. It was lying partly on its face, but the features and smiling expression of countenance, like the designs in the tombs of the kings at Thebes, were easily discernible; the head-dress is high, and the sides of it resemble that of the Sphinx at the pyramid of Cephrenes. A dagger is stuck in the girdle, which latter is covered with hieroglyphics and ornaments; below hangs a kilt in the Roman style; the hands fall on either side; the back and feet of the statue are mutilated, but the features and front of the body look as if just dismissed from the artist's hands. The statue, which is about thirty-five feet in length, being too unwieldy to be removed entire, it was proposed to send it to England in three pieces. The necessity of a division is greatly to be lamented, but I conclude it was unavoidable.* If this be the statue of Sesostris, of which there seems no doubt, the site of Memphis is ascertained, for we learn from ancient history, that Sesostris placed a colossal statue of himself within the foundations of that city.† There were many indications of statues and other relics of antiquity in the vicinity; but Signor Caviglia said that, though it would be highly interesting to extend his researches in this quarter, he was without funds for the purpose.

The spot where the statue in question was found may be known by a large tank of water, and a fine grove of date-trees.

On their return, the gentlemen crossed the Nile, to examine the immense quarries, whence the stones of the pyramids are supposed to have been taken. One of these excavations, which are exceedingly capacious, it was calculated might alone contain 50,000 men.

CHAPTER XIII.

Sardinian consul's ball—The Pasha's military school—Lithographic press—Duffurda's palace—Tragic end of Ishmael Pasha—Encomium on the Pasha's conduct with respect to strangers—Tyranny towards his own subjects.

The Sardinian consul having kindly asked me to a ball, I gladly availed myself of the invitation, that I might judge of the state of foreign manners in the Egyptian capital. My wishes, however, were in some degree disappointed, as the party was thinly attended, for reasons which generally prevail in small societies. I was struck with the extraordinary agility of the gentlemen; they danced with a zeal, spirit, and indefatigability worthy of a better cause. The ladies, on the contrary, were very quiet, and danced languidly. Every dance which was called, with the exception of one quadrille, was une contredanse Anglaise; and, strange to say, by no effort of example or explanation, for I just got up to show them, could even the common figure of the lady turning the gentleman, and the gentleman turning the lady, down the middle, and up again, be accomplished. One couple would come up to the top after every figure, another went down the middle when they ought to have turned, and about the sixth couple there was such a complete jumble that the consequent clamour became the signal for the band striking up the waltz. Every face brightened, every couple found their place, and they whirled about till they were tired, when again came the effort of memory in the contredanse Anglaise. One gentleman, whose agility had been most remarkable, came to beg the honour of dancing with me. I declined, and ended by saying, I never danced. "Jamais! vous ne dansez jamais! et comment vous amusez-vous donc?" Never! you never dance! and how then do you amuse yourself? I was so amused at the oddity of such a question, at the wonder expressed in the man's countenance, and at the importance attached to dancing, so little felt by English women, that I could scarcely restrain my laughter.

The Austrian consul's daughter, a child of six years of age, entered the room by herself, went up to her acquaintance, kissed the ladies first on one cheek, then on the other, and behaved with all the self-possession of one long used to the gay world. Her own hair hung in ringlets on her shoulders; her little head was dressed with a

* It is stated in a letter from Mr. Champollion, that there is at Turin a counterpart of this statue.

† The present level of the soil appears to be ten or twelve feet higher than when the statue fell.

* "The pyramids of Djizeh, the largest and most remarkable of this stupendous class of monuments, stand upon a bed of rock, 150 feet above the Desert, which contributes to their being seen at so great a distance. The largest of the three, which, on the authority of Herodotus, is ascribed to Cheops, is a square of 746 feet, and its perpendicular height is 461 feet, being 24 feet higher than St. Peter's at Rome, and 117 feet higher than St. Paul's at London." The quantity of stone used in this pyramid is estimated at six millions of tons, "which is just three times that of the vast breakwater thrown across Plymouth Sound;" and a hundred thousand men are said to have been employed for twenty years in raising this empty sepulchre!—Modern Traveller—Egypt, part 2, page 297-299.—See also Russel's Egypt.

profusion of curls (false I believe,) in addition to five bows of pink satin ribbon, and several artificial flowers; whilst a large fan in one hand, and her reticule in the other, gave her the appearance of the little ladies and gentlemen we see in the prints of the days of the ancien régime in France. The poor child danced and waltzed till two in the morning. On one of the ladies telling me the known fact of the difficulty of rearing European children in Cairo, I hinted that, as the climate was so inimical, double care might be necessary, and perhaps that such late hours and hot rooms might not agree with their health. "Cela se peut; mais comment les amuser, pauvres petites! c'est un pays si triste." It may be so, but how will the poor little things amuse themselves in this sad country? I enquired whether this dissipation did not interfere with the schooling next day? "Yes, that was true enough, it turned their heads a little."—"Mais comment les amuser?" was again her question; and then at the risk of being considered very rigid, I told my new acquaintance, that in England, children of that age would generally have bread and milk for supper, and be sent to bed at eight o'clock.

There was no variety in the dress of the ladies excepting two, who were in the Levantine costume. This dress is not pretty, nor agreeable to English taste or decorum. I was amused by a gay little Piedmontese, who related the adventure of his being on shore at the battle of Navarino, and not finding an adequate place for shelter, he hid himself as well as he was able behind a rock, which, however proved too small to screen his whole person; so thinking it pleasanter to lose his heels than his head, he placed the latter on the ground, and permitted his legs to remain exposed to the fire of the fleet.

One of the Italian instructors of the pasha's new levees was at the ball dancing all the evening, and apparently the person in the assembly least likely to have any serious business on his mind; but it was mentioned openly, that the next morning he was engaged to fight a duel. This report would have excited anxiety, had it not been known that Cairo duels are seldom attended with bloodshed, as the pasha has declared that he does not understand such Frank customs, and that he who kills a man in his dominions shall be hanged.

The day of our departure from Cairo, I visited the pasha's Military College. This was such an unprecedented step for a female, and was so much at variance with the established usage of the country, that I expressed some doubt of its propriety, as well as practicability. However, I was not reluctant to have my scruples overruled; and accompanied by the gentlemen of the party, Osman, and a Chiosh, I rode into the first court of the building. In this place there were only a few boys collected; but on entering the quadrangle, I believe the whole fourteen hundred belonging to the college poured out to see the extraordinary spectacle. The presence of the veiled Circassian, celebrated by Hajji Baba, on the play-ground of Eton or Westminster, could not have excited half so much astonishment as the sight of a lady on a side-saddle in the English costume created among the multitude of Greeks, Turks, and Mamalukes, great and small, here assembled.

When the phenomenon before them was ascertained to be really a Frank woman, a shout so long and so loud was raised, that my ears and eyes almost failed, and the crowd continuing to thicken and press around me, I felt my situation rather disagreeable. Fortunately the din of the tumult roused one of the masters, a few lashes of whose whip caused the poor boys to retreat, and satisfy their curiosity at a greater distance. This afforded me an opportunity of escaping up stairs, when the professor of mathematics, an old Italian, received us civilly, and gave us some insight into the details of the institution. He said the boys knew neither French, Italian, nor Latin; that though they were learning these languages, yet with such disqualifications, he found great difficulty in teaching them mathematics; the pasha's order, however, to this effect was peremptory, and must be obeyed. He had commenced with seven grown-up pupils, who had made some progress, and who, when qualified, were in their turn to become instructors; but "these," said he, "were married, and only day-scholars, and thought more of their wives and children, than of their studies."

The Persian professor was also an Italian; and although he had travelled in Persia, did not know enough of the language to understand what was addressed to him by one of the party in that tongue.

Besides these professors, there were other instructors, chiefly Italians, who, in addition to their own language, taught Arabic, Turkish, and French, besides botany and arithmetic.

Of the pupils, three hundred were military conscripts, one hundred and fifty Greek slaves, and the rest Turkish boys from Roumelia, a few Nubians, and many Egyptians, who were either Mamalukes, or slaves of the pasha. These were divided into classes of sixty or a hundred each, every class under an instructor and subordinate monitors. Besides the mathematical students, twenty were learning Persian, a great many French and Italian, and the whole were taught to read and write Turkish and Arabic. It being unfortunately a holiday, we were prevented from seeing the process of instruction; but from the inefficiency of the Persian professor, I should not augur much progress on the part of the scholars; and the Italian mathematician appeared too old to cope with the lively nature of the boys, or to keep pace with the rapidity of the pasha's wishes. As it is, however, there are only two branches of the education of the college, and it is to be hoped that the others prove more consonant to the enlightened policy which created and fosters this interesting institution. Of the fourteen hundred boys of which the college consists, five hundred are boarders, and the rest day-scholars; all appeared healthy, clean, and well clothed.

The munificence of the pasha allots above six thousand dollars a month to the maintenance of the college; and this, though a small sum, when compared to what would be the expenses of a similar establishment on an equal scale in England, is adequate to its purpose in a country where the necessities of life are so cheap and abundant.

The pasha's lithographic and printing presses next engaged our attention. They were apparently well conducted, under the management of a Druse, a native of Mount Lebanon, a young man of polite manners, lively, and intelligent, and one of the many who had been sent by the pasha to Europe for education. I saw printing in all its branches, from the formation of the letters to the completion of a book. The works already printed were a Turkish History, by an officer of the Grand Vizier; Correspondence between the Pasha and the Porte; a translation, in Turkish, of some French work on military and naval tactics, with lithographic plates; the Persian poem called the Goolistann, and some grammars. The presses were made under the superintendence of this Druse, but the paper was of European manufacture.

We then proceeded to the apartments of the superintendent, who conversed in Italian. Here, as is the invariable custom, we were presented with coffee in little China cups, which, instead of saucers, are fixed in cups of silver gilt, or other inferior metal, according to the rank and riches of the owner.

Near Bulac, is a palace building for the Dufturdar Bey. Much of its architecture is light and elegant, though without regard to regularity, for Grecian porticoes and Turkish domes and ornaments are mixed together. But the interest I took in the spot arose from learning that among the numerous granite and marble pillars and broken capitals, lying in confusion around, those most to be admired were part of the spoils of Antioch. Several had been broken to favour transportation, but most of them appeared to have been thrown down, with utter disregard or ignorance of their value. On the walls I observed stone tablets on which were cut hieroglyphical figures, placed without any regard to uniformity, some standing on their head, others on their heels, as little prized as any common material, which might equally answer the purpose of building. Without being an enthusiast, I could not help grieving over these precious monuments of antiquity, and regretting that there was no possibility of rescuing them from the hands of the barbarians, and transporting them to England, where they would be prized as of inestimable value.

On the way to our place of embarkation, we passed another handsome palace, (in the style of the public buildings at Amsterdam,) formerly the residence of Ismael Pasha, but now converted into a warehouse. Ismael was sent by his father into Nubia, to procure recruits for his army. One of the chiefs of the country begged some little delay, as he had then no slaves ready; but Ismael, striking him, said he would admit of none. "Well, then, my lord, to-morrow, we will see what can be done;" but this morrow did not dawn upon Ismael; for the straw huts which he occupied were set on fire by the Nubians in the night, and he and all his suite perished. The pasha's army made a severe example of the unfortunate inhabitants in the vicinity, but the real culprits had escaped, far beyond the reach of punishment.

And now embarking on our boats, we bade farewell to Cairo. Well does it deserve the name of Grand; and amply does it repay the traveller for every hour spent in exploring its singular and striking interior, its pleasant environs, and the numerous interesting objects with which it every where abounds. Still it must be acknowledged that, as a city, it is not so superior in itself, but that it derives much of its estimation from the associations which it presents, and the ancient and romantic hold which it has on our imagination.

While dwelling on the merits of his capital, let me pay a tribute of admiration to the pasha's enlightened and liberal conduct towards strangers. We had now passed six weeks in Egypt during a season of political agitation, and travelled from Cosseir to Cairo without the slightest interruption or molestation from any class of persons whatever, and without the smallest exaction (unless I so term the cupidity of the Cacheef of Kennah before-mentioned) on the part of the government or its officers, or any demand on account of customs, fees, or imposts. I wish I could speak as favourably of the pasha's policy towards his subjects; but in that respect, his views are very confined. In his dominions, the time of his subjects, the fruits of the earth, and the produce of its waters—all he considers exclusively his own. Hence, in travelling, it is needless to ask to whom any thing belongs, for from the huge manufactory to the crop of dried clover, Mahomed Ali is absolute proprietor. If a Fellah sows a little cotton, and his wife spins it into a garment, it is liable to seizure unless it be stamped with the pasha's mark, as a proof of its having paid duty.

Still, notwithstanding this enormous monopoly, it is to be hoped that the introduction of so many manufactures, though the Arabs, at present, work at them by compulsion, and receive but little pay for their labour, may, in time, have the effect of civilising the people, and be the means of introducing improvements in a more enlightened and permanent form. Much, however, must depend upon the pasha's successor. The choice, it is supposed, lies between Ibrahim Pasha, the son of his late wife, and the Dufturdar Bey, who has married his daughter. The latter chief dislikes the Franks, and is particularly hostile to the recent innovations, which he regards with the jealous eye of a Mussulman bigot. The Franks, however, the pasha never admits to any share of political power, and it is a peculiar feature of his policy, that while he employs French and Italian officers to drill the Arab soldiery, he limits them to the bare duty of instruction, availing himself of European improvement, while he is careful to repress European encroachment. This characteristic jealousy is not confined to the Franks only, but shows itself, occasionally, in his arbitrary treatment of his own subjects when they venture to offend him by the least infringement of his commands. For instance, a few months ago he had ordered that the dollar should pass for a fixed number of piastres, and it was mentioned in his presence that the rate was not strictly followed. His highness expressing some doubts of the fact, the head interpreter observed, carelessly, that a Jew-broker, whom he named, had, a few days before, exchanged dollars for him at the rate asserted.—"Let him be hanged immediately," exclaimed the pasha! The interpreter, an old and favourite servant, threw himself at his sovereign's feet, deprecating his own folly, and imploring pardon for the wretched culprit; but all intercession was in vain—the pasha said his orders must not be disregarded, and the unfortunate Jew was executed. Let me in justice add, that this was the only instance of rigour which had occurred for a long time; and his lenity, I might almost say, seemed verified by the miserable appearance of the public executioner, who begged of me in the streets, and by his squalid looks gave strong indication how little his trade flourished.

CHAPTER XIV.

Voyage down the Nile to Fouah—Entrance into the canal—Vexatious delays—Arrival at Alexandria—Anecdote relative to Diocletian's Pillar—Capture of a fort by English sailors—Good humour of the Pasha on the occasion—His magnanimity on bearing of the battle of Navarino—His unpopularity.

The inconveniences of the journey, if I can so term such trifling privations, now commenced, since it was necessary, for the purpose of expedition, that we should embark on a very small cangia, the cabin of which did not admit even of our sitting on chairs, and afforded but narrow accommodation for three persons.

The wind, however, being moderate, our progress down the stream was so rapid, that we reached the entrance of the Mahoudiah canal on the night after we left Cairo, a voyage which, at that season, is seldom accomplished under five or six days. Here we encountered an unexpected obstacle in finding, that a mound of earth, about twenty yards broad, separated the Nile from the canal. This involved another change of boats and the troublesome shifting of our baggage.

While employed in these arrangements I was disturbed by hearing from two English travellers, that the pasha had laid an embargo on all vessels at Alexandria, pending the departure of his fleet with provisions for Greece, and I feared that the delay caused by this ordinance would prove a serious inconvenience, as persons leaving Alexandria late in the season are subjected to a longer quarantine at Malta.

From the low state of the water in the canal we had to embark on board a still smaller boat than the last, the dirt of which was so great, that no effort of mine could purify it. Hitherto we had been singularly free from all annoyances so prevalent in Egypt. By the assistance of a cat, and the manner in which I had arranged the partitions, I had prevented the entrance of the rats into the cabin, though I had heard them above and all around making their ineffectual attempts. Except a few fleas, I had met with no grievances of the kind usually complained of; and, as most travellers have recorded in their narratives their personal sufferings on this head, I must attribute the absence of vermin to the comfort of female superintendence. The contrary winds compelled us to tack all day. Nothing could be more tedious than our snail-like pace, which was still further delayed by mistakes and the mismanagement of the crew of our new boat; nevertheless we reached Alexandria before day-break, on the 14th, though just too late to see the pasha, who had stepped into his cangia to proceed to Cairo, as the gentlemen of our party were hastening to visit him. As I also expected to get a glimpse of this extraordinary man, his sudden departure was the only real disappointment I had met with since the commencement of my travels, and it was a real one to me. The delay, the laziness of the people, the time we had spent in seeing sights of inferior interest at Cairo, for I consider the pasha as great a wonder as any in his dominions,—in fact every thing which had retarded our progress, now appeared to be intolerable. At the Consulate I saw his portrait, which does not at all represent the face of a tyrant. I heard that great difficulty was experienced in painting this likeness, (from which several copies have been taken,) as the Mussulmans have a religious horror of every kind of picture; and while sitting, the pasha was compelled to lock himself up with the artist, under pretence of transacting business.

Alexandria was so full of Franks, that we could have no choice of lodgings, and were obliged to put up with some miserable rooms in an okel, or quarter, secured for us by Mr. Barker the consul, which seemed the very focus of wretchedness and pestilence. I had heard, too, that the plague was raging in Syria, whence it was expected daily to find its way into Alexandria; and had it reached our vicinity, the narrowness of the passages to our dwelling, and the utter impossibility of shutting it up, rendered escape from contagion almost hopeless. I observed that the lower class of Franks in the streets were a better race of people than those at Cairo, for many I saw there were a disgrace to the name of Europeans—dirty, squalid, and full of disease, brought on apparently by intemperance rather than the effects of climate; for the Greeks, native Christians, Jews, Turks, and Arabs generally, had a strong, healthy, and active appearance. Alexandria itself is dirty to a degree. The only cleanly or airy looking part of the town, is a sort of square inhabited by the consuls; but the approach to this quarter, even on donkeys, involves a difficult navigation through pools of water, mud, and dirt. On foot the streets are scarcely passable for a lady; but perhaps I saw them in their worst state, as, notwithstanding the proverbial dryness of the climate, we had experienced for the last fortnight a succession of gales with wet weather. I was enabled, however, to make excursions to the few objects of curiosity in the vicinity. The catacombs were closed against us in consequence of the erection of a new fort near them; but I visited Diocletian's, commonly called Pompey's, Pillar; the two Obelisks, Cleopatra's Needle standing, the other prostrate (the latter has so long been on its way to England, that I fear it will now never arrive;) and the pasha's palace, not yet finished, and less magnificent than those at Cairo and Shoobra.

The splendid pillar of Diocletian surpassed in my opinion every thing of the kind I had ever seen: to view it in perfection, it is, however, necessary to stand close under it, and to keep out of sight the numerous English names, in large black letters, which deface one side of the polished shaft, and perpetuate the bad taste of the writers. On the anniversary of the battle of Alexandria some of the officers and crew of his majesty's ship—hoisted the English ensign and the pasha's colours at the top of this pillar. This was not agreeable to his highness, who desired the Arabs to take the flags down. After various attempts, they found it impossible, and some of our own tars were at length obliged to reascend for this purpose. How Miss Talbot ever succeeded in reaching the top I cannot understand, for the difficulty of the undertaking was great, even to sailors accustomed to climb. The pasha appears thoroughly to understand the character of our sailors, as the following occurrence seems to prove.

One Sunday he received intelligence that a small fort at the entrance of the harbour had been taken possession of by certain Franks, and that the Turks belonging to it had been made prisoners. Some consternation prevailed among his people, but instead of being angry he laughed heartily, and swearing by his two eyes, (his favourite oath,) that they must be English sailors, he directed his interpreter to write to their captain, to order his men on board ship again. Upon enquiry it proved as the pasha had anticipated; the men had landed, got drunk, and crowned their liberty by seizing on the fort and confining the unfortunate Turks, who, indolently smoking their pipes, never could have anticipated such an attack in time of profound peace.

I visited with great interest the field of battle where Sir Ralph Abercrombie fell, and the Bay of Aboukir, which is at the distance of eight or ten miles. After wandering a considerable time among the French redoubts, I picked up a few musket-shot, the evidence of the modern battle, and some ancient coins, the relics of many hundred years. The spot is too well known to require description; but the heart must be cold indeed, which can, for the first time, view these scenes, and reflect upon the events which have occurred there, without lively emotion.

After all, in truth, the most striking and interesting sight is the Mediterranean itself, which rolls into the harbour of Alexandria; its waters as blue and as transparent as Lord Byron has described them. These classic waves I first saw in a deep calm. It was succeeded by a storm which agitated them to a tremendous height, and placed in jeopardy the numerous ships at anchor in the port. This storm, however, besides affording a grand sight, was of substantial use to us, for it detained a fleet bound to Malta, and thus enabled us to leave a country in which our residence had ceased to be agreeable. Among the ships lying in the harbour was the wreck of one of the Pasha's own vessels. The captain had committed some crime, which was represented by his crew to the pasha, who ordered him immediately on shore to answer his accusers. Knowing his guilt, he pretended sickness, till a second message from the pasha left him no alternative; and unable longer to evade his fate, he sent all his crew on shore, and calling to an old and faithful servant, the only person on board, he bade him jump out of the port; at the same time loading two pistols, he fired into the magazine, and blew up the ship and himself together. When the story was related to the pasha, he said, "These are Frank customs: this is dying like an Englishman!"*

The agitation excited by the battle of Navarino seemed to have totally subsided, and it was curious to see English and French frigates lying peaceably alongside a Turkish man-of-war, which bore evident marks of the dreadful conflict in which the forces of the three nations had so recently been engaged. The magnanimity evinced by the pasha, when he first heard of the event which destroyed his navy and humbled his power, was highly honourable to his character. He had not finished the perusal of the unwelcome tidings, when he desired Mr. Wolmas to assure the Franks that they should not be molested, and that they might pursue their occupations as heretofore in perfect security.

But notwithstanding the kindness which the pasha manifests towards the Franks, he is not popular with those at Alexandria, in consequence of the dulness of trade, resulting from his monopolies. Neither has he friends among the Turks or Arabs, the former complaining that the new system of tactics has thrown them out of employment, while the latter hate him for forcing them into the military service. On the whole, the best informed persons said that the state of his government rendered him very anxious, especially as he had already incurred the displeasure of the Porte, by repeatedly urging the Sultan to acquiesce in the demands of the allies.

His country, too, was nearly ruined by the Greek war,

* A similar, but more atrocious instance of desperation, occurred, it is said, a short time ago at Valparaiso, or some other port in South America. The commander of an English vessel, being pressed by his creditors, invited some of them to dinner, and during the meal went down to the gun-room, where, setting fire to the powder, he destroyed himself and his guests, by blowing up the stern of the ship.

not only from the vast sums he had expended in his co-operation with the Porte, but also from the depopulation occasioned by the hosts of troops whom he had been compelled to send into the Morea, thereby draining his provinces of their cultivators.

At the house of the English consul I had the pleasure of seeing Lady —, whose interesting projects enhanced the gratification of meeting with a countrywoman in that distant land. Her ladyship meditated the establishment of a school at Jerusalem, for the superintendence of which she was qualifying herself by the assiduous study of Arabic.* On the feasibility and utility of this plan opinions may differ, but nobody, I think, can witness its author's self-devotion without wishing that it may be rewarded by success.

Our stay at Alexandria was limited to four days, on the last of which divine service was performed at the consulate, and a very long but not a bad sermon preached in English, by a Swiss missionary, attired in a Turkish dress, forming a heterogeneous compound for the pulpit.

CHAPTER XV.

Departure from Alexandria—Severe weather in the Mediterranean—Difference of Asiatic and European navigation—Arrival at Malta—Lazaretto.

The next morning, the 18th of February, we embarked on board the Columbia, an English merchantman of five hundred tons, laden with the pasha's cotton, consigned to Liverpool. The breeze being light, we were a whole day passing the bar, which is an affair of some difficulty and anxiety in a large ship, when the wind is not quite favourable. This was our case, but under the skillful guidance of an old man, at whom I looked with much interest on hearing that he was Lord Nelson's pilot at the battle of the Nile, we got safe over at eight o'clock p. m., when I took my last view of the shores of Egypt.

It must not be supposed, because the Columbia was of the respectable size of five hundred tons, that we had suitable accommodation. The whole ship was crowded with cotton, a small portion of which had been removed from the cabin to afford just sufficient space for our own beds, while my maid was located in the corner on the remaining bales. These had been so loosened by a separation from the rest, that every night of bad weather I expected some of them to fetch away, as they say on board ship, and smother us in their fall.

During the first six days the wind was strong and favourable, and brought us almost within sight of our destined port; but for the remainder of the voyage, which lasted ten days longer, the weather became very boisterous and adverse. I had been three times round the Cape of Good Hope, and yet, whether from lapse of time or increase of timidity, it seemed to me that I had never before witnessed such alarming storms.

Those who have only read of the dark blue sea of the Mediterranean, as depicted by the author of the Corair, must not form their idea of the gales we experienced from his description, but rather rely upon a later poet, who thus apostrophises the stormy ocean:—

"Tremendous art thou! in thy tempest ire,
When the mad surges to the clouds respire;
And like new Apennines from out the sea,
Thy waves march on in mountain majesty."

Montgomery's Omnipresence of the Deity.

Navigation is differently conducted in the east and in west. Our little brig, the Palinurus, of one hundred and ninety tons, had a complement of seventy men; whereas a crew of twenty, officers included, managed the Columbia, and excellently too, though I could not help shuddering sometimes at night while scudding at the rate of ten or eleven knots an hour, to see the wheel in the hands of a weakly boy of sixteen, who shifted it with the greatest difficulty.

We were within view of Malta four days before the inexorable gale allowed us to reach it; to add to our vexation, the Dryad frigate passed us one evening, and by being able to "lay closer" to the wind, got into Malta six and thirty hours before us. Still we had cause to congratulate ourselves on having taken our passage in an English ship, as some of my acquaintances, who sailed the same day with us in a Maltese vessel, did not arrive till a fortnight afterwards.

The approach to Malta is very beautiful. The entrance into the quarantine harbour is so narrow, that it is necessary to tow ships into it. For this purpose numerous boats are always ready, whose lofty prows, like those of the Roman galleys, betoken a form of ancient date, and being rowed by men with their faces to the bows, exhibit a very singular appearance.

After anchoring, we were hailed by the port captain, and our seamen and passengers mustered at the gangway; when, on its being ascertained that they were all well, the boat was permitted to approach sufficiently near for us to drop our letters into a bucket for fumigation, and we were ourselves allowed to row to the Lazaretto.

I should have been cautious not to trouble my readers with the ennui occasioned by my seclusion in the Lazaretto, had I endured any. But, in truth, I felt none. I had led such a wandering and fatiguing life for some time past, and been so harassed by the tempestuous weather of the Mediterranean, that the tranquillity of the confinement was as agreeable to my feelings, as it was beneficial to my health.

The Lazaretto is an extensive building, situated on an islet, having Fort Emanuel, where the military and persons of rank under quarantine are quartered, at its back.

We had three large and airy apartments up stairs, from the windows of which there was a good view of the harbour and surrounding country.

Excepting a couple of tables and a few chairs, the rooms were quite empty; but fortunately, we were supplied with our own camp beds, and the few cups and plates which had escaped from the shocks of land and sea, and soon made ourselves comfortable.

Each family or party has a guardian appointed to take care of them, and each vessel has two. The duty of these men is to prevent contact between persons whose period of confinement is different, and to secure their not touching those who are not in quarantine. You may receive company in the Parlatorio, or on the terraces of the building, being careful to keep at a distance; for if you put your finger on a visitor's dress, he would be condemned to the same term of confinement as yourself. It is amusing to observe the caution of the officers of the establishment, and the nimbleness with which they fly from any apprehended approximation to themselves on the part of the prisoner; and this caution is again learned by the latter, who in his turn becomes equally distrustful of a new occupant of the Lazaretto, lest his own endurance should be prolonged by the other's touch. Provisions are supplied by a person called a spenditore, who brings the articles required on his own account, or from an hotel at Valetta.

Though the accommodations are excellent, a just complaint may be made of the unnecessary privation of exercise, to which persons in quarantine are subjected. We were only allowed to walk on a small ill-paved terrace about sixty feet long, which, though pleasant enough in the cool season, must be intolerable in summer on account of the heat. I cannot perceive any good reason why a suitable place for exercise might not be allotted on the islet, which is sufficiently capacious to admit of this indulgence without hazard of unauthorised communication.

The Lazaretto is shut up from twelve till two, when the persons in charge of it go to their dinner, and from sunset, when they return home, till seven the next morning. I know not what would become of its inmates in case of sudden illness—but people never seem to think of such a danger in this favoured climate, which to me who have long lived in the regions of fever and cholera, is an event of no rare occurrence; and where, in the latter case, the delay of an hour in procuring assistance would, in all probability, prove the death of the sufferer.

Strange as it may appear, I never could gain any accurate account of the duration of quarantine, until I was myself actually immured, and the fiat of the superintendent had pronounced my doom, which proved irreversible—no appeal, no remission; and his words might have been,

"Lasciate ogni speranza, voi ch' entrate."

The period of quarantine for vessels and passengers from the eastward is generally twenty-five days; under the most favourable circumstances it is never less than twenty-two, the day of entrance and departure being included. The latter was our case, though little was it known at that time either to the superintendent or ourselves, that two deaths, supposed to be from plague, had occurred at our okel at Alexandria, previously to our departure. A deduction is also made in favour of king's ships.

The quarantine establishment consists of a superintendent, a captain of the Lazaretto, a clerk, and about eighty guardians, besides persons whose duty it is to smoke packets and letters. The expenses are moderate. The business appears to be conducted in an excellent manner, and with great courtesy and civility on the part of the superintendent and his subordinates.

The time of our emancipation having arrived, we repaired to Beverley's hotel, the superior accommodation of which, after the Bedouin life we had been leading for some months past, and the confinement of the Lazaretto, was highly acceptable.

CHAPTER XVI.

Beauty of Malta—Want of sufficient accommodation for the protestant congregation—Miscellaneous observations—Hospitality of the English residents.

Malta is certainly a most singular island. I was delighted with the views from the ramparts, and astonished at its fortifications, the height of which in some places is one hundred and thirty feet perpendicular. On various parts of the ramparts are the tombs of Sir Ralph Abercrombie, Sir Alexander Ball, Sir Thomas Maitland, Sir Thomas Freemantle, and the Marquess of Hastings. At present only plain flat stones are placed over the remains of Sir Thomas Maitland and Lord Hastings. The government, I heard, offered to erect a monument at the public expense to the former; but it was understood, on the island, that the offer was declined in consequence of the wish of his family to fulfil that duty. The whole vicinity is covered by a most exuberant profusion of geraniums almost perpetually in full bloom, together with other gay flowers and shrubs, whose gaudy appearance divests the place of its solemnity.

Lord Hastings was much beloved by the inhabitants of the island, some of whom, before his grave was inclosed with an iron railing, placed two or three ornamental tributes on the slab. One of them is a cushion of stone, on which the following lines are engraved:—

"Hastings defleto Melite dat Florea seda, Nam grato assurgit pectore vividior."

I was told that the translation of these lines is rather unmanageable.

The palace contains some tolerable paintings, but the tapestry is admirable. Of this I saw counterparts afterwards at Fontainebleau. The armoury had been admirably arranged by the chief engineer. The roof of the building being weak, the beams of it required support, which Colonel Whitmore contrived to afford, not only in an unobjectionable, but in a pleasing and tasteful manner, by placing props of wood at regular distances, so disguised with pikes and pistols, as to present the appearance of ornamental columns.

St. John's Church is a splendid edifice, but is most conspicuous, as is well known, for its exquisite and unique mosaic pavement, formed by the inlaid marble gravestones of the knights of the order. In one of the chapels on the right are two or three fine marble monuments, one of which comprises an admirable picture, in mosaic, of one of the grand masters. Here, also, is a silver gate, which was preserved from the rapacity of the French, by the simple precaution of covering it with black paint.

When the island was ceded to the British, Sir Thomas Maitland received orders, according to the strict construction of the capitulation, to appropriate the cathedral of St. John to the protestant worship; but with correct judgment and good feeling, he referred the case back to the home government, representing how much the religious prejudices of the Maltese were interested in the retention of the church for the Roman Catholic rites as formerly; endeared to them also, as it was, by containing the remains of their illustrious ancestors, and how essential he felt it to conciliate their attachment, by yielding to their expectations on this point. The application was successful, and a portion of the protestant congregation, exclusive of the military, is now accommodated in the chapel belonging to the palace. But this act of national self-denial is attended with inconvenience, as the chapel does not contain above one third of the persons who might resort to it. It may be doubted, however, whether the sacrifice has increased the respect of the Maltese, whose religious zeal can scarcely be satisfied with the numerous splendid churches in which it is exhibited, while the fervour of their protestant rulers is compressed within the walls of one humble and insufficient chapel.

There are several churches in the town of Valetta worth visiting, and its being holy week they were thronged with devotees; indeed Malta appeared to me to be the hot-bed of catholicism; I have never since seen it carried to such excess. Processions were hourly passing through the streets with many of the Scripture scenes represented as literally as possible. Among them was our Saviour hanging on the cross; a boy, dressed in sheepskin, representing St. John the Baptist; a baby, as the infant Saviour, &c. &c. In some of these processions walked people, who, I was afterwards told, were of the first consideration in the town, dragging many yards of heavy chain at their heels; but the most astonishing instance of superstition was that which occurred on Good Friday; all the bells of the churches were stopped, and a noise succeeded, like that of a hundred watchmen's rattles, which upon inquiry I found was caused by stones shaken in a box, intended to represent the grinding of Judas's bones!! Mass was performed both day and night during the whole week, and I should speak favourably of the religion of the Maltese, if I had to judge of its sincerity by the decorum of their behaviour at church.

A short distance from Valetta the governor has a country seat, named St. Antonio; it is a lovely spot, and would be considered such in any country, but here its shade and coolness are felt doubly refreshing from the absence of these advantages in other parts of the island.

In the garden I found Loquats superior to those in India, also the Teparree, or Cape gooseberry, called by a variety of names, and oranges in full fruit. The white nectarine, the peach, apricot, and fig are, I understood, of the most exquisite flavour and in great abundance. Flowers from every part of the world appear to make this garden their native soil—beautiful climbers of all sorts, ixias, justicias, geraniums as large as shrubs: the yucca gloriosa, and the night-blowing cereus, surprised me as growing in the open air, by the side of violets, polyantheses, roses, cowslips, ranunculuses, and other more hardy plants.

Malta contains about 100,000 inhabitants, and Gozo 20,000. The revenue of the islands is under 100,000*l.*, of which a large portion is derived from a very low duty on spirits and wine. Spirits and inferior wines pay 1*d.* a gallon, and the better kinds of wines 2*d.* a bottle, and yet it will hardly be believed that the consumption of the latter is so great that the produce of the tax on it does not fall short of the annual sum of 10,000*l.* 30,000*l.* of the revenue is devoted to the maintenance of hospitals and other charitable institutions; of this sum, the School of Industry, founded by Lord Hastings, draws 2500*l.* per annum. This establishment is on a very liberal scale, and supports three hundred girls and a few very old men. Public subscriptions are also received; but the aggregate contributions not being equal to the expenditure, forty girls had lately been dismissed. There might probably be difficulty in interfering with the prejudices of the Roman Catholics, and additional expense and indulgence on that account be requisite; otherwise, I should venture to say, that the children here, as in many similar institutions, are brought up with a degree of luxury, both as respects their accommodation, food and habits, which is likely to unfit them to encounter with cheerfulness the hardships of servitude, to which, in after life, they must necessarily be exposed.

The island, though very fruitful, does not grow corn sufficient for its consumption. The importation of grain is subject to no restrictions, but the government always keeps a certain quantity in store to check excessive prices. The grain is preserved in large pits, the mouths of which are covered with circular stones, and the apertures being hermetically closed with cement, it does not suffer from damp. Much to my surprise, I learned here that Sicily, formerly the granary of Europe, no longer exports corn, for the supplies of which Malta is now principally indebted to Egypt.

The monopoly of ice is granted to an individual, who imports it in immense quantities from Sicily, and who is liable to a penalty of five guineas for every hour he may be without a suitable supply during the summer. It is well known that in the southern parts of Europe ice is indispensable to the poorer classes, and the privation of it would not only affect the health of the population, but probably excite a commotion.

To quit the subject of Malta without acknowledging the kindness I experienced there, would be an excess of ingratitude. Indeed, wherever I stopped, on my long journey, I had received very obliging attentions; but Malta is the land of hospitality, where society is on the most liberal footing, and where a stranger is welcomed with a degree of warmth and cordiality truly engaging. In this spirit of kind consideration, Sir Edward Codrington, then commanding the station, authorised our acceptance of Sir Thomas Fellowes's offer to convey us, in the Dartmouth frigate,* to Syracuse.

CHAPTER XVII.

Favourable passage to Syracuse—Dionysius's Ear, &c.—Lentini—Catania—Cereemonial at the Cathedral—Admirable situation of Taurominium—Messina.

We embarked in the evening, and the wind being strong and favourable, we lay-to till near daylight, to avoid approaching the coast at night, and about ten o'clock entered the magnificent harbour of Syracuse, having as we approached a fine view of Etna, with its top unclouded and sprinkled with snow.

Our first visit on landing was to Dionysius's Ear. This celebrated cavern may be reasonably imagined to bear the form of an ear; and from its security, the mark of rivets in the wall, and its general appearance, my conviction will not allow me to doubt that it was used for the purpose of a prison, as stated in history. The echo in the main hollow is very distinct; but it is still more perfect in the small cave above, on the right hand of the entrance of the cavern, where the tyrant, it is said, took up his position when he desired to overhear the conversation of his prisoners. The natives have a way of reaching the top, with which they would not acquaint us, saying it was far too precipitous for us to attempt. It is their interest to make the ascent difficult, and the only method, they pretended, by which we could accomplish it, was by being drawn up in a chair—both it and the rope, however, from which it was suspended, looked so fragile, that I would not venture upon the enterprise. Nevertheless, one of our party was hoisted up in this perilous manner to the cave, (which is, I should think, about sixty or seventy feet high,) whence to my astonishment he answered the questions we put to him in a low whisper from beneath, without difficulty, or hesitation.

We afterwards visited the remains of the theatre and amphitheatre, the view from which is delightful—the Capuchin convent in the vicinity, not worth seeing—the cathedral, built on the remains of an ancient temple of Minerva; and lastly the Fountain of Arethusa, where we saw the usual number of old women washing in the stream. One of them offered me a glass in which to drink some water from the pool, but I was apprehensive that its purity might have been injured by these Naiads, and declined.

There being no roads sufficiently good in Sicily to allow of wheel carriages, I travelled upon a mule, and hired a lettiga, the usual conveyance of priests and females, as a shelter in the event of bad weather. In shape it resembles a double sedan-chair, or the body of a shabby vis-a-vis; and being slung, not between camels like my tukhte-rowan, but between mules, proved a much less uneasy vehicle. The state of the road and the distance not admitting of our going direct to Catania, we proceeded to Lentini to sleep, and here we experienced the advantage of having brought with us our camp equipage; for, except a very dirty room, we found no accommodation, as the beds were so disgusting it would have been impossible to rest in them. We were obliged to send out into the town for provisions, but the bread alone was good—superior, perhaps, to any in Europe, except that in Spain. The flour is of the finest quality, of a pale sulphur colour—whether artificial, or the natural tint of the corn, I did not ascertain. I was the more surprised at the excellence and abundance of the bread, when I was told that the Sicilians annually had to import grain, the island not yielding sufficient even for the consumption of its thin population. Lentini is close to a small lake, and, though prettily situated, is considered very unhealthy. Indeed, one cannot help being shocked at the squalid features of its inhabitants, and the generally wretched appearance of the town.

The country as far as Catania was not very striking—but we had Etna in front of us, which we were continually approaching, and of which we had so clear a view as to perceive the English house, near the summit, about eight thousand feet above the level of the sea, looking like a large black slab in the surrounding snow. The landlord of our inn, Signor Abbate, who is a distinguished guide, said we could not reach the top in consequence of a recent fall of snow, and I was rather glad at the time to be furnished with a decent excuse for avoiding a toilsome excursion, which I suspect does not repay one for the certainty of great fatigue and the risk of illness with which it is attended.

The view of Catania, at a distance, was splendid; its white palaces glittering in the sun, surrounded by dark and verdant foliage. But upon a nearer approach, the city wore a melancholy appearance, from the ruined state of the houses, which had not been regularly repaired since they were injured by the last earthquake. In fact, scarcely a wall remains entire; but it is almost impossible to judge of the effects of this calamity, without having beheld the pleasant plains in the vicinity of a burning mountain, converted into huge masses of black lava, now as hard as rock, and recollecting that these had once been streams of liquid fire. There are, however, still some buildings in a perfect state, such as the cathedral, the Benedictine church, and a convent. One street, called Strada Steriscorea, is of immense length, presenting a beautiful vista, terminated by the venerable Etna.

I witnessed at the cathedral a grand ceremonial of the inauguration of a new Bishop of Catania. There was little decorum observable in the spectators, principally composed of priests, who appeared, instead of devout actors in the scene, to have come, like ourselves, only to enjoy the show. In consequence of the noise, it was impossible to hear any thing said by the bishop, archbishop, or officiating priests: seeing, however, some clergymen reading out of books, I fancied, if I could catch a glimpse of a few words, I might gain a knowledge of what was passing; but looking over the shoulder of one of the priests for this purpose, I found his manual was an Italian play.

The ride from Catania to Giarra was most delightful. We made a detour of two miles in order to visit the church Del Ermitaggio, from the terrace of which is a splendid view over an extensive plain, studded with towns, Ai Reale, and several others, and bounded by the sea. The rocks of the Cyclops lay below us, and the mountains of Calabria crowned the distance, while on the left rose Etna in all its glory, on whose sides were seen numerous white villages and farm-houses sparkling in the sunshine. We passed lovely gardens full of orange and lemon trees, bearing fruit and blossoms at the same time; and over the walls in front of the houses hung roses, carnations, and double stocks of an immense size. Even the very weeds on the road-side sprang up and blossomed like elegant flowers, in colours of yellow, pink, blue, and scarlet, of the brightest hues.

Still, I had only to look to the beds of lava in the vicinity for this gay scene to vanish from my mind, in the associations raised by the frightful contrast. Torrents of cinders gave a broken, gloomy, and ragged appearance to much of the rich and cultivated country which lay before me. Signor Abbate, who accompanied us, pointed out a small village, whose fate may better exemplify the effects of the calamity I was deploring, than any description of mine. The village had contained one hundred and fifty men, with their wives and children. From the smallness of the church these were compelled to attend divine service at different times. The women had gone and returned first as usual, and the men occupied their places; but scarcely had they assembled, when an earthquake occurred, which destroyed the priest and the whole of the congregation—absolutely not one man in the village escaped! My informant added that the poor women being left destitute, (here I expected a tale of distress,) resorted to another parish, to recruit for fresh husbands; "for what," said he, "could they do, but settle themselves again in matrimony as soon as possible?"

If the ride to Giarra was delightful, I must search for some stronger word to express the enjoyment I derived from our journey to Fiumi di Nisi, during which every variety of the grand and the lovely in prospect was offered to our view. The route generally lay between the sea on the right hand and the range of mountains on the left, on whose sides were, as usual, scattered numerous white villages, with churches and convents, all seated amidst the most luxuriant vegetation; and, here and there, on the very summit of a lofty mountain, was perched a castle, to all appearance inaccessible. The town of Mola is situated on the top of an immense rock. We had to ascend towards it in order to reach Taurominium, which is itself one thousand two hundred feet higher than the level of the sea—still Mola towered far above us. Taurominium (an amphitheatre both by nature and art) justifies all the praises which have been lavished on it by travellers, for the views from it combine all that is magnificent in scenery. I can imagine nothing finer in Europe,—I had almost said in the world.

Our lodging at the hamlet of Fiumi di Nisi was as humble as can be imagined; every thing was primitive except the disposition to overcharge, which seemed to have the usual advantage of modern improvement.

A beautiful ride of eighteen miles, equally lovely with that described above, brought us to Messina. The manner of travelling prevented our making much progress, for the mules seldom go out of a walk, and this method, though it may appear tedious to those accustomed to travel post, affords the best means of seeing the country to advantage; indeed the climate is so delightful, and the various views so attractive, that one ceases to wish for greater celerity. At the time we were in Sicily the roads admitted of no other mode of conveyance, if I may call by the name of roads, paths through rocks, beds of torrents, and any places, in fact, over which the mules could scramble, though frequently the way lay over grassy downs and flowery plains, and the sands and shingles on the sea shore. The communication, however, will be shortly improved, for in many parts above our heads I saw the people employed in the construction of a new carriage road equal to any in Italy. It is to run from Syracuse through Messina to Palermo; and with the advantage of the steam vessel, which plies between Naples and the latter place, this road will render Sicily as accessible and as civilised as any other part of southern Europe—still I should be loth to adopt a more refined mode of travelling in exchange for the airy and independent one I have described.

If Messina were not so well known, I should dilate upon the splendour of its situation and the enchanting beauty of its harbour and environs. The city itself has a gay appearance, and the buildings, many of them quite new, give one hopes that it has risen again to opulence, and that the calamitous effects of the last earthquake have ceased to be felt.

CHAPTER XVIII.

Embarkation on a speronaro for Salerno—Charybdis—Pæstum—Pompeii.

Unfavourable accounts of the road, and the increasing heat of the weather, induced us to abandon our intention of visiting Palermo; and we resolved on going directly to Naples. No packets or large vessels being procurable, we were compelled to hire a speronaro—a small half-decked boat, rowed by ten men; and though considered a secure conveyance, yet no boat of such a size and construction could either be safe or agreeable on the open seas. The accommodation was so limited, that a gentleman who had accompanied us from Syracuse had just space to creep into a hole below deck, while we spread our bedding above; a canvass awning being the only shelter from the rain and spray. On the 19th of April, we left Messina, and passed through the Faro, with a fine and favourable breeze. There was nothing alarming in crossing the famous whirlpool, which has long since lost its dangerous character; but the spirit of that person must indeed be dull who could be rocked on the waves of Charybdis without hearing in imagination the barking of Scylla, and while bounding over a sea consecrated by the fascination of classical embellishment, fail to be animated by recollections fraught with every object of interest and admiration.

Towards evening, we passed near Stromboli, which, though then burning, we did not think it worth while to visit, but desired our captain, as the wind was freshening, to shape his course for Pæstum. Pretending, however, that the breeze would not admit of our making the latter place, he touched at Acropolis, a curious town, built on a precipitous rock, which presents a bold and singular appearance from the sea. We had intended to proceed by land to Pæstum, but so exorbitant a price was demanded for the mules, that we determined to go by water to Salerno, a measure I heartily repented of at the time, as the wind had increased to a gale, but which, when we had landed in safety, and all our perils were at an end, I was glad had been adopted. It afforded us the opportunity of seeing the Bay of Salerno in perfection. The town, built half-way up a mountain—its summit, crowned with an ancient fortress of the most picturesque shape—Acropolis towering on the neighbouring height, and contrasted with the temples of Pæstum, on the low, damp plain, formed, on the whole, a view scarcely to be equalled by Naples itself.

At day-break next morning, we set off for Pæstum, in a carriage drawn in the ancient style, by four horses abreast—(our boat also was drawn up on the beach, as if it had been under the orders of Palinurus;) and after staying there a couple of hours, we returned to Salerno at eight o'clock. I was gratified by the excursion, not so much, perhaps, from the sight of the temples themselves, as from being able to contrast them with the stupendous monuments we had lately seen; and, without affectation, I may venture to say, that the Egyptian traveller finds it an effort to bestow great admiration on the ruins of Pestum.

* Sir Thomas Fellowes had two of his sons, one a child of nine years old, on board the Dartmouth at the battle of Navarino. These young midshipmen behaved with a coolness scarcely to be expected at their tender age; and during the action, the elder, only twelve himself, had the admirable good sense and feeling to keep his brother out of their father's sight, lest the latter's anxiety should be excited.

Leaving Salerno, we passed through the most lovely scenery, especially about La Cava. Hanging gardens, interspersed with woods and running streams, sometimes lay planted in deep ravines below the level of the road, sometimes cut in the sides of the mountain, towered high above our heads. A little farther were fields of beans, peas, lupines, and the most brilliant clover; while vineyards, with their vines gracefully trained to the branches of high poplars, bordered the road as far as Pompeii. The pass of La Cava is indeed one of fairy land.

A far different scene awaited us in the ruins of Pompeii; but as there were many workmen employed in repairs, and a large and boisterous party preceding us, I was disappointed by the interruption to the stillness and desolation which ought to form such a peculiar contrast to the busy din of the inhabited world around. Although, however, the illusion was destroyed, still there was, of course, much of surpassing interest in the examination of this disintegrated city; and on subsequently visiting the Studio at Naples, I found the bronzes and other articles, removed there from Pompeii, by far the most curious objects of that extensive and valuable collection.

Naples is not seen to advantage in coming through Portici, but it is still a grand sight; and justifies the descriptions usually given of it.

CHAPTER XIX.

Naples—Vesuvius—Best views of the city and the bay—Eustace's tomb—Admirable statuary in the church of San Severo—Anecdote relative to the palace of Capo di Monte—Curious etiquette at San Carlo—Inferiority of Italian singers in Italy—No English church at Naples.

Now that I have brought my narrative so far as the beaten ground of Naples, my privilege of description, throughout much abridged that I might not weary by repetition, must be still further curtailed; and I shall be careful not to expatiate on topics already familiar, and especially to avoid intruding into that province which Mrs. Starke has appropriated to herself, by her accurate and entertaining Guide-book. It requires some self-denial, however, to dismiss Naples without dwelling on its innumerable beauties.

At the time I visited Vesuvius, the crater was quite tranquil, and afforded little interest. Those who ascend the summit merely for the purpose of enjoying the prospect, may have that pleasure without any labour on the road a little beyond the Hermitage, a short distance from the foot of the mountain. There is, indeed, a still better view from the Convent of St. Martin; but the one which, in my judgment, must be superior to any in Naples, is that which I heard is afforded from the terrace of Camaldoli.

In my rambles, I stepped into the Church of Le Crocette, to see poor Eustace's tomb. It is but a humble monument for a man so distinguished, yet it may serve to remind us how severe the world has been towards one who, notwithstanding his errors, has greatly contributed to its amusement and instruction.

The church of San Severo, which is little more than a mausoleum of the Sangro family, contains three celebrated pieces of statuary, of which I obtained a more detailed account than I have seen elsewhere; one of Modesty, covered wholly with a veil; a man caught in a net; and a recumbent figure of a dead Christ, which surpasses all imagination by its exquisite sculpture and admirable expression. The first statue is said to represent the mother of Don Raimondo di Sangro, who himself is exhibited in the second, as one undeceived with respect to the vanities of the world by his better reason, here expressed by a Genius disentangling a man from a net.

The first of these masterpieces is by a Genoese named Quercia; the second by Corrodino, who designed the third statue also, but which was executed after his death by San Martino; the last is transcendent.

There is also in the church a monument of Don Francesco di Sangro, represented as rising out of a chest, in armour, and grasping a drawn sword. He pretended to be dead, and caused himself to be inclosed in a vault, from which he issued at night to take vengeance on his unprepared enemies.

It is said, that the Palace of Capo di Monte, which is on an elevated spot about two miles from the town, owes its construction to the following circumstances:—The late king of Naples having, while in alliance with England, acted against us in a hostile manner, a fleet was sent to require satisfaction. The admiral forwarded his despatches on shore by an officer, with directions to bring back a proper answer before the lapse of an hour. The Neapolitans wanted to prevent his landing, but he pointed to the guns of the admiral's ship, and was allowed to pass. No one could be persuaded to take his despatches to the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, who was in the council chamber. The officer carried them thither himself, but was told the council was sitting, and could not be disturbed; whereupon he opened the door, and delivered them with his own hands. The king and council demurred—they were told the guns of the fleet would open on the town when the hour was expired. Being without resource, the concession demanded was agreed to, and the king gave orders for building the palace at Capo di Monte, that he might at least have a residence beyond the reach of the British cannon.

A piece of etiquette which prevails at the theatre of San Carlos is sufficiently curious. If any of the royal family be present, none of the audience testify the least approbation of the performance till a slight motion of the august hands gives the signal for applause. It was amusing to see all eyes directed to the royal box, when there was a disposition in the house to applaud, and to perceive how frequently the dozing of the illustrious referees defeated their good intentions. Any expression of disapprobation is strictly prohibited.

In Italy, I had fully expected to be delighted by hearing the music of its best masters, sung by performers best qualified to do it justice;—but in this I was greatly disappointed. There were no good vocalists; even at San Carlo, and at the Scala, at Milan, the two finest theatres in the world, the prima donnas were decidedly inferior, and would scarcely have been listened to at the English Opera. Generally speaking, indeed, the absence of music, especially in the streets, is remarkable throughout Italy. As the sovereigns are the principal contributors to the theatres, perhaps the Italians are less fastidious than they were formerly, being contented to accept an inferior amusement at a smaller price. The true reason, however, probably is, that wealthier nations can afford to give greater remuneration to professional talent, and thus Polyhymnia is bribed to desert her once favoured land. On asking for the English church, I was told there was none. Not because there was any objection on the part of the Neapolitans—not because there was any deficiency of Protestants in the city—not because there were wanting clergymen anxious for the appointment; but because the numerous English residents and visitors would not contribute towards paying the moderate salary of a chaplain, one moiety of which the British government has consented to defray. The consul-general had endeavoured to overcome this indifference on the part of our countrymen, and his failure, it must be reluctantly allowed, remains a blot on the national respectability.

CHAPTER XX.

Pontine Marshes—Destruction of early illusions by Mr. Niebuhr—Author's admiration of Rome unimpaired by having previously visited Egypt—Defacement of public monuments—Hospice of St. Bernard—Return to England.

Having fairly commenced our Italian journey, we dismissed all our heavy baggage, as the country through which we had to pass would render it superfluous, though, notwithstanding the luxuries which English travellers had for some years introduced, I found at many stages pudding dishes for basins, and a variety of other such expedients prevailing. On crossing the Pontine Marshes, the postillions drove us slowly, because we refused them double fees. These famous marshes, however, appeared not much more formidable to me than the Barrackpore road near Calcutta, when the rice grounds on each side are overflowed and stagnant.

On our entrance into Albano, we passed a ruin hitherto supposed to be the tomb of the Curiatii. Must we have all our pleasing, youthful fancies and associations dispelled by Mr. Niebuhr's sober wand of truth?—I now consider it an advantage to have travelled through the country before having heard of his book, and to have been enabled to yield, without suspicion, to long established illusions regarding the acts and fortunes of many celebrated men, whom his unpoetical erudition has proved to have had existence only in fiction.

After visiting the lake, we reached Rome, about one o'clock, passing on the approach to our inn the Coliseum, the Forum, the columns of Trajan and Antoninus, and other interesting objects, impressed upon our minds from the earliest period of our youth; and the sight of which, even in more sober age, made my heart beat with enthusiasm.

The author of the "English in Italy" takes an opportunity of condemning the affectation of those travellers, who, having visited Egypt, pretend to find nothing interesting in the "Eternal City." In this instance I shall not come under his censure, for I do not hesitate to say, that after all the wonders of Egypt, and after raising my anticipations to the highest pitch, Rome still surpassed my most exaggerated expectations. I would not, however, offend my ancient favourites in Egypt, by comparing them to objects so dissimilar. Rome and Egypt have each their peculiar beauties, and one may enjoy the delight of having seen both, without entering on the unsatisfactory task of contrast.

The late pope was most meritoriously regardful of the cleanliness of the capital, and thus enabled visitors not to restrict their admiration to the ancient city alone, but to extend it to the modern improvements, evinced in the embellishment of churches and the opening of new fountains. He also liberally contributed to the health and comfort of the people, by completing extensive walks and drives, commenced by the French, (that of Mount Pincio particularly)—but above all, his scrupulous preservation and repair of every ancient relic demand our gratitude. From Rome we passed through Florence, to Pisa, a city which interested me next to Rome itself.

At Leghorn I discovered our first approach to a vicinity crowded by sailors and a lower class of English, not alone from the appearance of their ships, and their activity on the quay, but from the habits of destructiveness so peculiar to the nation, an organ which I am sure Spurzheim would find highly developed in most of our countrymen.

While admiring the beautiful colossal figures in bronze attached to the statue of Ferdinand I., which stands in the dock yard, I observed that they were in some places indented, and covered with mud. On inquiring the cause, I was informed that this violence was attributed to the English sailors, many of whose missiles, in the shape of stones and brickbats, were lying around. It is too well known that this propensity of our countrymen to mischief is not exercised in foreign lands only, and it furnishes the sole excuse for shutting up our churches and public edifices, a practice so universally condemned by foreigners;—but who can wonder at these restrictions, after seeing placards affixed in the metropolis itself, denouncing punishment against those who wantonly deface its embellishments, and would even demolish the monuments of national gratitude?

By a far different feeling is the Italian actuated. There is not a Roman who does not consider St. Peter's as his own. Let the slightest disrespect be shown towards it, or the smallest injury offered to its ornaments, or to those of any building in the city, and he would resent it as a personal insult, and consider it his own peculiar misfortune.

Leaving Leghorn, we went to Lucca, Spezzia*, Genoa, and Nice. Thence crossing the Col di Tenda, by the magnificent and lovely road lately opened for posting, we came to Turin, Milan, Como, and Lago Maggiore, and crossing the Simplon, arrived, by the way of Martigny, at Geneva. From Geneva I ascended to Chamouni and Montanvert, the Mer de Glace, and crossed the Col de Balme, back to Martigny. Thence we thought it necessary to make an excursion to the great St. Bernard, which I shall mention somewhat more at large, and perhaps spare others, who may form romantic preconceptions, the disappointment I experienced; for great part of the road is dreary, without affording any grand prospects, and the establishment at the Hospice partakes so much of a secular and every day character, that I do not think the interest of the journey compensates for its length and fatigue.

The monks being at prayers when we arrived at the Hospice, we were introduced by a servant into a comfortable room, where we were shortly joined by the Père Econome. After some conversation, he took us a short and dreary walk to the chapel and the charnel house, where the bodies of strangers who have perished in the snow are deposited. There had been no accidents of this kind during the past year, and I could only perceive, by the momentary glance I took of the mournful receptacle, a mass of skeletons and mouldering remains. I suspect, indeed, the effects of the climate in preserving the features for many years from alteration or decomposition have been greatly exaggerated, if they do not exist altogether in the imagination of novelists. I found the Père Ecomme quite a man of the world in his discourse and manners. On our return from walking, he produced some music books, led me to the piano, and took a chair by my side, and I never thought myself more out of place than when I beheld a monk of St. Bernard in his high black cap, and in the dress of his order, bending over the notes of the instrument at which I was seated.

It being a fast-day, the other brethren excused themselves, and we sat down to dinner, which consisted of the usual ingredients of maigre day, with him alone.

During the favourable season, scarcely a day passes without visitors; there have sometimes been forty at once. In proof of this I may mention, that on our return home we met twelve persons on their way to the Hospice. In consequence of this influx of guests it has become necessary to enlarge the building, which has now the appearance of an hotel, and is attended by a waiter and a chamber-maid. The only difference is, that one goes through the form of dining with the monks, and receiving, under the semblance of obligation, the hospitality for which the convent is amply repaid. When there are female guests, the monks usually join them at meals, in the strangers' parlour; otherwise, the gentlemen are admitted into the refectory. So much has it come to be considered in the light of an inn, that some persons have been guilty of the indecorum of expressing a desire to dine alone, which was very properly refused on the part of the monks, with whom it is a rule that one at least should preside in the visitors' room.

St. Bernard is a dependence of the Augustine monastery, at Martigni. None but young and robust men reside at the Hospice, and as they become old or unfit to withstand the inclemency of the mountain climate, they are transferred to the establishment below. The monks of the order have the privilege of writing directly to the pope, are permitted to drink wine, and to read newspapers and books of miscellaneous literature to amuse their solitude. Having so much society and so many indulgences, the condition of these monks is, probably, on the whole, more comfortable than that of their brethren in many other convents.

The old breed of dogs is all but extinct. The new ones do not possess the same large head and double nose, but are said to be equally sagacious; and the activity of the brethren is as sedulous as ever in seeking out persons lost in the snow, and though the loss of lives has not of late been so frequent, the establishment is still eminently useful to travellers. The convent register contains a touching acknowledgment of one of these from Turin, who fell down from exhaustion for the fourth time just at the door of the Hospice, when he was accidentally perceived and recovered.

The neighbouring peasantry, who frequently miss their way in traversing the mountains, experience the kindest treatment from the monks, who, though they receive, as is but fair, contributions from opulent visitants, extend their benevolence gratuitously to the poor.

After leaving Saint Bernard, we traversed the greater part of Switzerland, ascending the Grimsel and Righi. Our course then took us to Lyons, and after a short stay at Paris, I reached England early in September, 1828, having been above eleven months on my varied and most interesting journey.

The foregoing pages contain so many proofs of the facility with which the overland journey is performed, and of the gratification which rewards the undertaking, that it seems now superfluous for the author to declare her decided preference of it to the sea voyage round the Cape. While peace continues with the Turks, there can be no just ground for apprehending molestation on their part; but, on the contrary, every degree of courtesy may be expected from the Egyptian government. The shoals of the Red Sea and the storms of the Mediterranean are not usually considered so formidable as the hurricanes of the Mauritius, and the gales off the Cape of Good Hope. The expense of the overland passage is much less, for it is not necessary to consume one half of the time which the author did in Egypt and the continent of Europe. From the moment of entering a ship for the Cape voyage, until its termination at the end of four or five months, persons are unavoidably subjected, whatever may be the kindness of the commander, to restraint and inactivity; but, on the other hand, the passage up the Red Sea having been effected, all then is novelty, interest, and enjoyment.

Appendix.

The following extracts from the works of Hamilton and Richardson, relative to the principal buildings in the author's route through Egypt are inserted, as likely to be acceptable to the homeward bound traveller. The most essential parts only, however, have been given, and reference must be had to the originals for more detailed information.

It seems to be still doubtful on which side of the Nile Thebes Proper was situated. On the right bank are the ruins of the temples of Luxor and Carnac, and on the left the palace of Medinet Haboo, the burying places of the kings and queens, Ebek, the Memnonium, and the catacombs of Gournoo, all of which may be included under the term Thebes.

LUXOR.

[Hamilton's Egyptiaca, p. 114.]

"In approaching this temple from the north, the first object is a magnificent propylon, or gateway, which is two hundred feet in length, and the top of it fifty-seven feet above the present level of the soil. In front of the entrance are the two most perfect obelisks in the world, each of a single block of red granite, from the quarries of Elephantine; they are between seven and eight feet square at the base, and above eighty feet high; many of the hieroglyphical figures with which they are covered are an inch and three quarters deep, cut with the greatest nicety and precision. Between these obelisks and the propylon are two colossal statues, also of red granite; though buried in the ground to the chest, they still measure twenty-one and twenty-two feet from thence to the top of their mitres. The attention of the traveller is soon diverted from these masses, to the sculptures which cover the eastern wing of the north front of the propylon, on which is a very animated description of a remarkable event in the campaigns of some Osymandrias or Sesotris." The "ruined portico," which is entered from the gateway, is of "very large dimensions" [p. 119:] "from this a double row of seven columns, with lotus capitals, two and thirty feet in circumference, conducts you into a court, one hundred and sixty feet long, and one hundred and forty wide, terminated at each side by a row of columns, beyond which is another portico of thirty-two columns, and the adytum, or interior apartments of the building."

[Richardson's Travels, vol. ii. p. 84.]

"The temple of Luxor was probably built on the banks of the Nile for the convenience of sailors and wayfaring men: where, without much loss of time, they might stop, say their prayers, present their offerings, &c. Great and magnificent as it is, it only serves to show us the way to a much greater, to which it is hardly more in comparison than a kind of porter's lodge; I mean the splendid ruin of the temple at Carnac. The distance from Luxor to Carnac is about a mile and a half, or two miles. The whole road was formerly lined with a row of sphinxes on each side. At present these are entirely covered up for about two thirds of the way, on the end nearest to Luxor. On the latter part of the road, near to Carnac, a row of criosphinxes (that is, with a ram's head and a lion's body) still exist on each side of the way."

CARNAC.

[Hamilton, p. 132.]

"The name of Diosopolis is sufficient to entitle us to call the grand temple at Carnac the temple of Jupiter. This temple has twelve principal entrances, each of which is composed of several propyla and colossal gateways, or moles, besides other buildings attached to them, in themselves larger than most other temples. One of the propyla is entirely of granite, adorned with the most finished hieroglyphics. On each side of many of them have been colossal statues of basalt, breccia, and granite; some sitting, some erect, from twenty to thirty feet in height.

"The body of the temple, which is preceded by a large court, at whose sides are colonnades, of thirty columns in length, and through the middle of which are two rows of columns fifty feet high, consists, first, of a prodigious hall, or portico, whose roof is sustained by one hundred and thirty-four columns, some of which are twenty-six feet in circumference, and others thirty-four; then are four beautiful obelisks, marking the entrance to the adytum, near which the monarch is represented as embraced by the arms of Isis.

The adytum itself consists of three apartments, entirely of granite. The principal room, which is in the centre, is twenty feet long, sixteen wide, and thirteen feet high. Three blocks of granite form the roof, which is painted with clusters of gilt stars, on a blue ground. Beyond are other porticoes and galleries, which have been continued to another propylon, at the distance of two thousand feet from that of the western extremity of the temple.

"It may not be uninteresting to add a few more particulars relative to this temple, the largest, perhaps, and certainly one of the most ancient in the world.

"Two of the porticoes within it appear to have consisted of pillars, in the form of human figures, in the character of Hermes, that is, the lower part of the body hidden, and unshapen, with his arms folded, and in his hand the insignia of divinity; perhaps the real origin of the Grecian Caryatides.

"Exclusive of these columnar statues, which have been thirty-eight in number, and the least of them thirty feet high, there are fragments more or less mutilated, of twenty-three other statues, in granite, breccia, and basalt, seventeen of which are colossal, and have been placed in front of the several entrances. They are in general from twenty-five to thirty feet in height, and executed in the best Egyptian style."

BIBAN OOL MOOLK,

OR THE TOMBS OF THE KINGS.

[Richardson's Travels, vol. i. p. 304.]

"It is a most dismal looking spot, a valley of rubbish, without a drop of water, or blade of grass. The entrance to the tombs looks out from the rock like the entrance to so many mines; and were it not for the recollections with which it is peopled, and the beautiful remains of ancient art which lie hid in the bosom of the mountain, would hardly ever be visited by man or beast. The heat is excessive, from the confined dimensions of the valley, and the reflection of the sun from the rock and sand. The whole valley is filled with rubbish that has been washed down from the rock, or carried out in the making of the tombs, with merely a narrow road up the centre."

[Richardson's Travels, vol. i. p. 305.]

"Diodorus Siculus states, on the authority of the Egyptian priests, that forty-seven of these tombs were entered in their sacred registers, only seventeen of which remained in the time of Ptolemy Lagus. And in the 80th Olympiad, about sixty years B. C., when Diodorus Siculus was in Egypt, many of these were greatly defaced. Before Mr. Belzoni began his operations in Thebes, only eleven of these tombs were known to the public. From the great success that crowned his exertions, the number of them is nearly double. The general appearance of these tombs is that of a continued shaft, or corridor, cut in the rock, in some places spreading out into large chambers; in other places small chambers pass off by a small door from the shaft, &c. In some places where the rock is low and disintegrated, a broad excavation is formed on the surface, till it reaches a sufficient depth of solid stone, when it narrows, and enters by a door of about six or eight feet wide, and about ten feet high. The passage then proceeds with a gradual descent for about a hundred feet, widening or narrowing according to the plan or object of the architect, sometimes with side chambers, but more frequently not. The beautiful ornament of the globe, with the serpent in its wings, is sculptured over the entrance. The ceiling is black, with silver stars, and the vulture, with outspread wings, holding a ring and a broad feathered sceptre by each of his feet, is frequently repeated on it, with numerous hieroglyphics, which are white or variously coloured. The walls on each side are covered with hieroglyphics, and large sculptured figures of the deities of Egypt, and of the hero for whom the tomb was excavated. Sometimes both the hieroglyphics and the figures are wrought in intaglio; at other times they are in relief; but throughout the same tomb they are generally all of one kind. The colours are green, blue, red, black, and yellow, on a white ground, and in many instances are as fresh and vivid as if they had not been laid on a month. Intermixed with the figures, we frequently meet with curious devices, representing tribunals where people are upon their trials, and sometimes undergoing punishment; the preparation of mummies, and people bearing them in procession on their shoulders; animals tied for sacrifice, and partly cut up; and occasionally the more agreeable pictures of entertainments, with music and dancing, and well-dressed people listening to the sound of the harp, played by a priest, with his head shaved, and dressed in a loose flowing white robe, shot with red stripes."

END OF THE NARRATIVE.

Rambles of a Naturalist.

BY THE LATE DR. GODMAN.

(Now first collected.)

PREFACED BY A BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH OF THE AUTHOR.

As an appropriate accompaniment to the "Rambles of a Naturalist," we have transferred into our columns from the "Western Journal of the Medical and Physical Sciences," an able biographical memoir of the author, written by the editor, Dr. Drake of Cincinnati. It is highly creditable to Dr. D's heart and judgment, and forms an interesting specimen of American Biography, which we are anxious to preserve, and gratified to be the means of widely disseminating.

To know Dr. Godman intimately was to admire and love him. A friend who enjoyed peculiar advantages for studying his disposition thus characterises the peculiar traits of his mind:—

The great characteristics of Dr. Godman's mind, were his retentive memory, an unwearied industry and quick perception, and his capacity of concentrating all his powers upon any given object of pursuit. What he had once read or observed, he rarely, if ever, forgot. Hence it was, that although his early education was much neglected, he became an excellent linguist, and made himself master of Latin, French, and German, besides acquiring a knowledge of Greek, Italian and Spanish. He had read the best works in all these languages, and wrote with facility the Latin and French.

His powers of observation were quick, patient, keen and discriminating; and it was these qualities that rendered him so admirable a naturalist. He came to the study of natural history as an investigator of facts, and not as a pupil of the schools; and while he regarded systems and nomenclature with perhaps too little respect, his great aim was to learn the instincts, the structure and the habits of all animated beings. This science was his favourite pursuit, and he devoted himself to it with indefatigable zeal. He has been heard to say, that in investigating the habits of the shrew mole, he walked many hundred miles. Those parts of his natural history in which he relates the results of his own observation, are among the most interesting essays on that subject in our language. This praise is due in a still greater degree to his Rambles of a Naturalist, which are not inferior in poetical beauty and vivid and accurate description, to the celebrated letters of Gilbert White on the Natural History of Selbourne. These essays were among the last productions of his pen, and were written in the intervals of acute pain and extreme debility. They form a mere sketch of what he intended, and had he lived to complete them, he would have left a work and a name of enduring popularity.

There were few subjects of general literature, excepting the pure and mixed mathematics, with which Dr. Godman was not more or less familiar. Among other pursuits to which his attention had been turned, was the study of ancient coins, of which he had acquired a critical knowledge.

The powers of his mind were always buoyant. His eagerness in the pursuit of knowledge seemed like the impulses of gnawing hunger and unquenchable thirst. Neither adversity nor disease could allay it, and had it pleased Providence to heal his mortal wound, and prolong his life and strength, he would have borne away the palm from all his contemporaries.

The fine imagination and deep enthusiasm of Dr. Godman occasionally burst forth in impassioned poetry. He wrote verse and prose with almost equal facility, and had he lived and enjoyed leisure to prune the exuberance of his style, and to bestow the last polish upon his labours, he would have ranked as one of the great masters of our language, both in regard to the curious felicity, and the strength and clearness of his diction. The following specimens of his poetical compositions are selected less for their intrinsic excellence, than for the picture which they furnish of his private meditations.

A MIDNIGHT MEDITATION.

'Tis midnight's solemn hour! now wide unfurled
Darkness expands her mantle o'er the world:
The fire-fly's lamp has ceased its fitful gleam;
The cricket's chirp is hushed; the boding scream
Of the grey owl is stilled; the lofty trees
Scarce wave their summits to the falling breeze;
All nature is at rest, or seems to sleep;
'Tis thine alone, oh man! to watch and weep!
Thine 'tis to feel thy system's sad decay,
As flares the taper of thy life away
Beneath the influence of fell disease:—
Thine 'tis to know the want of mental ease
Springing from memory of time mispent;
Of slighted blessings; deepest discontent,
And riotous rebellion 'gainst the laws
Of health, truth, heaven, to win the world's applause!

Such was thy course, Eugenio, such thy hardened heart,
Till mercy spoke, and death unsheathed the dart,
Twanged his unerring bow, and drove the steel,
Too deep to be withdrawn, too wide the wound to heal;
Yet left of life a feebly glimmering ray,
Slowly to sink and gently ebb away.

—And yet, how blest am I?
While myriad others lie
In agony of fever or of pain,
With parching tongue and burning eye,
Or fiercely throbbing brain;
My feeble frame, though spoiled of rest,
Is not of comfort dispossessed.
My mind awake, looks up to thee,
Father of mercy! whose blest hand I see
In all things acting for our good,
Howe'er thy mercies be misunderstood.

—See where the waning moon
Slowly surmounts yon dark tree tops,
Her light increases steadily, and soon
The solemn night her stole of darkness drops:
Thus to my sinking soul in hours of gloom,
The cheering beams of hope resplendent come,
Thus the thick clouds which sin and sorrow rear
Are changed to brightness, or swift disappear.

Hark! that shrill note proclaims approaching day;
The distant east is streaked with lines of gray;
Faint warblings from the neighbouring groves arise,
The tuneful tribes salute the brightening skies.
Peace breathes around; dim visions o'er me creep,
The weary night outwatched, thank God! I too may sleep.

Lines written under a feeling of the immediate approach of Death.

The damps of death are on my brow, the chill is in my heart,
My blood has almost ceased to flow, my hopes of life depart;
The valley and the shadow before me open wide,
But thou, Oh Lord! even there wilt be my guardian and my guide.

For what is pain, if thou art nigh its bitterness to quell?
And where death's boasted victory, his last triumphant spell?

Oh! Saviour, in that hour when mortal strength is nought,
When nature's agony comes on, and every anguished thought

Springs in the breaking heart a source of darkest woe,
Be nigh unto my soul, nor permit the floods o'erflow.
To thee! to thee alone! dare I raise my dying eyes;
Thou didst for all atone, by thy wondrous sacrifice;
Oh! in thy mercy's richness extend thy smiles on me,
And let my soul outspoke thy praise throughout eternity!

Beneath the above stanzas is the following note.
"Rather more than a year has elapsed since the above was first written. Death is now certainly near at hand; but my sentiments remain unchanged, except that my reliance on the Saviour is stronger."

This reliance on the mercies of God through Christ Jesus, became indeed the habitual frame of his mind; and imparted to the closing scenes of his life a solemnity and a calmness, a sweet serenity and a holy resignation, which robbed death of its sting, and the grave of its victory. It was a melancholy sight to witness the premature extinction of such a spirit; yet the dying couch on which genius, and virtue, and learning thus lay prostrated, beamed with more hallowed lustre, and taught a more salutary lesson than could have been imparted by the proudest triumphs of intellect. The memory of Dr. Godman, his blighted promise, and his unfinished labours, will long continue to call forth the vain regrets of men of science and learning. There are those who treasure up in their hearts as a more precious recollection, his humble faith and his triumphant death, and who can meet with an eye of pity, the scornful glance of the scoffer, and the infidel, at being told that if Dr. Godman was a philosopher, he was also a Christian.

MEMOIR OF DR. JOHN D. GODMAN.

Of Dr. Godman's early years, we have received a number of interesting memoranda, from his first medical preceptor, Dr. Luckey, now of Circleville, in this state. According to this gentleman, Dr. G. was born at Wilmington, in the state of Delaware. At an early period he lost his parents, and was left without patrimony, or deprived of it. Dr. Luckey first saw him in 1810, when he was fifteen years old. The doctor was, at that time, a senior student in the office of Dr. Thomas E. Bond, of Baltimore. "The office," says Dr. L., "was fitted up with taste, and boys, attracted by its appearance, would frequently drop in, to gaze on the labelled jars and drawers. Among them I discovered, one evening, an interesting lad, who was amusing himself with the manner in which his comrades pronounced the 'hard words,' with which the furniture was labelled. He appeared to be quite an adept in the Latin language. A strong curiosity soon prompted me to inquire 'Who are you?' 'Don't you recollect,' says he, 'that you visited a boy at Mr. Creery's, who had a severe attack of bilious colic?' 'I do. But what is your name my little boy?' 'He was small of his age. 'My name, sir, is John D. Godman.' 'Did you study the Latin language with Mr. Creery?' 'No, he does not teach any but an English school.' 'Do you intend to prosecute your studies alone?' 'I do. And I will, if I live, make myself a Latin, Greek, and French scholar.'

In the autumn of 1811, Dr. Luckey commenced the practice of medicine in Elizabethtown, Pennsylvania, and the next summer received a letter from his protégé, stating that he had been bound an apprentice to the printer of a newspaper. With this business, he was, from the beginning, exceedingly dissatisfied, as he evinced in his numerous letters to Dr. Luckey.

In one of these, dated July 23d, 1812, he expressed the opinion, that it was worse than "cramping his genius over a pestle and mortar"—it was "cramping it over a font of types, where there are words without ideas."

Addicted to reading, and aspiring to a more intellectual pursuit, it is not probable that our young printer was much devoted to the drudgery of the office, or performed his duties con amore; which may sufficiently explain the origin of the difficulties, set forth in the following paragraph from a subsequent letter to the same.

"Every thing is in status quo with me. The same series of oppressions, impositions and insults are still my lot to bear. But I will not bear them long. From the oldest to the youngest, master and man, all seem to have a disposition to peck at me. You will (or may be) surprised to hear that I can never make a printer. It is an erroneous opinion of some people, that no one can make a printer unless he be a scholar. On the contrary, scholars can hardly, if at all, be printers. I would not wish you to think that I count myself a scholar. On the contrary I think myself no scholar."

The following extract from another letter, dated October 23d, 1813, shows that, at this early period, young Godman was threatened with the malady which ultimately destroyed him.

"The disease for which I mentioned a recipe in my last has commenced its direful effects on my poor body. A continued pain in my breast, and at night a slow but burning fever, convince me that I am travelling down a much frequented road to the place where disease has no effect. This my friend is no phantasy. I do not say it from affectation. I feel it. I cannot believe in this disease being contagious, or I should be certain that I have caught it. I sleep with a youth who was born with it and has it fully."

In the opinion of Dr. L., the deceased, at that early period, laboured under a hypertrophy of the heart.

Through the whole of his apprenticeship, young Godman had a strong desire to study medicine, but his guardian was opposed to any change of destination. Early in the month of January, 1814, he writes to Dr. L.—

"At the suggestion of Dr. Anderson, I have determined to commence the study of chemistry, as he says it will be a great improvement to the mind, and more so, I may be enabled, the ensuing season (if I should live so long) to attend the lectures at the University (of Maryland), and it seems to run greatly in Dr. A.'s head that I shall one day be a physician. How far this surmise may be right, time will disclose. It may indeed so happen, and should I study chemistry now, I shall not have it to do at a future period. I must, however, ask your opinion in this affair."

On the 24th of the same month, he writes to the same gentlemen—

"I have read the catechetical part of Parke's Chemistry, and I can assure you I liked it not a little. But my knowledge, so far as I may obtain it, will only be theoretical."

In the same letter he sets forth his early views of the Christian religion:

"I have not ever had a fixed determination to read the works of that Modern Serpent,* nor had I determined not to do it; and it seems to me surprising, that a fellow student of yours should recommend the perusal of such writings as Thomas Paine's."

"I had, thank heaven, before I asked you the question, and still have, the 'Apology for the Bible,' by the celebrated Lord Regius, of Landaff, (Bishop Watson.) There is a great comfort in the belief of that glorious doctrine of salvation, that teaches us to look to the Great Savior for happiness in a future life; and it has always been my earnest desire, and I must endeavour to die the death of the righteous, that my last end and future state may be like his. It would be a poor hope indeed—it would be a sandy fountain for the dying soul, to have no hope but such as might be derived from the works of Bolingbroke and Paine; and how rich the consolation and satisfaction afforded by the glorious tidings of the blessed Scriptures. It is my opinion, there has never one of these modern deists died as their writings would lead us to believe; nor are but few of their writings read at the present day."

In the year 1814, when the war raged in the Chesapeake, he became a sailor under Com. Barney, and was engaged in the service at the bombardment of Fort M'Henry. Early in the next year, Dr. Luckey, captivated by his genius, and touched by his misfortunes, resolved to invite him to his house, in Elizabethtown, and afford him all the facilities in his power for studying the profession to which he aspired. It does not appear how he had rid himself of his apprenticeship; but he seems to have been at liberty to accept the doctor's generous invitation. This he did, with emotions of joy which are uttered in the following simple and affecting reply, dated April 4th, 1815.

"I have this hour received your last letter, and I can assure, you, that language is inadequate to express to you my sincere, unfeigned joy, for the pleasing news you have communicated to me. Let the manner in which these lines are penned, convince you of the state of my mind at present. I was, thirty minutes before I received your letter, on the point of going to a printer, in this city, to seek employment, and, but for Providence, I should have done so. You may suppose that, as soon as I read your letter, I abandoned this intention and returned to my sister's house,† with fire in each eye and paper in each hand, to answer your epistle of friendship's own dictating. I must lay this aside for a short time, till my mind becomes settled and undisturbed. I stopped at the line above, in order that I might recover a small degree of composure, in order to express myself as I ought, to so good a friend. I will certainly comply with your request, should it please God to continue my health and strength during the ensuing week. Should it please the mercy of Providence to suffer me to take up my residence with you, I shall endeavour, by the most indefatigable study and diligence, to give you the satisfaction your kindness to me deserves. I am in hopes that I shall be able to come some day in the course of the next week; but, as my journey must be a pedestrian one, I should not wish to mention a particular day."

"On the 10th of April, four days after the date of this letter, he arrived," says Dr. L., "at my house, and took up his residence in my family. He made his promise good, for in six weeks he had acquired more knowledge in the different departments of medical science, than most students do in a year. During this short period he not only read Chaptal, Fourcroy, Chemselden, Murray, Brown, Cullen, Rush, Sydenham, Sharp, and Cooper, but wrote annotations on each, including critical remarks on the incongruities in their reasonings. He remained with me five months, and at the end of that time, you would have imagined from his conversation, that he was an Edinburgh graduate. When he sat down to study, so completely was he absorbed by his subject, that it seemed as though the amputation of one of his limbs would scarcely withdraw his attention."

A circumstance having no connection with the relation between him and his benefactor, but involving them both, led to premature separation. One or both of them were requested by the political party to which they belonged, to deliver orations on the approaching Fourth of July. Dr. L. began at the appointed hour, and went through with his discourse, but attempts were made by the opposite party to offer insult and create disturbance; at which our young orator became indignant; and yielding to the impulse of his strong native feelings, not only refused to deliver what he had prepared, but resolved on returning forthwith to Baltimore. His oration was left with his preceptor, who speaks of it as not unworthy of Patrick Henry.

Departing from Elizabethtown, he returned to Baltimore, and became a pupil of Dr. Hall; and, in the succeeding autumn, began to attend the lectures in that city. His pecuniary difficulties, however, were pressing, and, in the ensuing February, 1816, he wrote to his benefactor in the following eloquent and affecting style:

"Need I then inform you how high my expectations were raised, when I commenced attending the lectures this winter—need I say I was almost certain of future competency? Alas! my friend, the Great Ruler of events has interposed (in order to teach me resignation to his will) this heavy disappointment. By unforeseen events—by domestic calamities, I have been compelled to relinquish the study of medicine, so long the ultimatum of all my hopes. FATHER OF ALL, THY WILL BE DONE. I have made this my motto—my consolation; and did I not daily see the truth of 'Omnia pro optima,' I might perhaps repine. I am now in expectation of a situation with an eminent apothecary of this city, and I may be enabled, at a future period, to recommence the study of medicine."

This situation however he did not obtain.

"Let me now give you a retrospect of 'the days of my life.' Since I have returned from you, I have discovered my real age, in an old book of my father's, (and you would hardly suppose it.) I was 21 years old the 20th day of December, 1815. Before I was two years old I was motherless—before I was five years old I was fatherless and friendless—I have been cast among strangers—I have been deprived of property by fraud, that was mine by right—I have eaten the bread of misery—I have drunk of the cup of sorrow—I have passed the flower of my days in a state little better than slavery, and have arrived—at what? Manhood, poverty, and desolation. Heavenly Parent, teach me patience and resignation to thy will."

About this time he seems to have found a patron in Professor Davidge, and, on the 18th of April following, he wrote to Dr. Luckey—

"I still continue to study with Dr. Wright, (the partner of Dr. Davidge), and provided it shall be the will of heaven, I may possibly procure admission in the course of the next year into the venerable circle of medicine."

In speaking of his perplexed and embarrassed situation, and of the mutations of fortune, he says:—

"There is only one thing which points to, and affords immutable consolation, and that is, the observance of religion. Although we should be incapable of reaping enjoyment in this world, even from uninterrupted prosperity, yet we can ardently long for, and sincerely believe, we may be eternally happy in the next."

In this situation he finished his medical education. In the language of Professor Sewell*—

"Here he pursued his studies with such diligence and zeal, as to furnish, even at that early period, strong intimations of his future eminence. So indefatigable was he in the acquisition of knowledge, that he left no opportunity of advancement unimproved, and notwithstanding the deficiencies of his preparatory education, he pressed forward with an energy and perseverance, that enabled him not only to rival, but to surpass all his fellows."

He appears to have attended the lectures in the Baltimore school, through the sessions commencing in the autumns of 1816, and 1817. In the course of the last, Professor Davidge was disabled, by an accident, for several weeks, and Mr. Godman was appointed to supply his place. This, as he had been an apprentice to a trade, not three years before, in the same city, was an honourable testimony to his talents and industry, and must have been highly gratifying to his ambition. According to Professor Sewall, (loc. citato.)

"This situation he filled for several weeks with so much propriety—he lectured with such enthusiasm and eloquence, his illustrations were so clear and happy, as to gain universal applause; and at the time he was examined for his degree, the superiority of his mind, as well as the extent and accuracy of his knowledge, were so apparent, that he was marked by the professors of the University as one who was destined at some future period to confer high honour upon the profession."

In reference to his graduation, on the 10th of February, 1818, he wrote to his friend, Dr. Luckey, in these emphatical words:

"I know not what to tell you for news; unless I tell you that I passed my graduate examination, on Saturday; (Feb. 7,) which lasted twenty minutes; and, of course, I have now the 'vast unbounded prospect all before me;' though 'shadows, clouds, and darkness rest upon it.' I will go to the country to practise, most probably to Frederick county."

In the United States, it is common to see young men, without preparatory education or fortune, become practitioners of medicine; but most of this class struggle into the ranks of the profession, totally unprepared; and depart from it for other pursuits, or for the grave, unknown and unhonoured by the scientific world. Such an admission, must not be confounded with that of young Godman; who scorned to enter the profession unqualified and unauthorised by those who guard, or ought to guard, its portals. In this respect he was a shining example; and his subsequent success should animate every friendless young man, who may engage in the study of medicine, to imitate his industry and unflinching perseverance. By these means, if not blessed with his genius, they may prepare themselves for extensive usefulness, and earn respectability if not renown.

We come now to contemplate Dr. Godman, as a member of the profession. His first location was in the village of New Holland, on the banks of the Susquehanna; where, however, he remained but a few months. The next was on the Patapsco, near Baltimore, whence, in July, 1819, he wrote to Dr. Luckey as follows:

"My success in business has been considerable, or my practice, at least, has been as extensive as I could rationally expect." "What my success may be in the end is at present very doubtful. I still have considerable expectation of being recalled to Baltimore, in order to fill the place which I held in the University. If it so happen, I shall be much delighted, as a country life is very little, or not at all, to my taste."

In these rural situations he devoted himself to the study of nature; and, at a subsequent time, set forth the fruits of his observations in a series of papers, entitled the Rambles of a Naturalist. But his ardent temperament was little adapted to the stagnant existence of a village doctor. He thirsted for competition, and longed to engage in the rivalries which prevail among the candidates for fame. Nature seems to have urged him on. It was she who revealed to him the compass of his intellectual powers; and bid him seek a theatre commensurate with their efficiency. A different arrangement from what he had anticipated was made in the Baltimore school; he returned, however, to that city, but at length boldly resolved to fix himself in Philadelphia, and become a public teacher of anatomy and physiology.

But an unexpected event gave, for the time being, a different direction to his efforts. The writer of this article was enquiring, at that time, for a suitable person to fill the chair of surgery in the medical college of Ohio, the first session of which had just closed; and Dr. Godman was recommended. His qualifications for the first place, were expressed by Professor Gibson, then of the University of Pennsylvania, but previously a member of the Baltimore institution, in the following unequivocal and prophetic language. "In my opinion, Dr. Godman would do honour to any school in America." He was forthwith appointed; and arrived in Cincinnati the en-uing October, (1831,) in time to enter on the second session of the school.

For the practical details of such a professorship, he could not of course be well prepared, as his surgical experience was exceedingly limited; but he was learned in the institutes of the science, and his knowledge of anatomy was comprehensive, accurate and commanding. As a dissector, he was equally rapid and adroit. His lectures were well received by the class, who admired his genius, were captivated by his eloquence, and charmed with the naivete of his manners.

In the course of the session, difficulties, of which he was neither the cause nor the victim, were generated in the faculty, the class was small, and the prospects of the institution overcast: under these circumstances, Dr. Godman resigned, but did not at that time return to the east.

Not long before, the author of this narrative had issued proposals for a medical journal, to be edited by the professors of the college, and obtained a number of subscribers; but the distracted state of the institution prevented the fulfilment of the design. To this enterprise, as soon as he had resigned, Dr. Godman directed his attention; and assisted by Mr. Foote, a liberal and literary bookseller in this city, in a few weeks issued the first number of the Western Quarterly Reporter. Thus, if not the first to project, Dr. G. had the honour of being the first to commence, a journal of medicine, in the Valley of the Mississippi. At the end of the 6th number, of a hundred pages each, the work was discontinued, for, previously to that time, its editor had returned to Philadelphia. More than three hundred pages of this periodical were from his own pen; chiefly in translations and reviews of anatomy, physiology, and medical jurisprudence.

Dr. Godman resided in our city for one year only; but in that short period he deeply inscribed himself on the public mind. The memory of his works still remains with us. In addition to writing for his medical journal, and to his practice, which was considerable for a stranger, he erected an apparatus for sulphurous fumigation, and translated and published a French pamphlet on that remedy; he read medical books, and many current works of general literature; prosecuted the study of the German and Spanish languages; and labelled the ancient coins and medals of the Western Museum. In the midst of the whole, he found time to cultivate his social relations; and every day added a new friend to the catalogue of those, who loved him for his simplicity and frankness, not less than they admired him for his genius, vivacity, and diligence. Thus, to use an idiomatic expression, he was a growing man, and might have remained with us and done well. But the hand of destiny was upon him. He had left the banks of the Patapo, to be a public teacher: the same object had drawn him from Philadelphia to Cincinnati; and that object, at length, restored him to the great emporium of the medical sciences. Contrary to the wishes and importunities of his western friends, in the autumn of 1822, with his young family, he set off for the theatre of his future glory; which he reached in safety, though not without some of the many difficulties, at that time connected with a journey across the state of Ohio; of which, in a letter from Wheeling to one of his friends in this city, he gave a familiar account, in all respects so characteristic, that we hope to be excused for extracting it:

"We arrived last night, after a journey which exceeded in miseries any twenty journeys I ever made in my life. Thank God, the whole has been productive of nothing worse, than some hoarseness to my wife, and a galloping consumption of my bank notes. We were thirteen days on the way, twelve of which gave us as heavy rains as ever poor mortals could venture to travel in; and this produced such a delightfully soft state of the roads, that but for the rocks, (which fortunately were not twenty feet below the surface,) we might have been extracted some thousand years hence, in a high state of preservation, to decorate Best's museum, having one of Dorsville's mummy labels around our necks.

"If I was one of the 'tristful travellers,' I might draw much 'matter of melancholy' from these 'misadventures,' as my friend Sancho Panza calls them. But as the blessed sun of heaven has driven forth once more in his beamy chariot, and the clouds are scattered from their long hold seats, those which have loomed on my mind, have also fled; and with 'a light heart,' I am once more preparing to encounter all the good or ill that God may send."

Of Dr. Godman's life and labours from this time forward, we shall say but little, as they are known to all the reading people of the United States, both in and out of the profession; and as our chief object is to present the difficulties and triumphs of his earlier years, for the benefit of our younger readers.

In Philadelphia he immediately began to lecture on anatomy and physiology, his first and greatest objects; and succeeded so well, that, in 1826, he was called to Rutgers' College, in the city of New York, as an associate of Mott and Hosack.

In 1824 he was made one of the editors, (a working editor,) of the Philadelphia Journal of the Medical Sciences: and continued a liberal contributor to that respectable periodical, to the last weeks of his life.

At different times he published a number of interesting and eloquent introductory lectures.

He was the writer of several elaborate analytical and critical reviews, in the American Quarterly.

At the present time, actual discoveries in anatomy are no more to be expected, yet Dr. G., with admirable skill, revealed many new connections and relations of certain parts, and described them in a volume which he entitled Anatomical Investigations.

He translated and published from the Latin, French, and German languages, a variety of papers and distinct treatises; several of them on subjects not professional, as for example, Lavasseur's Narrative of La Fayette's Visit to the United States.

He wrote critical and emendatory notes on several important English and continental works, which the booksellers of this country were about to publish.

The article of Natural History, in the Encyclopedia Americana, was exclusively confided to him, and his labours upon it ended only with his life.

He studied the Zoology of N. America, both existing and fossil, and favoured us with an interesting and extended history of all its own quadrupeds, embracing a great variety of new observations.

Such were the labours of the deceased, during the seven years that he resided in Philadelphia and New York. For the whole of that period, his life was one of unmitigated toil. As far back as November, 1823, he writes to his friend Dr. Best,

"Whatever you may think of my long continued silence, it has been unavoidably produced by the incessant and laborious employments which have occupied the whole of my time."

In 1824, he writes to another friend—

"My time has been very much occupied in the various duties which devolve on me here, and I am obliged to neglect my friends, in appearance, because it is out of my power to bestow the necessary attention to correspondence."

Again, in 1825, he says to the same—

"It is needless to tell you, that I am excessively occupied, and shall be more so as the winter approaches."

In the next year we find him still in the same condition—

"If you expect news at my hands," says he to Dr. Best, "you expect in vain. My life is one monotonous round of incessant toil after bread and fame, that 'certain portion of uncertain paper.' Of my success in the bread making way, I can, thank God, speak more satisfactorily, than when we last met, though still nothing to boast of."

Again in the same year he writes—

"You recollect how much and how hard I had to work, when you were here—that was nothing to what I have to do now, as vigilance and labour are incessantly demanded, not only to gain more 'reputation,' but to retain that which I have already with vast toil acquired."

In the following year, after he had removed to New York, and was there a candidate for professional business, he writes to the same friend—

"The prospects of our college are fair enough at present, but what will be the event, cannot be told until the time of trial arrives. For my own part, I am not a little sick of the life such a business occasions, and think you far better off, in a situation, where you can acquire a subsistence and respect, without the incessant worry and vexation attendant on a life of professional ambition. For my own part, I shall lay myself as much out for the profession as I can, though I fear, not the best subject for improvement in that way. My situation is such, that I am obliged to rely, in a very great degree, on my pen, and that, you will say, produces habits very little compatible with the introduction of one's self into practice, where there are so many professed bowers, scrapers, and flatterers."

In the ensuing winter he was seized with the disease of the lungs, of which he finally died, and was compelled to suspend his lectures. In the following January, 1829, he speaks to the same gentleman, of his situation and labours, in these affecting words—

"My excessive exertion, and the exposure to a dreadful climate destroyed me. My lungs became diseased, and last winter, I was threatened with so rapid a decline as to force me to escape from the climate of New York, by going to the West India. The months of February, March, and April, my wife and I spent in the Danish Island of Santa Cruz, where I very nearly perished from my disease, though I certainly should have done so in New York. On my return to Philadelphia, in May, I took a house in Germantown, within seven miles from the city, where I have since resided. During the warm weather I was able to creep about, but since the first of the fall have been confined to a single room. My health during all this time has been in a very wretched state, and my consumption very obvious indeed, for I wasted to bones and lost all my strength. Until the last three weeks past, I was exceedingly low, unable to sit up, eat, or perform any function advantageously. Since the time mentioned I have greatly recovered in all respects. My cough is by no means troublesome, and I eat and sleep well. What is best of all is that I have never had hectic since leaving New York, where I was not properly prescribed for. Notwithstanding all these drawbacks, I have had my family to support, and have done so merely by my pen. This you may suppose severe enough for one in my condition, nevertheless necessity is a ruthless master. At present, that I am comparatively well, my literary occupations form my chief pleasure, and all the regret I experience is, that my strength is so inadequate to my wishes. Should my health remain as it is now I shall do very well, and I cannot but hope, since we have recently passed through a tremendous spell of cold weather, without my receiving any injury. All my prospects as a public teacher of anatomy are utterly destroyed, as I can never hope, nor would I venture if I could, again to resume my labours. My success promised to be very great, but it has pleased God that I should move in a different direction."

In the following year, continuing to write for the support of his family till the last month of his existence, he was taken from them, and in him they lost their all. Twelve years of unflinching industry, that had carried his name into all the countries where science is cultivated, had not enabled him to accumulate property; and ended by consigning him to the grave, ere he reached the noon-day of life, or had put forth, to their full extent, the vast intellectual powers, with which he was endowed. In all this, there is much more to grieve than astonish us. As a physician and surgeon, Dr. Godman's business was never considerable. At the very beginning of his professional career, his mind took a different direction. No human heart was ever imbued with a deeper thirst for knowledge, or warmed with a nobler love of glory. He made the former subservient to the latter; but the objects of his ambition were teaching and writing, not the practice of his profession. Perhaps, indeed, he adapted the aims of his ambition to his taste. He relished reading, writing, and lecturing, more than the practice of medicine; and sought to derive from them, that enjoyment, which, in this country, they seldom afford, and which can much more certainly be drawn from a close attention to the practical duties of the profession. Had he possessed a patrimony, this course would have been unexceptionable; without such a reliance, no young physician should neglect the means of acquiring professional business, at the outset of his career.

Dr. Godman was, without doubt, a man of genius; but he was not, perhaps, so much the expositor, as the historian of nature. Observing, imaginative, fluent, and graphical, he abounded less in deep and original analysis than vivid and accurate delineations. Thus his mind, like that of Lucretius, Darwin, and Good, was poetical and philosophical; and he left behind him several fugitive pieces, written chiefly in his last illness, which prove that he might have shone as the poet of nature, not less than her historian, had circumstances awakened his powers.

He possessed uncommon abilities for dissection, and was accustomed, in the presence of his class, to disentangle the structures intended for exhibition; thus showing their connections and dependences, while he described them with that clearness, animation, and eloquence, which only can render the study of anatomy attractive.

In every situation, and on every subject, his attention was active and acute, his perceptions rapid, his memory exceedingly retentive, and his ratiocination profound and analytical.

For languages, he had both taste and talents; and, succeeded in acquiring a practical knowledge of a greater number, perhaps, than any American physician who had preceded him.

The qualities of his heart harmonised with those of his head. They did honour to the profession, and inspired confidence wherever he went. To pure moral habits, and incorruptible honesty, he added that unsuspecting frankness, and all those fine and glowing sensibilities, which at once excite our respect, and win our affection.

But it is not our design to attempt an extended delineation of his character, and we shall close an article already prolonged far beyond our original intention, with his own statement of his opinions and hopes, in regard to that world of which he is now a "bright inhabitant."

In his last letter to Dr. Best, who followed him in a few months, he writes:—

"It gives me great happiness to learn that you have been taught, as well as myself, to fly to the Rock of Ages for shelter against the afflictions of this life, and for hopes of eternal salvation. But for the hopes afforded me, by a humble reliance on the all-sufficient atonement of our blessed Redeemer, I should have been the most wretched of men. But I trust, that the afflictions I have endured have been sanctified to my awakening, and to the regeneration of my heart and life. May we, my dear friend, persist to cling to the only sure support against all that is evil in life, and all that is fearful in death."

Thus fell from the firmament of the American profession, before he had reached his meridian splendour, one of the brightest stars which have yet risen above its horizon; but he was one only, and, we may hope, that his own example will contribute to place some other in the constellation.

RAMBLES OF A NATURALIST.

The following interesting sketches appeared first in "The Friend," a weekly periodical of this city. As few of our subscribers have an opportunity of seeing that work, we think the Rambles will furnish a pleasing diversity in the columns of the "Library," and supply to our young readers especially, some interesting instruction, while they afford useful suggestions for a farther prosecution of the healthful and delightful study. Few, we believe, will finish their perusal without regretting that death frustrated the original intention of the amiable and gifted author, to extend the series sufficiently to form a volume. Dr. Godman died on the 17th of April, 1830, deeply regretted by a large circle of acquaintances, who will long hold him in affectionate remembrance.

It is very gratifying to have an opportunity of redeeming "gems so rich and rare," from comparative obscurity, and giving them at once an extensive circulation, and a merited and abiding celebrity.

NO. I.

From early youth devoted to the study of nature, it has always been my habit to embrace every opportunity of increasing my knowledge and pleasures by actual observation, and have ever found ample means of gratifying this disposition, wherever my place has been allotted by Providence. When an inhabitant of the country, it was sufficient to go a few steps from the door to be in the midst of numerous interesting objects; when a resident of the crowded city, a healthful walk of half an hour placed me where my favourite enjoyment was offered in abundance; and now, when no longer able to seek in fields and woods and running streams for that knowledge which cannot readily be elsewhere obtained, the recollection of my former rambles is productive of a satisfaction, which past pleasures but seldom bestow. Perhaps a statement of the manner in which my studies were pursued, may prove interesting to those who love the works of nature, and may not be aware how great a field for original observation is within their reach, or how vast a variety of instructive objects are easily accessible, even to the occupants of a bustling metropolis. To me it will be a source of great delight to spread these resources before the reader, and enable him so cheaply to participate in the pleasures I have enjoyed, as well as place him in the way of enlarging the general stock of knowledge by communicating the results of his original observations.

One of my favourite walks was through Turner's lane, near Philadelphia, which is about a quarter of a mile long, and not much wider than an ordinary street, being closely fenced in on both sides; yet my reader may feel surprised when informed that I found ample employment for all my leisure, during six weeks, within and about its precincts. On entering the lane from the Ridge road, I observed a gentle elevation of the turf beneath the lower rails of the fence, which appeared to be uninterruptedly continuous; and when I had cut through the verdant roof with my knife, it proved to be a regularly arched gallery or subterranean road, along which the inhabitants could securely travel at all hours without fear of discovery. The sides and bottom of this arched way were smooth and clean, as if much used; and the raised superior portion had long been firmly consolidated by the grass roots, intermixed with tenacious clay. At irregular and frequently distant intervals, a side path diverged into the neighbouring fields, and by its superficial situation, irregularity, and frequent openings, showed that its purpose was temporary, or had been only opened for the sake of procuring food. Occasionally I found a little gallery diverging from the main route beneath the fence, towards the road, and finally opening on the grass, as if the inmate had come out in the morning to breathe the early air, or to drink of the crystal dew which daily gemmed the close cropped verdure. How I longed to detect the animal which tenanted these galleries, in the performance of his labours! Farther on, upon the top of a high bank, which prevented the pathway from continuing near the fence, appeared another evidence of the industry of my yet unknown miner. Half a dozen hillocks of loose, almost pulverised earth were thrown up, at irregular distances, communicating with the main gallery by side passages. Opening one of these carefully, it appeared to differ little from the common gallery in size, but it was very difficult to ascertain where the loose earth came from, nor have I ever been able to tell, since I never witnessed the formation of these hillocks, and conjectures are forbidden, where nothing but observation is requisite to the decision. My farther progress was now interrupted by a delightful brook which sparkled across the road over a clear sandy bed; and here my little galleries turned into the field, coursing along at a moderate distance from the stream. I crept through the fence into the meadow on the west side, intending to discover, if possible, the animal whose works had first fixed my attention, but as I approached the bank of the rivulet something suddenly retreated towards the grass, seeming to vanish almost unaccountably from sight. Very carefully examining the point at which it disappeared, I found the entrance of another gallery or burrow, but of very different construction from that first observed. This new one was formed in the grass, near and among whose roots and lower stems a small but regular covered way was practised. Endless, however, would have been the attempt to follow this, as it opened in various directions, and ran irregularly into the field, and towards the brook, by a great variety of passages. It evidently belonged to an animal totally different from the owner of the subterranean passage, as I subsequently discovered, and may hereafter relate. Tired of my unavailing pursuit, I now returned to the little brook, and seating myself on a stone, remained for some time unconsciously gazing on the fluid which gushed along in unsullied brightness over its pebbly bed. Opposite to my seat, was an irregular hole in the bed of the stream, into which, in an idle mood, I pushed a small pebble with the end of my stick. What was my surprise, in a few seconds afterwards, to observe the water in this hole in motion, and the pebble I had pushed into it gently approaching the surface. Such was the fact; the hole was the dwelling of a stout little crayfish or fresh water lobster, who did not choose to be incommoded by the pebble, though doubtless he attributed its sudden arrival to the usual accidents of the stream, and not to my thoughtless movements. He had thrust his broad lobster-like claws under the stone, and then drawn them near to his mouth; thus making a kind of shelf; and as he reached the edge of the hole, he suddenly extended his claws, and rejected the incumbrance from the lower side, or down stream. Delighted to have found a living object with whose habits I was unacquainted, I should have repeated my experiment, but the crayfish presently returned with what might be called an armful of rubbish, and threw it over the side of his cell, and down the stream as before. Having watched him for some time while thus engaged, my attention was caught by the considerable number of similar holes along the margin and in the bed of the stream. One of these I explored with a small rod, and found it to be eight or ten inches deep, and widened below into a considerable chamber, in which the little lobster found a comfortable abode. Like all of his tribe, the crayfish makes considerable opposition to being removed from his dwelling, and bit smartly at the stick with his claws: as my present object was only to gain acquaintance with his dwelling, he was speedily permitted to return to it in peace.

Under the end of a stone lying in the bed of the stream, something was floating in the pure current, which at first seemed like the tail of a fish, and being desirous to obtain a better view, I gently raised the stone on its edge, and was rewarded by a very beautiful sight. The object first observed was the tail of a beautiful salamander, whose sides were of a pale straw colour, flecked with circlets of the richest crimson. Its long lizard like body seemed to be semitransparent, and its slender limbs appeared like mere productions of the skin. Not far distant, and near where the upper end of the stone had been, lay crouched, as if asleep, one of the most beautifully coloured frogs I had ever beheld. Its body was slender compared with most frogs, and its skin covered with stripes of bright reddish brown and grayish green, in such a manner as to recall the beautiful markings of the tiger's hide; and since the time alluded to, it has received the name of Tigrina from Leconte, its first scientific describer. How long I should have been content to gaze at these beautiful animals, as they lay basking in the living water, I know not, had not the intense heat made me feel the necessity of seeking a shade. It was now past 12 o'clock, I began to retrace my steps towards the city; and without any particular object moved along by the little galleries examined in the morning. I had advanced but a short distance, when I found the last place where I had broken open the gallery was repaired. The earth was perfectly fresh, and I had lost the chance of discovering the miner, while watching my new acquaintances in the stream. Hurrying onward, the same circumstance uniformly presented; the injuries were all efficiently repaired, and had evidently been very recently completed. Here was one point gained; it was ascertained that these galleries were still inhabited, and I hoped soon to become acquainted with the inmates. But at this time, it appeared fruitless to delay longer, and I returned home, filled with anticipations of pleasure from the success of my future researches. These I shall relate on another occasion, if such narrations as the present be thought of sufficient interest to justify their presentation to the reader.

NO. II.

On the day following my first related excursion, I started early in the morning, and was rewarded by one sight, which could not otherwise have been obtained, well worth the sacrifice of an hour or two of sleep. There may be persons who will smile contemptuously at the idea of a man's being delighted with such trifles; nevertheless, we are not inclined to envy such as disesteem the pure gratification afforded by these simple and easily accessible pleasures. As I crossed an open lot on my way to the lane, a succession of gossamer spider webs, lightly suspended from various weeds and small shrubs, attracted my attention. The dew which had formed during the night was condensed upon this delicate lace, in globules of most resplendent brilliance, whose clear lustre pleased while it dazzled the sight. In comparison with the immaculate purity of these dew-drops, which reflected and refracted the morning light in beautiful rays as the gossamer webs trembled in the breeze, how poor would appear the most invaluable diamonds that were ever obtained from Golconda or Brazil! How rich would any monarch be that could boast the possession of one such, as here glittered in thousands on every herb and spray! They are exhaled in an hour or two and lost, yet they are almost daily offered to the delighted contemplation of the real lover of nature, who is ever happy to witness the beneficence of the great Creator, not less displayed in trivial circumstances, than the most wonderful of his works.

No particular change was discoverable in the works of my little miners, except that all the places which had been a second time broken down were again repaired, showing that the animal had passed between the times of my visit; and it may not be uninteresting to observe how the repair was effected. It appeared, when the animal arrived at the spot broken open or exposed to the air, that it changed its direction sufficiently downwards to raise enough of earth from the lower surface to fill up the opening; this of course slightly altered the direction of the gallery at this point, and though the earth thrown up was quite pulverulent, it was so nicely arched as to retain its place, and soon became consolidated. Having broken open a gallery where the turf was very close, and the soil tenacious, I was pleased to find the direction of the chamber somewhat changed; on digging farther with my clasp knife, I found a very beautiful cell excavated in very tough clay, deeper than the common level of the gallery and towards one side. This little lodging-room would probably have held a small melon, and was nicely arched all round. It was perfectly clear, and quite smooth, as if much used; to examine it fully, I was obliged to open it completely. (The next day, it was replaced by another, made a little farther to one side, exactly of the same kind; it was replaced a second time, but when broken up a third time, it was left in ruins.) As twelve o'clock approached, my solicitude to discover the little miner increased to a considerable degree; previous observation led me to believe that about that time his presence was to be expected. I had trodden down the gallery for some inches in a convenient place, and stood close by, in vigilant expectation. My wishes were speedily gratified; in a short time the flattened gallery began at one end to be raised to its former convexity, and the animal rapidly advanced. With a beating heart, I thrust the knife blade down by the side of the rising earth, and quickly turned it over to one side, throwing my prize fairly into the sun-shine. For an instant, he seemed motionless from surprise, when I caught and imprisoned him in my hat. It would be vain for me to attempt a description of my pleasure in having thus succeeded, small as was my conquest. I was delighted with the beauty of my captive's fur; with the admirable adaptation of his diggers or broad rose-tinted hands; the wonderful strength of his forelimbs, and the peculiar suitability of his head and neck to the kind of life the Author of nature had designed him for. It was the shrew-mole, or scalops canadensis, whose history and peculiarities of structure are minutely related in the 1st volume of Godman's American Natural History. All my researches never enabled me to discover a nest, female or young one of this species. All I ever caught were males, though this most probably was a mere accident. The breeding of the scalops is nearly all that is wanting to render our knowledge of it complete.

This little animal has eyes, though they are not discoverable during its living condition, nor are they of any use to it above ground. In running round a room, (until it had perfectly learned where all the obstacles stood,) it would uniformly strike hard against them with its snout, and then turn. It appeared to me as singular that a creature which fed upon living earth worms with all the greediness of a pig, would not destroy the larvæ or maggots of the flesh fly. A shrew-mole lived for many weeks in my study, and made use of a gun case, into which he squeezed himself, as a burrow. Frequently he would carry the meat he was fed with into his retreat; and as it was warm weather, the flies deposited their eggs in the same place. An offensive odour led me to discover this circumstance, and I found a number of large larvæ over which the shrew-mole passed without paying them any attention: nor would he, when hungry, accept of such food, though nothing could exceed the eager haste with which he seized and munched earth worms. Often when engaged in observing him thus employed, have I thought of the stories told me, when a boy, of the manner in which snakes were destroyed by swine; his voracity readily exciting a recollection of one of these animals, and the poor worms writhing and twining about his jaws answering for the snakes. It would be tedious were I to relate all my rambles undertaken with a view to gain a proper acquaintance with this creature, at all hours of the day, and late in the evening, before daylight, &c. &c.

Among other objects which served as an unfailing source of amusement, when resting from the fatigue of my walks, was the little inhabitant of the brook, called the gyrinus natator. These merry swimmers occupied every little sunny pool in the stream, apparently altogether engaged in sport. A circumstance connected with these insects, gives them additional interest to a close observer; they are allied by their structure and nature to those nauseous vermin, the cimices (or bed-bugs.) All of which, whether found infesting fruits or our dormitories, are distinguished by their disgusting odour. But their distant relatives, called by the boys the water-wickets and apple smellers, the gyrinus natator above alluded to, has a delightful smell, exactly similar to that of the richest, mellowest apple. This peculiarly pleasant smell frequently causes the idler many unavailing efforts to secure some of these creatures, whose activity in water renders their pursuit very difficult, though by no means so much so as that of some of the long legged water spiders which walk the waters dry shod, and evade the grasp with surprising ease and celerity. What purposes either of these racers serve in the great economy of nature, has not yet been ascertained, and will scarcely be determined until our store of facts is far more extensive than at present. Other and still more remarkable inhabitants of the brook, at the same time, came within my notice, and afforded much gratification in the observation of their habits.

NO. III.

In moving along the borders of the stream, we may observe, where the sand or mud is fine and settled, a sort of mark or cutting, as if an edged instrument had been drawn along, so as to leave behind it a track or groove. At one end of this line, by digging a little into the mud with the hand, you will generally discover a shell of considerable size, which is tenanted by a molluscous animal of singular construction. On some occasions, when the mud is washed off from the shell, you will be delighted to observe the beautifully regular dark lines with which its greenish smooth surface is marked. Other species are found in the same situations, which, externally, are rough and inelegant, but within are ornamented to a most admirable degree, presenting a smooth surface of the richest pink, crimson, or purple, to which we have nothing of equal elegance to compare it. If the mere shells of these creatures be thus splendid, what shall we say of their internal structure, which, when examined by the microscope, offers a succession of wonders? The beautiful apparatus for respiration, formed of a network regularly arranged, of the most exquisitely delicate texture; the foot, or organ by which the shell is moved forward through the mud or water, composed of an expanded spongy extremity, capable of assuming various figures to suit particular purposes, and governed by several strong muscles that move it in different directions; the ovaries, filled with myriads, not of eggs, but of perfect shells, or complete little animals, which, though not larger than the point of a fine needle, yet when examined by the microscope, exhibit all the peculiarities of conformation that belong to the parent; the mouth, embraced by the nervous ganglion, which may be considered as the animal's brain; the stomach, surrounded by the various processes of the liver, and the strongly acting, but transparent heart, all excite admiration and gratify our curiosity. The puzzling question often presents itself to the enquirer, why so much elaborateness of construction, and such exquisite ornament as are common to most of these creatures, should be bestowed? Destined to pass their lives in and under the mud, possessed of no sense that we are acquainted with, except that of touch, what purpose can ornament serve in them? However much of vanity there may be in asking the question, there is no answer to be offered. We cannot suppose that the individuals have any power of admiring each other, and we know that the foot is the only part they protrude from their shell, and that the inside of the shell is covered by the membrane called the mantle. Similar remarks may be made relative to conchology at large: the most exquisitely beautiful forms, colours and ornaments are lavished upon genera and species which exist only at immense depths in the ocean; or buried in the mud; nor can any one form a satisfactory idea of the object the great Author of nature had in view, in thus profusely beautifying creatures occupying so low a place in the scale of creation.

European naturalists have hitherto fallen into the strangest absurdities concerning the motion of the bivalved shells, which five minutes' observation of nature would have served them to correct. Thus they describe the upper part of the shell as the lower, and the kind part as the front, and speak of them as moving along on their rounded convex surface, like a boat on its keel; instead of advancing with the edges or open part of the shell towards the earth. All these mistakes have been corrected, and the true mode of progression indicated from actual observation, by our fellow citizen, Isaac Lea, whose recently published communications to the American Philosophical Society, reflect the highest credit upon their author, who is a naturalist in the best sense of the term.

As I wandered slowly along the borders of the run, towards a little wood, my attention was caught by a considerable collection of shells lying near an old stump. Many of these appeared to have been recently emptied of their contents, and others seemed to have long remained exposed to the weather. On most of them, at the thinnest part of the edge, a peculiar kind of fracture was obvious, and this seemed to be the work of an animal. A closer examination of the locality showed the foot-steps of a quadruped which I readily believed to be the muskrat, especially as upon examining the adjacent banks numerous traces of burrows were discoverable. It is not a little singular that this animal, unlike all others of the larger gnawers, as the beaver, &c. appears to increase instead of diminishing with the increase of population. Whether it is that the dams and other works thrown up by men, afford more favourable situations for their multiplication, or their favourite food is found in greater abundance, they certainly are quite as numerous now, if not more so, than when the country was first discovered, and are to be found at this time almost within the limits of the city. By the construction of their teeth, as well as all the parts of the body, they are closely allied to the rat kind; though in size and some peculiarities of habit, they more closely approximate the beaver. They resemble the rat especially, in not being exclusively herbivorous, as is shown by their feeding on the uniones or muscles above mentioned. To obtain this food, requires no small exertion of their strength; and they accomplish it by introducing the claws of their fore-paws between the two edges of the shell, and tearing it open by main force. Whoever has tried to force open one of these shells, containing a living animal, may form an idea of the effort made by the muskrat:—the strength of a strong man would be requisite to produce the same result in the same way.

The burrows of muskrats are very extensive, and consequently injurious to dykes and dams, meadow banks, &c. The entrance is always under water, and thence sloping upwards above the level of the water, so that the muskrat has to dive in going in and out. These creatures are excellent divers and swimmers, and being nocturnal are rarely seen unless by those who watch for them at night. Sometimes we alarm one near the mouth of the den, and he darts away across the water, near the bottom, marking his course by a turbid streak in the stream: occasionally we are made aware of the passage of one to some distance down the current in the same way; but in both cases the action is so rapidly performed, that we should scarcely imagine what was the cause, if not previously informed. Except by burrowing into and spoiling the banks, they are not productive of much evil, their food consisting principally of the roots of aquatic plants, in addition to the shellfish. The musky odour, which gives rise to their common name, is caused by glandular organs placed near the tail, filled with a viscid and powerfully musky fluid, whose uses we know but little of, though it is thought to be intended as a guide by which these creatures may discover each other. This inference is strengthened by finding some such contrivance in different races of animals, in various modifications. A great number carry it in pouches similar to those just mentioned. Some, as the musk animal, have the pouch under the belly; the shrew has the glands on the side; the camel on the back of the neck; the crocodile under the throat, &c. At least no other use has ever been assigned for this apparatus; and in all creatures possessing it, the arrangement seems to be adapted peculiarly to the habits of the animals. The crocodile, for instance, generally approaches the shore in such a manner, as to apply the neck and throat to the soil, while the hinder part of the body is under water. The glands under the throat leave the traces of his presence, therefore, with ease, as they come in contact with the shore. The glandular apparatus on the back of the neck of the male camel, seems to have reference to the general elevation of the olfactory organs of the female; and the dorsal gland of the peccary, no doubt has some similar relation to the peculiarities of the race.

The value of the fur of the muskrat causes many of them to be destroyed, which is easily enough effected by means of a trap. This is a simple box, formed of rough boards nailed together, about three feet long, having an iron door, made of pointed bars, opening inwards, at both ends of the box. This trap is placed with the end opposite to the entrance of a burrow observed during the day time. In the night when the muskrat sallies forth, he enters the box, instead of passing into the open air, and is drowned, as the box is quite filled with water. If the traps be visited and emptied during the night, two may be caught in each trap, as muskrats from other burrows may come to visit those where the traps are placed, and thus one be taken going in as well as on coming out. These animals are frequently very fat, and their flesh has a very wholesome appearance, and would probably prove good food. The musky odour, however, prejudices strongly against its use; and it is probable that the flesh is rank, as the muscles it feeds on are nauseous and bitter, and the roots which supply the rest of its food are generally unpleasant and acrid. Still we should not hesitate to partake of its flesh in case of necessity, especially if of a young animal, from which the musk bag had been removed immediately after it was killed.

In this vicinity, the muskrat does not build himself a house for the winter, as our fields and dykes are too often visited. But in other parts of the country where extensive marshes exist, and muskrats are abundant, they build very snug and substantial houses, quite as serviceable and ingenious as those of the beaver. They do not dam the water as the beaver, nor cut branches of trees to serve for the walls of their dwellings. They make it of mud and rushes, raising a cone two or three feet high, having the entrance on the south side under water. About the year 1804, I saw several of them in Worrell's marsh, near Chestertown, Maryland, which were pointed out to me by an old black man who made his living principally by trapping these animals, for the sake of their skins. A few years since I visited the marshes, near the mouth of Magerthy river in Maryland, where I was informed by a resident, that the muskrats still built regularly every winter. Perhaps these quadrupeds are as numerous in the vicinity of Philadelphia as elsewhere, as I have never examined a stream of fresh water, dyked meadow, or milldam, herabout, without seeing traces of vast numbers. Along all the water courses and meadows in Jersey, opposite Philadelphia, and in the meadows of the neck, below the navy yard, there must be large numbers of muskrats. Considering the value of the fur, and the ease and trifling expense at which they might be caught, we have often felt surprised that more of them are not taken, especially as we have so many poor men complaining of wanting something to do. By thinning the number of muskrats, a positive benefit would be conferred on the farmers and furriers, to say nothing of the profits to the individual.

NO. IV.

My next visit to my old hunting ground, the lane and brook, happened on a day in the first hay harvest, when the verdant sward of the meadows was rapidly sinking before the keen edged scythes swung by vigorous mowers. This unexpected circumstance afforded me considerable pleasure, for it promised me a freer scope to my wanderings, and might also enable me to ascertain various particulars, concerning which my curiosity had long been awakened. Nor was this promise unattended by fruition of my wishes. The reader may recollect, that, in my first walk, a neat burrow in the grass, above ground, was observed, without my knowing its author. The advance of the mowers explained this satisfactorily, for in cutting the long grass, they exposed several nests of field mice, which, by means of these grass-covered alleys, passed to the stream in search of food or drink, unseen by their enemies, the hawks and owls. The numbers of these little creatures were truly surprising; their fecundity is so great, and their food so abundant, that were they not preyed upon by many other animals, and destroyed in great numbers by man, they would become exceedingly troublesome. There are various species of them, all bearing a very considerable resemblance to each other, and having to an incidental observer much of the appearance of the domestic mouse. Slight attention, however, is requisite to perceive very striking differences, and the discrimination of these will prove a source of considerable gratification to the enquirer. The nests are very nicely made, and look much like a bird's nest, being lined with soft materials, and usually placed in some snug little hollow, or at the root of a strong tuft of grass. Upon the grass roots and seeds these nibblers principally feed; and where very abundant, the effects of their hunger may be seen in the brown and withered aspect of the grass they have injured at the root. But under ordinary circumstances, the hawks, owls, domestic cat, weasels, crows, &c. keep them in such limits, as prevent them from doing essential damage.

I had just observed another and a smaller grassy covered way, where the mowers had passed along, when my attention was called towards a wagon at a short distance, which was receiving its load. Shouts and laughter, accompanied by a general running and scrambling of the people, indicated that some rare sport was going forward. When I approached, I found that the object of chase was a jumping mouse, whose actions it was truly delightful to witness. When not closely pressed by its pursuers, it ran with some rapidity in the usual manner, as if seeking concealment. But in a moment it would vault into the air, and skim along for ten or twelve feet, looking more like a bird than a little quadruped. After continuing this for some time, and nearly exhausted its pursuers with running and falling over each other, the frightened creature was accidentally struck down by one of the workmen, during one of its beautiful leaps, and killed. As the hunters saw nothing worthy of attention in the dead body of the animal, they very willingly resigned it to me; and with great satisfaction I retreated to a willow shade, to read what nature had written in its form for my instruction. The general appearance was mouse-like; but the length and slenderness of the body, the shortness of its fore limbs, and the disproportionate length of its hind limbs, together with the peculiarity of its tail, all indicated its adaptation to the peculiar kind of action I had just witnessed. A sight of this little creature vaulting or bounding through the air, strongly reminded me of what I had read of the great kangaroo of New Holland; and I could not help regarding our little jumper as in some respects a sort of miniature resemblance of that curious animal. It was not evident, however, that the jumping mouse derived the aid from its tail, which so powerfully assists the kangaroo. Though long and sufficiently stout in proportion, it had none of the robust muscularity which, in the New Holland animal, impels the lower part of the body immediately upward. In this mouse, the leap is principally, if not entirely effected by a sudden and violent extension of the long hind limbs, the muscles of which are strong, and admirably suited to their object. We have heard that these little animals feed on the roots, &c. of the green herbage, and that they are every season to be found in the meadows. It may perhaps puzzle some to imagine how they subsist through the severities of winter, when vegetation is at rest, and the earth generally frozen. Here we find another occasion to admire the all-perfect designs of the awful Author of nature, who has endowed a great number of animals with the faculty of retiring into the earth, and passing whole months in a state of repose so complete, as to allow all the functions of the body to be suspended, until the returning warmth of the spring calls them forth to renewed activity and enjoyment. The jumping mouse, when the chill weather begins to draw nigh, digs down about six or eight inches into the soil, and there forms a little globular cell, as much larger than his own body as will allow a sufficient covering of fine grass to be introduced. This being obtained, he contrives to coil up his body and limbs in the centre of the soft dry grass, so as to form a complete ball; and so compact is this, that, when taken out, with the torpid animal, it may be rolled across a floor without injury. In this snug cell, which is soon filled up and closed externally, the jumping mouse securely abides through all the frosts and storms of winter, needing neither food nor fuel, being utterly quiescent, and apparently dead, though susceptible at any time of reanimation, by being very gradually stimulated by light and heat.

The little burrow under examination, when called to observe the jumping mouse, proved to be made by the merry musicians of the meadows, the field crickets, acheta campestris. These lively black crickets are very numerous, and contribute very largely to that general song which is so delightful to the ear of the true lover of nature, as it rises on the air from myriads of happy creatures rejoicing amid the bounties conferred on them by Providence. It is not a voice that the crickets utter, but a regular vibration of musical chords, produced by nibbling the nervures of the elytra against a sort of network intended to produce the vibrations. The reader will find an excellent description of the apparatus in Kirby and Spence's book, but he may enjoy a much more satisfactory comprehension of the whole, by visiting the field cricket in his summer residence, see him tuning his viol, and awakening the echoes with his music. By such an examination as may be there obtained, he may derive more knowledge than by frequent perusal of the most eloquent writings, and perhaps observe circumstances which the learned authors are utterly ignorant of.

Among the great variety of burrows formed in the grass, or under the surface of the soil, by various animals and insects, there is one that I have often anxiously and as yet fruitlessly explored. This burrow is formed by the smallest quadruped animal known to man, the minute shrew, which, when full grown, rarely exceeds the weight of thirty-six grains. I had seen specimens of this very interesting creature in the museum, and had been taught, by a more experienced friend, to distinguish its burrow, which I have often perseveringly traced, with the hope of finding the living animal, but in vain. On one occasion, I patiently pursued a burrow nearly round a large barn, opening it all the way. I followed it under the barn floor, which was sufficiently high to allow me to crawl beneath. There I traced it about to a tiresome extent, and was at length rewarded by discovering where it terminated, under a foundation stone, perfectly safe from my attempts. Most probably a whole family of them were then present, and I had my share for my pains. As these little creatures are nocturnal, and are rarely seen from the nature of the places they frequent, the most probable mode of taking them alive would be, by placing a small mouse trap in their way, baited with a little tainted or slightly spoiled meat. If a common mouse trap be used, it is necessary to work it over with additional wire, as this shrew could pass between the bars even of a close mouse trap. They are sometimes killed by cats, and thus obtained, as the cat never eats them, perhaps on account of their rank smell, owing to a peculiar glandular apparatus on each side, that pours out a powerfully odorous greasy substance. The species of the shrew genus are not all so exceedingly diminutive, as some of them are even larger than a common mouse. They have their teeth coloured at the tips in a remarkable manner; it is generally of a pitchy brown, or dark chestnut hue, and, like the colouring of the teeth in the beaver and other animals, is owing to the enamel being thus formed, and not to any mere accident of diet. The shrews are most common about stables and cow-houses; and there, should I ever take the field again, my traps shall be set, as my desire to have one of these little quadrupeds is still as great as ever.

NO. V.

Hitherto my rambles have been confined to the neighbourhood of a single spot, with a view of showing how perfectly accessible to all, are numerous and various interesting natural objects. This habit of observing in the manner indicated, began many years anterior to my visit to the spots heretofore mentioned, and have extended through many parts of our own and another country. Henceforward my observations shall be presented without reference to particular places, or even of one place exclusively, but with a view to illustrate whatever may be the subject of description, by giving all I have observed of it under various circumstances.

A certain time of my life was spent in that part of Anne Arundel county, Md. which is washed by the river Patapsco on the north, the great Chesapeake bay on the west, and the Severn river on the south. It is in every direction cut up by creeks, or arms of the rivers and bay, into long, flat strips of land, called necks, the greater part of which is covered by dense pine forests, or thickets of small shrubs and saplings, rendered impervious to human footsteps by the growth of vines, whose inextricable mazes nothing but a fox, wild cat, or weasel, could thread. The soil cleared for cultivation is very generally poor, light, and sandy, though readily susceptible of improvement, and yielding a considerable produce in Indian corn, and most of the early garden vegetables, by the raising of which for the Baltimore market the inhabitants obtain all their ready money. The blight of slavery has long extended its influence over this region, where all its usual effects are but too obviously visible. The white inhabitants are few in number, widely distant from each other, and manifest, in their mismanagement, and half indigent circumstances, how trifling an advantage they derive from the thralldom of their dozen or more of sturdy blacks, of different sexes and ages. The number of marshes formed at the heads of the creeks, render this country frightfully unhealthy in autumn, at which time the life of a resident physician is one of incessant toil and severe privation. Rising from morning till night, to get round to visit a few patients, his road leads generally through pine forests, whose aged and lofty trees, encircled by a dense undergrowth, impart an air of sombre and unbroken solitude. Rarely or never does he encounter a white person on his way, and only once in a while will he see a miserably tattered negro, seated on a sack of corn, carried by a starveling horse or mule, which seems poorly able to bear the weight to the nearest mill. The red-head woodpecker, and the flicker or yellow-hammer, a kindred species, occasionally glance across his path; sometimes when he turns his horse to drink at the dark coloured branch, (as such streams are locally called,) he disturbs a solitary rufous thrush engaged in washing its plumage; or as he moves steadily along, he is slightly startled by a sudden appearance of the towhee bunting close to the side of the path. Except these creatures, and these by no means frequently seen, he rarely meets with animated objects; at a distance the harsh voice of the crow is often heard, or flocks of them are observed in the cleared fields, while now and then the buzzard, or turkey vulture, may be seen wheeling in graceful circles in the higher regions of the air, sustained by his broadly expanded wings, which apparently remain in a state of permanent and motionless extension. At other seasons of the year, the physician must be content to live in the most positive seclusion; the white people are all busily employed in going to and from market; and even were they at home, they are poorly suited for companionship. I here spent month after month, and, except the patients I visited, saw no one but the blacks; the house in which I boarded was kept by a widower, who, with myself, was the only white man within the distance of a mile or two. My only compensation was this, the house was pleasantly situated on the bank of Curtis's creek, a considerable arm of the Patuxent, which extended for a mile or two beyond us, and immediately in front of the door expanded so as to form a beautiful little bay. Of books I possessed very few, and those exclusively professional; but in this beautiful expanse of sparkling water, I had a book opened before me, which a life-time would scarcely suffice me to read through. With the advantage of a small but neatly made and easily manageable skiff, I was always independent of the service of the blacks, which was ever repugnant to my feelings and principles. I could convey myself in whatever direction objects of inquiry might present, and as my little bark was visible for a mile in either direction from the house, a handkerchief waved, or the loud shout of a negro, was sufficient to recall me, in case my services were required.

During the spring months, and while the garden vegetables are yet too young to need a great deal of attention, the proprietors frequently employ their blacks in hauling the seine; and this in these creeks is productive of a very ample supply of yellow perch, which affords a very valuable addition to the diet of all. The blacks in an especial manner profit by this period of plenty, since they are permitted to eat of them without restraint, which cannot be said of any other sort of provision allowed them. Even the pigs and crows obtain their share of the abundance, as the fishermen, after picking out the best fish, throw the smaller ones on the beach. But as the summer months approach, the aquatic grass begins to grow, and this fishing can no longer be continued, because the grass rolls the seine up in a wisp, so that it can contain nothing. At this time the spawning season of the different species of sun-fish begins, and to me this was a time of much gratification. Along the edge of the river, where the depth of water was not greater than from four feet to as shallow as twelve inches, an observer would discover a succession of circular spots cleared of the surrounding grass, and showing a clear sandy bed. These spots, or cleared spaces, we may regard as the nest of this beautiful fish. There, balanced in the transparent wave, at the distance of six or eight inches from the bottom, the sun-fish is suspended in the glittering sunshine, gently swaying its beautiful tail and fins; or, wheeling around in the limits of its little circle, appears to be engaged in keeping it clear of all incumbrances. Here the mother deposits her eggs or spawn, and never did hen guard her callow brood with more eager vigilance, than the sun-fish the little circle within which her promised offspring are deposited. If another individual approach too closely to her borders, with a fierce and angry air she darts against it, and forces it to retreat. Should any small, and not too heavy object be dropped in the nest, it is examined with jealous attention, and displaced if the owner be not satisfied of its harmlessness. At the approach of man she flies with great velocity into deep water, as if willing to conceal that her presence was more than accidental where first seen. She may, after a few minutes, be seen cautiously venturing to return, which is at length done with velocity; then she would take a hurried turn or two around, and send back again to the shady bowers formed by the river grass which grows up from the bottom to within a few feet of the surface, and attains to twelve, fifteen, or more feet in length. Again she ventures forth from the depths; and if no further cause of fear presented, would gently sail into the placid circle of her home, and with obvious satisfaction explore it in every part.

Besides the absolute pleasure I derived from visiting the habitations of these glittering tenants of the river, hanging over them from my little skiff, and watching their every action, they frequently furnished me with a very acceptable addition to my frugal table. Situated as my boarding house was, and all the inmates of the house busily occupied in raising vegetables to be sent to market, our bill of fare offered little other change than could be produced by varying the mode of cookery. It was either broiled bacon and potatoes, or fried bacon and potatoes, or cold bacon and potatoes, and so on at least six days out of seven. But, as soon as I became acquainted with the habits of the sun-fish, I procured a neat circular iron hoop for a net; secured to it a piece of an old seine, and whenever I desired to dine on fresh fish, it was only necessary to take my skiff, and push her gently along from one sun-fish nest to another, myriads of which might be seen along all the shore. The fish, of course, darted off as soon as the boat first drew near, and during this absence the net was placed so as to cover the nest, of the bottom of which the meshes but slightly intercepted the view. Finding all things quiet, and not being disturbed by the net, the fish would resume its central station, the net was suddenly raised, and the captive placed in the boat. In a quarter of an hour, I could generally take as many in this way as would serve two men for dinner, and when an acquaintance accidentally called to see me, during the season of sun-fish, it was always in my power to lessen our dependence on the endless bacon. I could also always select the finest and largest of these fish, as while standing up in the boat, one could see a considerable number at once, and thus choose the best. Such was their abundance, that the next day would find all the nests re-occupied. Another circumstance connected with this matter gave me no small satisfaction; the poor blacks, who could rarely get time for angling, soon learned how to use my net with dexterity; and thus, in the ordinary time allowed them for dinner, would borrow it, run down to the shore, and catch some fish to add to their very moderate allowance.

NO. VI.

After the sun-fish, as regular annual visitants of the small rivers and creeks containing salt or brackish water, came the crabs in vast abundance, though for a very different purpose. These singularly constructed and interesting beings furnished me with another excellent subject for observation; and, during the period of their visitation, my skiff was in daily requisition. Floating along with an almost imperceptible motion, a person looking from the shore might have supposed her entirely adrift; for as I was stretched at full length across the seats, in order to bring my sight as close to the water as possible without inconvenience, no one would have observed my presence from a little distance. The crabs belong to a very extensive tribe of beings, which carry their skeletons on the outside of their bodies, instead of within; and of necessity the fleshy, muscular, or moving power of the body, is placed in a situation the reverse of what occurs in animals of a higher order, which have internal skeletons or solid frames to their systems. This peculiarity of the crustaceous animals and various other beings, is attended with one apparent inconvenience; when they have grown large enough to fill their shell or skeleton completely, they cannot grow farther, because the skeleton being external, is incapable of enlargement. To obviate this difficulty, the Author of nature has endowed them with the power of casting off the entire shell, increasing in size, and forming another equally hard and perfect, for several seasons successively, until the greatest or maximum size is attained, when the change or sloughing ceases to be necessary, though it is not always discontinued on that account. To undergo this change with greater ease and security, the crabs seek retired and peaceful waters, such as the beautiful creek I have been speaking of, whose clear, sandy shores are rarely disturbed by waves causing more than a pleasing murmur, and where the number of enemies must be far less in proportion than in the boisterous waters of the Chesapeake, their great place of concourse. From the first day of their arrival in the latter part of June, until the time of their departure, which in this creek occurred towards the first of August, it was astonishing to witness the vast multitudes which flocked towards the head of the stream.

It is not until they have been for some time in the creek, that the moult or sloughing generally commences. They may be then observed gradually coming closer in shore, to where the sand is fine, fairly exposed to the sun, and a short distance farther out than the lowest water mark, as they must always have at least a depth of three or four inches water upon them.

The individual having selected his place, becomes perfectly quiescent, and no change is observed during some hours but a sort of swelling along the edges of the great upper shell at its back part. After a time this posterior edge of the shell becomes fairly disengaged like the lid of a chest, and now the more difficult work of withdrawing the great claws from their cases, which every one collects to be vastly larger at their extremities and between the joints than the joints themselves. A still greater apparent difficulty presents in the shedding of the sort of tendon which is placed within the muscles. Nevertheless, the Author of nature has adapted them to the accomplishment of all this. The disproportionate sized claws undergo a peculiar softening, which enables the crab, by a very steadily continued, scarcely perceptible effort, to pull them out of their shells, and the business is completed by the separation of the complex parts about the mouth and eyes. The crab now slips out from the slough, settling near it on the sand. It is now covered by a soft, perfectly flexible skin; and though possessing precisely the same form as before, seems incapable of the slightest exertion. Notwithstanding that such is its condition, while you are gazing on this helpless creature, it is sinking in the fine loose sand, and in a short time is covered up sufficiently to escape the observation of careless or inexperienced observers. Neither can one say how this is effected, although it occurs under their immediate observation; the motions employed to produce the displacement of the sand are too slight to be appreciated, though it is most probably owing to a gradual lateral motion of the body by which the sand is displaced in the centre beneath, and thus gradually forced up at the sides until it falls over and covers the crab. Examine him within twelve hours, and you will find the skin becoming about as hard as fine writing paper, producing a similar crackling if compressed; twelve hours later the shell is sufficiently stiffened to require some slight force to bend it, and the crab is said to be in buckram, as in the first stage it was in paper. It is still helpless, and offers no resistance; but at the end of thirty-six hours, it shows that its natural instincts are in action, and by the time forty-eight hours have elapsed, the crab is restored to the exercise of all his functions. I have stated the above as the periods in which the stages of the moult are accomplished, but I have often observed that the rapidity of this process is very much dependent upon the temperature, and especially upon sunshine. A cold, cloudy, raw, and disagreeable spell happening at this period, though by no means common, will retard the operation considerably, protracting the period of helplessness. This is the harvest season of the white fisherman and of the poor slave. The laziest of the former are now in full activity, wading along the shore from morning till night, dragging a small boat after them, and holding in the other hand a forked stick with which they raise the crabs from the sand. The period during which the crabs remain in the paper state is so short, that great activity is required to gather a sufficient number to take to market, but the price at which they are sold is sufficient to awaken all the cupidity of the crabbers. Two dollars a dozen is by no means an uncommon price for them, when the season first comes on; they subsequently come down to a dollar, and even to fifty cents, at any of which rates the trouble of collecting them is well paid. The slaves search for them at night, and then are obliged to kindle a fire of pine-knots on the bow of the boat, which strongly illuminates the surrounding water, and enables them to discover the crabs. Soft crabs are, with great propriety, regarded as an exquisite treat by those who are fond of such eating; and though many persons are unable to use crabs or lobsters in any form, there are few who taste of the soft crabs without being willing to recur to them. As an article of luxury they are scarcely known north of the Chesapeake, though there is nothing to prevent them from being used to considerable extent in Philadelphia, especially since the opening of the Chesapeake and Delaware canal. The summer of 1829 I had the finest soft crabs from Baltimore. They arrived at the market in the afternoon, were fried according to rule, and placed in a tin butter kettle, then covered for an inch or two with melted lard, and put on board the steam boat which left Baltimore at five o'clock the same afternoon. The next morning before ten o'clock they were in Philadelphia, and at one they were served up at dinner in Germantown. The only difficulty in the way is that of having persons to attend to their procuring and transmission, as when cooked directly after they arrive at market, and forwarded with as little delay as above mentioned, there is no danger of their being the least injured.

At other seasons, when the crabs did not come close to the shore, I derived much amusement by taking them in the deep water. This is always easily effected by the aid of proper bait; a leg of chicken, piece of any raw meat, or a salted or spoiled herring, tied to a twine string of sufficient length, and a hand net of convenient size, is all that is necessary. You throw out your line and bait, or you fix as many lines to your boat as you please, and in a short time you see, by the straightening of the line, that the bait has been seized by a crab, who is trying to make off with it. You then place your net where it can conveniently be picked up, and commence steadily but gently to draw in your line, until you have brought the crab sufficiently near the surface to distinguish him; if you draw him nearer, he will see you and immediately let go, otherwise his greediness and voracity will make him cling to his prey to the last. Holding the line in the left hand, you now flip your net edge foremost into the water at some distance from the line, carry it down perpendicularly until it is five or six inches lower than the crab, and then with a sudden turn out bring it directly before him, and lift up at the same time. Your prize is generally secured, if your net be at all properly placed; for as soon as he is alarmed, he pushes directly downwards, and is received in the bag of the net. It is better to have a little water in the bottom of the boat to throw them into, as they are easier emptied out of the net, always letting go when held over the water. This a good crabber never forgets, and should he unluckily be seized by a large crab, he holds him over the water and is freed at once, though he loses his game. When not held over the water, they bite sometimes with dreadful obstinacy, and I have seen it necessary to crush the forceps, or claws before one could be induced to let go the fingers of a boy. A poor black fellow also placed himself in an awkward situation; the crab seized him by a finger of his right hand, but he was unwilling to lose his captive by holding him over the water, instead of which he attempted to secure the other claw with his left hand, while he tried to crush the biting claw between his teeth. In doing this, he somehow relaxed his left hand, and with the other claw, the crab seized poor Jem by his under lip, which was by no means a thin one, and forced him to roar with pain. With some difficulty he was freed from his tormentor, but it was several days before he ceased to excite laughter, as the severe bite was followed by a swelling of the lip, which imparted a most ludicrous expression to a naturally comical countenance.

NO. VII.

On the first arrival of the crabs, when they throng the shoals of the creeks in vast crowds, as heretofore mentioned, a very summary way of taking them is resorted to by the country people, and for a purpose that few would suspect without having witnessed it. They use a three pronged fork or gig made for this sport, attached to a long handle; the crabber standing up in the skiff, pushes it along until he is over a large collection of crabs, and then strikes his spear among them. By this several are transfixed at once and lifted into the boat, and the operation is repeated until enough have been taken. The purpose to which they are to be applied is to feed the hogs, which very soon learn to collect in waiting upon the beach when the crab spearing is going on. Although these bristly gentry appear to devour almost all sorts of food with great relish, it seemed to me that they regarded the crabs as a most luxurious banquet; and it was truly amusing to see the grunTERS, when the crabs were thrown on shore for them, and were scampering off in various directions, seizing them in spite of their threatening claws, holding them down with one foot, and speedily reducing them to a state of helplessness by breaking off their forceps. Such a crunching and cracking of the unfortunate crabs I never have witnessed since; and I might have commiserated them more, had not I known that death in some form or other was continually awaiting them, and that their devourers were all destined to meet their fate in a few months in the sty, and thence through the smoke house to be placed upon our table. On the shores of the Chesapeake I have caught crabs in a way commonly employed by all those who are unprovided with boats and nets. This is to have a forked stick and a baited line, with which the crabber wades out as far as he thinks fit, and then throws out his line. As soon as he finds he has a bite, he draws the line in, cautiously lifting but a very little from the bottom. As soon as it is near enough to be fairly in reach, he quickly, yet with as little movement as possible, secures the crab by placing the forked stick across his body and pressing him against the sand. He must then stoop down and take hold of the crab by the two posterior swimming legs, so as to avoid being seized by the claws. Should he not wish to carry each crab ashore as he catches it, he pinions or spannels (as the fishermen call it) them. This is a very effectual mode of disabling them from using their biting claws, yet it is certainly not the most humane operation; it is done by taking the first of the sharp-pointed feet of each side, and forcing it in for the length of the joint behind the moveable joint or thumb of the opposite biting claw. The crabs are then strung upon a string or wythe, and allowed to hang in the water until the crabber desists from his occupations. In the previous article crabs were spoken of as curious and interesting, and the reader may not consider the particulars thus far given as being particularly so. Perhaps, when he takes them altogether, he will agree that they have as much that is curious about their construction as almost any animal we have mentioned, and in the interesting details we have as yet made but a single step.

The circumstance of the external skeleton has been mentioned, but who would expect an animal, as low in the scale as a crab, to be furnished with ten or twelve pair of jaws to its mouth? Yet such is the fact, and all these variously constructed pieces are provided with appropriate muscles, and move in a manner which can scarcely be explained, though it may be very readily comprehended when once observed in living nature. But, after all the complexity of the jaws, where would an inexperienced person look for their teeth? surely not in the stomach? Nevertheless, such is their situation; and these are not mere appendages, that are called teeth by courtesy, but stout regular grinding teeth, with a light brown surface. They are not only within the stomach, but fixed to a cartilage nearest to its lower extremity, so that the food, unlike that of other creatures, is submitted to the action of the teeth as it is passing from the stomach; instead of being chewed before it is swallowed. In some species the teeth are five in number; but throughout this class of animals the same general principle of construction may be observed. Crabs and their kindred have no brain, because they are not required to reason upon what they observe; they have a nervous system excellently suited to their mode of life, and its knots or ganglia send out nerves to the organs of sense, digestion, motion, &c. The senses of these beings are very acute, especially their sight, hearing and smell. Most of my readers have heard of crabs' eyes, or have seen these organs in the animal on the end of two little projecting knobs, above and on each side of the mouth; few of them, however, have seen the crab's ear, yet it is very easily found, and is a little triangular bump placed near the base of the feelers. This bump has a membrane stretched over it, and communicates with a small cavity, which is the internal ear. The organ of smell is not so easily demonstrated as that of hearing, though the evidence of their possessing the sense to an acute degree is readily attainable. A German naturalist inferred, from the fact of the nerve corresponding to the olfactory nerve in man being distributed to the antennae, in insects, that the antennae were the organs of smell in them. Cuvier and others suggest that a similar arrangement may exist in the crustacea. To satisfy myself whether it was so or not, I lately dissected a small lobster, and was delighted to find that the first pair of nerves actually went to the antennae, and gave positive support to the opinion mentioned. I state this, not to claim credit for ascertaining the truth or inaccuracies of a suggestion, but with a view of inviting the reader to do the same in all cases of doubt. Where it is possible to refer to nature for the actual condition of facts, learned authorities give me no uneasiness. If I find that the structure bears out their opinions, it is more satisfactory; when it convicts them of absurdity, it saves much fruitless reading, as well as the trouble of shaking off prejudices.

The first time my attention was called to the extreme acuteness of sight possessed by these animals, was during a walk along the flats of Long Island, reaching towards Governor's Island in New York. A vast number of the small land crabs, called fiddlers by the boys (gecarcinus), occupy burrows or caves dug in the marshy soil, whence they come out and go for some distance, either in search of food or to sun themselves. Long before I approached close enough to see their forms with distinctness, they were scampering towards their holes, into which they plunged with a tolerable certainty of escape; these retreats being of considerable depth, and often communicating with each other, as well as nearly filled with water. On endeavouring cautiously to approach some others, it was quite amusing to observe their vigilance; to see them slowly change position, and from lying extended in the sun, beginning to gather themselves up for a start should it prove necessary; at length standing up as it were on tiptoe, and raising their pedunculated eyes as high as possible. One quick step on the part of the individual approaching was enough—away they would go, with a celerity which must appear surprising to any one who had not previously witnessed it. What is more remarkable, they possess the power of moving equally well with any part of the body foremost, so that when endeavouring to escape, they will suddenly dart off to one side or the other, without turning round, and thus elude pursuit. My observations upon the crustaceous animals have extended through many years, and in very various situations; and for the sake of making the general view of their qualities more satisfactory, I will go on to state what I remarked of some of the genera and species in the West Indies, where they are exceedingly numerous and various. The greater proportion of the genera feed on animal matter, especially after decomposition has begun; a large number are exclusively confined to the deep waters, and approach the shoals and lands only during the spawning season. Many live in the sea, but daily pass many hours upon the rocky shores for the pleasure of basking in the sun; others live in marshy or moist ground, at a considerable distance from the water, and feed principally on vegetable food, especially the sugar cane, of which they are extremely destructive. Others again reside habitually on the hills or mountains, and visit the sea only once a year for the purpose of depositing their eggs in the sand. All those which reside in burrows made in moist ground, and those coming daily on the rocks to bask in the sun, participate in about an equal degree in the qualities of vigilance and swiftness. Many a breathless race have I run in vain, attempting to intercept them, and prevent their escaping into the sea. Many an hour of cautious and solicitous endeavour to steal upon them unobserved, has been frustrated by their long sighted watchfulness; and several times, when, by extreme care and cunning approaches, I have actually succeeded in getting between a fine specimen and the sea, and had full hope of driving him farther inland, have all my anticipations been ruined by the wonderful swiftness of their flight, or the surprising facility with which they would dart off in the very opposite direction, at the very moment I felt almost sure of my prize. One day, in particular, I saw on a flat rock, which afforded a fine sunning place, the most beautiful crab I had ever beheld. It was of the largest size, and would have covered a large dinner plate, most beautifully coloured with bright crimson below, and a variety of tints of blue, purple, and green above; it was just such a specimen as could not fail to excite all the solicitude of a collector to obtain. But, it was not in the least deficient in the art of self-preservation; my most careful manoeuvres proved ineffectual, and all my efforts only enabled me to see enough of it to augment my regrets to a high degree. Subsequently I saw a similar individual in the collection of a resident; this had been killed against the rocks during a violent hurricane, with very slight injury to its shell. I offered high rewards to the black people if they would bring me such a one, but the most expert among them seemed to think it an unpromising search, as they knew of no way of capturing them. If I had been supplied with some powder of nux vomica with which to poison some meat, I might have succeeded.

NO. VIII.

The fleet running crab (cypoda pugilator), mentioned as living in burrows dug in a moist soil, and preying chiefly on the sugar cane, is justly regarded as one of the most noxious pests that can infect a plantation. Their burrows extend to a great depth, and run in various directions; they are also, like those of our fiddlers, nearly full of muddy water, so that, when these marauders once plump into their dens, they may be considered as entirely beyond pursuit. Their numbers are so great, and they multiply in such numbers, as in some seasons to destroy a large proportion of a sugar crop, and sometimes their ravages, combined with those of the rats and other plunderers, are absolutely ruinous to the sea-side planters. I was shown, by the superintendent of a place thus infested, a great quantity of cane utterly killed by these creatures, which cut it off in a peculiar manner, in order to suck the juice; and he assured me that, during that season, the crop would be two thirds less than its average, solely owing to the inroads of the crabs and rats, which if possible are still more numerous. It was to me an irresistible source of amusement to observe the air of spite and vexation with which he spoke of the crabs; the rats he could shoot, poison, or drive off for a time with dogs. But the crabs would not eat his poison, while sugar cane was growing; the dogs could only chase them into their holes; and if, in helpless irritation, he sometimes fired his gun at a cluster of them, the shot only rattled over their shells like hail against a window. It is truly desirable that some summary mode of lessening their number could be devised, and it is probable that this will be best effected by poison, as it may be possible to obtain a bait sufficiently attractive to ensnare them. Species of this genus are found in various parts of our country, more especially towards the south. About Cape May, our friends may have excellent opportunities of testing the truth of what is said of their swiftness and vigilance.

The land crab, which is common to many of the West India islands, is more generally known as the Jamaica crab, because it has been most frequently described from observation in that island. Wherever found, they have all the habit of living, during great part of the year, in the highlands, where they pass the day time, concealed in huts, cavities, and under stones, and come out at night for their food. They are remarkable for collecting in vast bodies, and marching annually to the sea side, in order to deposit their eggs in the sand; and this accomplished, they return to their former abodes, if undisturbed. They commence their march in the night, and move in the most direct line towards the destined point. So obstinately do they pursue this route, that they will not turn out of it for any obstacle that can possibly be surmounted. During the day time they skulk and lie hid as closely as possible, but thousands upon thousands of them are taken for the use of the table by whites and blacks, as on their seaward march they are very fat and of fine flavour. On the homeward journey, those that have escaped capture are weak, exhausted, and unfit for use. Before dismissing the crabs, I must mention one which was a source of much annoyance to me at first, and of considerable interest afterwards, from the observation of its habits. At that time I resided in a house delightfully situated about two hundred yards from the sea, fronting the setting sun, having in clear weather the lofty mountains of Porto Rico, distant about eighty miles, in view. Like most of the houses in the island, ours had seen better days, as was evident from various breaks in the floors, angles rotted off the doors, sunken sills, and other indications of decay. Our sleeping room, which was on the lower floor, was especially in this condition; but as the weather was delightfully warm, a few cracks and openings, though rather large, did not threaten much inconvenience. Our bed was provided with that indispensable accompaniment, a mosquito bar or curtain, to which we were indebted for escape from various annoyances. Scarcely had we extinguished the light, and composed ourselves to rest, than we heard, in various parts of the room, the most startling noises. It appeared as if numerous hard and heavy bodies were trailed along the floor; then they sounded as if climbing up by the chairs and other furniture, and frequently something like a large stone would tumble down from such elevations with a loud noise, followed by a peculiar chirping noise. What an effect this produced upon entirely inexperienced strangers, may well be imagined by those who have been suddenly waked up in the dark, by some unaccountable noise in the room. Finally, these invaders began to ascend the bed; but happily the mosquito bar was securely tucked under the bed all around, and they were denied access, though their efforts and tumbles to the floor produced no very comfortable reflections. Towards daylight they began to retire, and in the morning no trace of any such visitants could be perceived. On mentioning our troubles, we were told that this nocturnal disturber was only Bernard the Hermit, called generally the soldier crab, perhaps from the peculiar habit he has of protecting his body by thrusting it into an empty shell, which he afterwards carries about, until he outgrows it, when it is relinquished for a larger. Not choosing to pass another night quite so noisily, due care was taken to exclude Monsieur Bernard, whose knockings were therefore confined to the outside of the house. I baited a large wire rat trap with some corn meal, and placed it outside of the back door, and in the morning, found it literally half filled with these crabs, from the largest sized shell that could enter the trap, down to such as were not larger than a hickory nut. Here was a fine collection made at once, affording a very considerable variety in the size and age of the specimens, and the different shells into which they had introduced themselves.

The soldier, or hermit crab, when withdrawn from his adopted shell, presents about the head and claws, a considerable family resemblance to the lobster. The claws, however, are very short and broad, and the body covered with hard shell only in that part which is liable to be exposed or protruded. The posterior or abdominal part of the body, is covered only by a tough skin, and tapers towards a small extremity, furnished with a sort of book-like apparatus, enabling it to hold on to its factitious dwelling. Along the surface of its abdomen, as well as on the back, there are small projections, apparently intended for the same purpose. When once fairly in possession of a shell, it would be quite a difficult matter to pull the crab out, though a very little heat applied to the shell will quickly induce him to leave it. The shells they select are taken solely with reference to their suitability, and hence you may catch a considerable number of the same species, each of which is in a different species or genus of shell. The shells commonly used by them, when of larger size, are those of the whilk, which are much used as an article of food by the islanders, or the smaller conch (strombus) shells. The very young hermit crabs are found in almost every variety of small shell found on the shores of the Antilles. I have frequently been amused by ladies eagerly engaged in making collection of these beautiful little shells, and not dreaming of their being tenanted by a living animal, suddenly startled, on displaying their acquisitions, by observing them to be actively endeavouring to escape; or on introducing the hand into the reticula to produce a particular fine specimen, to receive a smart pinch from the claws of the little hermit. The instant the shell is closely approached or touched, they withdraw as deeply into the shell as possible, and the small ones readily escape observation, but they soon become impatient of captivity, and try to make off. The species of this genus (pagurus) are very numerous, and during the first part of their lives are all aquatic. That is, they are hatched in the little pools about the margin of the sea, and remain there until those that are destined to live on land are stout enough to commence their travels. The hermit crabs, which are altogether aquatic, are by no means so careful to choose the lightest and thinnest shells, as the land troops. The aquatic soldiers may be seen towing along shells of most disproportionate size; but their relatives, who travel over the hills by moonlight, know that all unnecessary incumbrance of weight should be avoided. They are as pugnacious and spiteful as any of the crustaceous class; and when taken, or when they fall and jar themselves, considerably, utter a chirping noise, which is evidently an angry expression. They are ever ready to bite with their claws, and the pinch of the larger individuals is quite painful. It is said, that when they are changing their shells, for the sake of obtaining more commodious coverings, they frequently fight for possession, which may be true where two that have forsaken their old shells meet, or happen to make choice of the same vacant one. It is also said, that one crab is sometimes forced to give up the shell he is in, should a stronger chance to desire it. This, as I never saw it, I must continue to doubt; for I cannot imagine how the stronger could possibly accomplish his purpose, seeing that the occupant has nothing to do but keep close quarters. The invader would have no chance of seizing him to pull him out, nor could he do him any injury by biting upon the surface of his hard claws, the only part that would be exposed. If it be true that one can dispossess the other, it must be by some contrivance of which we are still ignorant. These soldier crabs feed on a great variety of substances, scarcely refusing any thing that is edible; like the family they belong to, they have a decided partiality for putrid meats, and the planters accuse them also of too great a fondness for the sugar cane. Their excursions are altogether nocturnal, in the day time they lie concealed very effectually in small holes, among stones, or any kind of rubbish, and are rarely taken notice of, even where hundreds are within a short distance of each other. The larger soldier crabs are sometimes eaten by the blacks, but they are not much sought after even by them, as they are generally regarded with aversion and prejudice. There is no reason, that we are aware of, why they should not be as good as many other crabs, but they certainly are not equally esteemed.

NO. IX.

Those who have only lived in forest countries, where vast tracts are shaded by a dense growth of oak, ash, chestnut, hickory and other trees of deciduous foliage, which present the most pleasing varieties of verdure and freshness, can have but little idea of the effect produced on the feelings by aged forests of pine, composed in great degree of a single species, whose towering summits are crowned with one dark green canopy, which successive seasons find unchanged, and nothing but death causes to vary. Their robust and gigantic trunks rise an hundred or more feet high in purely proportioned columns, before the limbs begin to diverge; and their tops, densely clothed with long bristling foliage, intermingle so closely as to allow of but slight entrance to the sun. Hence the undergrowth of such forests is comparatively slight and thin, since none but shrubs and plants that love the shade, can flourish under this perpetual exclusion of the animating and invigorating rays of the great exciter of the vegetable world. Through such forests, and by the merest foot paths in great part, it was my lot to pass many miles almost every day; and had I not endeavoured to derive some amusement and instruction from the study of the forest itself, my time would have been as fatiguing to me, as it was certainly quiet and solemn. But wherever nature is, and under whatever form she may present herself, enough is always proffered to fix attention and produce pleasure, if we will condescend to observe with carefulness. I soon found that even a pine forest was far from being devoid of interest, and shall endeavour to prove this by stating the result of various observations made during the time I lived in this situation.

The common pitch, or as it is generally called Norway pine, grows from a seed, which is matured in vast abundance in the large cones peculiar to the pines. This seed is of a rather triangular shape, thick and heavy at the part by which it grows from the cone, and terminating in a broad membranous fan or sail, which, when the seeds are shaken out by the wind, enables them to sail obliquely through the air to great distances. Should an old corn-field or other piece of ground be thrown out of cultivation for more than one season, it is sown with the pine seeds by the winds, and the young pines shoot up as closely and compactly as hemp. They continue to grow in this manner until they become twelve or fifteen feet high, until their roots begin to encroach on each other, or until the stoutest and best rooted begin to overtop so as entirely to shade the smaller. These gradually begin to fail, and finally dry up and perish, and a similar process is continued until the best trees acquire room enough to grow without impediment. Even when the young pines have attained to thirty or forty feet in height, and are as thick as a man's thigh, they stand so closely together, that their lower branches, which are all dry and dead, are intermingled, sufficiently to prevent any one from passing between the trees without first breaking these obstructions away. I have seen such a wood as that just mentioned, covering an old corn-field, whose ridges were still distinctly to be traced, and which an old resident informed me he had seen growing in corn. In a part of this wood which was not far from my dwelling, I had a delightful retreat, that served me as a private study or closet, though enjoying all the advantages of the open air. A road that had once passed through the field, and was of course more compacted than any other part, had denied access to the pine seeds for a certain distance, while on each side of it they grew with their usual density. The ground was covered with the soft layer or carpet of dried pine leaves which gradually and imperceptibly fall throughout the year, making a most pleasant surface to tread on, and rendering the step perfectly noiseless. By beating off with a stick all the dried branches that projected towards the vacant space, I formed a sort of chamber, fifteen or twenty feet long, which above was canopied by the densely mingled branches of the adjacent trees, which altogether excluded or scattered the rays of the sun, and on all sides was so shut in by the trunks of the young trees, as to prevent all observation. Hitherto during the hot season, I was accustomed to retire, for the purpose of reading or meditation; and within this deeper solitude, where all was solitary, very many of the subsequent movements of my life were suggested or devised.

From all I could observe, and all the enquiries I could get answered, it appeared that this rapidly growing tree does not attain its full growth until it is eighty or ninety years old, nor does its time of full health and vigour much exceed an hundred. Before this time it is liable to the attacks of insects, but these are of a kind that bore the tender spring shoots to deposit their eggs therein, and their larvae appear to live principally on the sap which is very abundant, so that the tree is but slightly injured. But after the pine has attained its acme, it is attacked by an insect which deposits its egg in the body of the tree, and the larva devours its way through the solid substance of the timber; so that after a pine has been for one or two seasons subjected to these depredators, it will be fairly riddled, and if cut down is unfit for any other purpose than burning. Indeed, if delayed too long, it is poorly fit for firewood, so thoroughly do these insects destroy its substance. At the same time that one set of insects is engaged in destroying the body, myriads of others are at work under the bark, destroying the sap vessels, and the foliage wears a more and more pale and sickly appearance as the tree declines in vigour. If not cut down, it eventually dies, becomes leafless, stripped of its bark, and as the decay advances, all the smaller branches are broken off; and it stands with its naked trunk and a few ragged limbs, as if bidding defiance to the tempest which howls around its head. Under favourable circumstances, a large trunk will stand in this condition for nearly a century, so extensive and powerful are its roots, so firm and stubborn the original knitting of its giant frame. At length some storm, more furious than all its predecessors, wrenches those ponderous roots from the soil, and hurls the helpless carcass to the earth, crushing all before it in its fall. Without the aid of fire, or some peculiarity of situation favourable to rapid decomposition, full another hundred years will be requisite to reduce it to its elements, and obliterate the traces of its existence. Indeed, long after the lapse of more than that period, we find the heart of the pitch pine still preserving its original form, and from being thoroughly imbued with turpentine, become utterly indestructible except by fire.

If the proprietor attend to the warnings afforded by the woodpecker, he may always cut his pines in time to prevent them from being injured by insects. The woodpeckers run up and around the trunks, tapping from time to time with their powerful bill. The bird knows at once by the sound whether there be insects below or not. If the tree is sound, the woodpecker soon forsakes it for another; should he begin to break into the bark, it is to catch the worm, and such trees are at once to be marked for the axe. In felling such pines, I found the woodmen always anxious to avoid letting them strike against neighbouring sound trees, as they said that the insects more readily attacked an injured tree than one whose bark was unbroken. The observation is most probably correct, at least the experience of country folks in such matters is rarely wrong, though they sometimes give very odd reasons for the processes they adopt.

A full grown pine forest is at all times a grand and majestic object to one accustomed to moving through it. Those vast and towering columns, sustaining a waving crown of deepest verdure; those robust and rugged limbs standing forth at a vast height overhead, loaded with the cones of various seasons; and the diminutiveness of all surrounding objects compared with these gigantic children of nature, cannot but inspire ideas of seriousness and even of melancholy. But how awful and even tremendous does such a situation become, when we hear the first wailings of the gathering storm, as it stoops upon the lofty summits of the pine, and soon increases to a deep hoarse roaring, as the boughs begin to wave in the blast, and the whole tree is forced to sway before its power. In a short time the fury of the wind is at its height, the loftiest trees bend suddenly before it, and scarce regain their upright position ere they are again obliged to cower beneath its violence. Then the tempest literally howls, and amid the tremendous reverberations of thunder, and the blazing glare of the lightning, the unfortunate wanderer hears around him the crash of numerous trees hurled down by the storm, and knows not but the next may be precipitated upon him. More than once have I witnessed all the grandeur, dread, and desolation of such a scene, and have always found safety either by seeking as quickly as possible a spot where there were none but young trees, or if on the main road choosing the most open and exposed situation out of the reach of the large trees. There, seated on my horse, who seemed to understand the propriety of such patience, I would quietly remain, however thoroughly drenched, until the fury of the wind was completely over. To say nothing of the danger from falling trees, the peril of being struck by the lightning which so frequently shivers the loftiest of them, is so great as to render any attempt to advance at such time highly imprudent.

Like the ox among animals, the pine tree may be looked upon as one of the most universally useful of the sons of the forest. For all sorts of building, for firewood, tar, turpentine, rosin, lamp black, and a vast variety of other useful products, this tree is invaluable to man. Nor is it a pleasing contemplation, to one who knows its usefulness, to observe to how vast an amount it is annually destroyed in this country, beyond the proportion that nature can possibly supply. However, we are not disposed to believe that this evil will ever be productive of very great injury, especially as coal fuel is becoming annually more extensively used. Nevertheless, were I the owner of a pine forest, I should exercise a considerable degree of care in the selection of the wood for the axe.

NO. X.

Among the enemies with which the farmers of a poor or light soil have to contend, I know of none so truly formidable and injurious as the crows, whose numbers, cunning, and audacity, can scarcely be appreciated, except by those who have had long continued and numerous opportunities of observation. Possessed of the most acute senses, and endowed by nature with a considerable share of reasoning power, these birds bid defiance to almost all the contrivances resorted to for their destruction; and when their numbers have accumulated to vast multitudes, which annually occurs, it is scarcely possible to estimate the destruction they are capable of effecting. Placed in a situation where every object was subjected to close observation, as a source of amusement, it is not surprising that my attention should be drawn to so conspicuous an object as the crow; and having once commenced remarking the peculiarities of this bird, I continued to bestow attention upon it during many years, in whatever situation it was met with. The thickly wooded and well watered parts of the state of Maryland, as affording them a great abundance of food, and almost entire security during their breeding season, are especially infested by these troublesome creatures, so that at some times of the year they are collected in numbers, which would appear incredible to any one unaccustomed to witness their accumulations.

Individually, the common crow (corvus corone) may be compared in character with the brown or Norway rat, being, like that quadruped, addicted to all sorts of mischief, destroying the lives of any small creatures that may fall in its way, plundering with audacity wherever any thing is exposed to its rapaciousness, and triumphing by its cunning over the usual artifices employed for the destruction of ordinary noxious animals. Where food is at any time scarce, or the opportunity for such marauding inviting, there is scarcely a young animal about the farm yards safe from the attacks of the crow. Young chickens, ducks, goslings, and even little pigs, when quite young and feeble, are carried off by them. They are not less eager to discover the nests of domestic fowls, and will sit very quietly in sight, at a convenient distance, until the hen leaves the nest, and then fly down and suck her eggs at leisure. But none of their tricks excited in me a greater interest, than the observation of their attempts to rob a hen of her chicks. The crow, alighting at a little distance from the hen, would advance in an apparently careless way towards the brood, when the vigilant parent would bristle up her feathers, and rush at the black rogue to drive him off. After several such approaches, the hen would become very angry, and would chase the crow to a greater distance from the brood. This is the very object the robber has in view, for as long as the parent keeps near her young, the crow has very slight chance of success; but as soon as he can induce her to follow him to a little distance from the brood, he takes advantage of his wings, and before she can regain her place, has flown over her, and seized one of her chickens. When the cock is present, there is still less danger from such an attack, for chivalry shows all his vigilance and gallantry in protecting his tender offspring, though it frequently happens that the number of hens with broods renders it impossible for him to extend his care to all. When the crow tries to carry off a gosling from the mother, it requires more daring and skill, and is far less frequently successful than in the former instance. If the gander be in company, which he almost uniformly is, the crow has his labour in vain. Notwithstanding the advantages of flight and superior cunning, the honest vigilance and determined bravery of the former are too much for him. His attempts to approach, however cautiously conducted, are promptly met, and all his tricks rendered unavailing, by the fierce movements of the gander, whose powerful blows the crow seems to be well aware might effectually disable him. The first time I witnessed such a scene, I was at the side of the creek, and saw on the opposite shore a goose with her goslings beset by a crow; from the apparent alarm of the mother and brood, it seemed to me they must be in great danger, and I called to the owner of the place, who happened to be in sight, to inform him of their situation. Instead of going to their relief, he shouted back to me, to ask if the gander was not there too; and as soon as he was answered in the affirmative, he bid me be under no uneasiness, as the crow would find his match. Nothing could exceed the cool impudence and pertinacity of the crow, who, perfectly regardless of my shouting, continued to worry the poor gander for an hour, by his efforts to obtain a nice gosling for his next meal. At length convinced of the fruitlessness of his efforts, he flew off to seek some more easily procurable food. Several crows sometimes unite to plunder the goose of her young, and are then generally successful, because they are able to distract the attention of the parents, and lure them farther from their young.

In the summer the crows disperse in pairs for the purpose of raising their young, and then they select lofty trees in the remotest parts of the forest, upon which with dry sticks and twigs they build a large strong nest, and line it with softer materials. They lay four or five eggs, and when they are hatched, feed, attend, and watch over their young with the most zealous devotion. Should any one by chance pass near the nest while the eggs are still unhatched, or the brood are very young, the parents keep close, and neither by the slightest movement nor noise betray their presence. But if the young are fledged, and beginning to take their first lessons in flying, the approach of a man, especially if armed with a gun, calls forth all their cunning and solicitude. The young are immediately placed in the securest place at hand, where the foliage is thickest, and remain perfectly motionless and quiet. Not so the alarmed parents, both of which fly nearer and nearer to the hunter, uttering the most discordant screams, with an occasional peculiar note, which seems intended to direct or warn their young. So close do they approach, and so clamorous are they as the hunter endeavours to get a good view of them on the tree, that he is almost uniformly persuaded the young crows are also concealed there; but he does not perceive, as he is cautiously trying to get within gun shot, that they are moving from tree to tree, and at each remove are farther and farther from the place where the young are hid. After continuing this trick, until it is impossible that the hunter can retain any idea of the situation of the young ones, the parents cease their distressing outcries, fly quietly to the most convenient lofty tree, and calmly watch the movements of their disturber. Now and then they utter a loud quick cry, which seems intended to bid their offspring lie close and keep quiet, and it is very generally the case that they escape all danger by their obedience. An experienced crow-killer watches eagerly for the tree where the crows first start from; and if this can be observed, he pays no attention to their clamours, nor pretence of throwing themselves in his way, as he is satisfied they are too vigilant to let him get a shot at them; and if he can see the young, he is tolerably sure of them all, because of their inability to fly or change place readily.

The time of the year in which the farmers suffer most from them is in the spring, before their enormous congregations disperse, and when they are rendered voracious by the scantiness of their winter fare. Woe betide the corn field which is not closely watched, when the young grain begins to shoot above the soil! If not well guarded, a host of these marauders will settle upon it at the first light of the dawn, and before the sun has risen far above the horizon, will have plundered every shoot of the germinating seed, by first drawing it skilfully from the moist earth by the young stalk, and then swallowing the grain. The negligent or careless planter, who does not visit his field before breakfast, finds, on his arrival, that he must either replant his corn, or relinquish hopes of a crop; and without the exertion of due vigilance, he may be obliged to repeat this process twice or thrice the same season. Where the crows go to rob a field in this way, they place one or more sentinels, according to circumstances, in convenient places, and those are exceedingly vigilant, uttering a single warning call, which puts the whole to flight the instant there is the least appearance of danger or interruption. Having fixed their sentinels, they begin regularly at one part of the field, and pursuing the rows along, pulling up each shoot in succession, and biting off the corn at the root. The green shoots thus left along the rows, as if they had been arranged with care, offer a melancholy memorial of the work which has been effected by these cunning and destructive plunderers.

Numerous experiments have been made, where the crows are thus injurious, to avert their ravages; and the method I shall now relate, I have seen tried with the most gratifying success. In a large tub a portion of tar and grease were mixed, so as to render the tar sufficiently thin and soft, and to this was added a portion of slaked lime in powder, and the whole stirred until thoroughly incorporated. The seed corn was then thrown in, and stirred with the mixture until each grain received a uniform coating. The corn was then dropped in the hill, and covered as usual. This treatment was found to retard the germination about three days, as the mixture greatly excludes moisture from the grain. But the crows did no injury to the field; they pulled up a small quantity in different parts of the planting, to satisfy themselves it was all alike; upon becoming convinced of which, they quietly left it for some less carefully managed ground, where pains had not been taken to make all the corn so nauseous and bitter.

NO. XI.

It rarely happens that any of the works of nature are wholly productive of evil, and even the crows, troublesome as they are, contribute in a small degree to the good of the district they frequent. Thus, though they destroy eggs and young poultry, plunder the corn fields, and carry off whatever may serve for food, they also rid the surface of the earth of a considerable quantity of carrion, and a vast multitude of insects and their destructive larvae. The crows are very usefully employed when they alight upon newly ploughed fields, and pick up great numbers of those large and long-lived worms which are so destructive to the roots of all growing vegetables; and they are scarcely less so, when they follow the seine haulers along the shores, and pick up the small fishes, which would otherwise be left to rot and lose the air with unpleasant vapours. Nevertheless, they become far more numerous in some parts of the country than is at all necessary to the good of the inhabitants.

and whoever would devise a method of lessening their numbers suddenly, would certainly be doing a service to the community.

About a quarter of a mile above the house I lived in on Curtis's creek, the shore was a sand bank or bluff, twenty or thirty feet high, crowned with a dense young pine forest to its very edge. Almost directly opposite, the shore was flat, and formed a point extending in the form of a broad sand bar, for a considerable distance into the water, and when the tide was low, this flat afforded a fine level space, to which nothing could approach in either direction, without being easily seen. At a short distance from the water, a young swamp wood of maple, gum, oaks, &c. extended back, towards some higher ground. As the sun descended, and threw his last rays in one broad sheet of golden effulgence over the crystal mirror of the waters, innumerable companies of crows arrived daily, and settled on this point, for the purpose of drinking, picking up gravel, and uniting in one body prior to retiring for the night to their accustomed dormitory. The trees adjacent and all the shore would be literally blackened by those plumed marauders, while their increasing outcries, chattering and screams, were almost deafening. It certainly seems that they derive great pleasure from their social habits, and I often amused myself by thinking the uninterrupted clatter which was kept up, as the different gangs united with the main body, was produced by the recital of the adventures they had encountered during their last marauding excursions. As the sun became entirely sunk below the horizon, the grand flock crossed to the sand bluff on the opposite side, where they generally spent a few moments in picking up a further supply of gravel, and then arising in dense and ample column, they sought their habitual roost in the deep entanglements of the distant pines. This daily visit to the point, so near to my dwelling, and so accessible by means of the skiff, led me to hope that I should have considerable success in destroying them. Full of such anticipations, I loaded two guns, and proceeded in my boat to the expected place of action, previous to the arrival of the crows. My view was to have my boat somewhere about half way between the two shores, and as they never manifested much fear of boats, to take my chance of firing upon the main body as they were flying over my head to the opposite side of the river. Shortly after I had gained my station, the companies began to arrive, and every thing went on as usual. But whether they suspected some mischief from seeing a boat so long stationary in their vicinity, or could see and distinguish the guns in the boat, I am unable to say; the fact was, however, that when they set out to fly over, they passed at an elevation which secured them from my artillery effectually, although, on ordinary occasions they were in the habit of flying over me at a height of not more than twenty or thirty feet. I returned home without having had a shot, but resolved to try if I could not succeed better the next day. The same result followed the experiment, and when I fired at one gang, which it appeared possible to attain, the instant the gun was discharged, the crows made a sort of halt, descended considerably, flying in circles, and screaming most vociferously, as if in contempt or derision. Had I been prepared for this, a few of them might have suffered for their bravado. But my second gun was in the bow of the boat, and before I could get it, the black gentry had risen to their former security. While we were sitting at tea that evening, a black came to inform me that a considerable flock of crows, which had arrived too late to join the great flock, had pitched in the young pines not a great way from the house, and at a short distance from the road-side. We quickly had the guns in readiness, and I scarcely could restrain my impatience until it should be late enough and dark enough to give us a chance of success. Without thinking of any thing but the great number of the crows, and their inability to fly to advantage in the night, my notions of the numbers we should bring home were extravagant enough, and I only regretted that we might be obliged to leave some behind. At length, led by the black boy, we sallied forth, and soon arrived in the vicinity of this temporary and unusual roost; and now the true character of the enterprise began to appear. We were to leave the road, and penetrate several hundred yards among the pines, whose proximity to each other, and the difficulty of moving between which, on account of the dead branches, has been heretofore stated. Next, we had to be careful not to alarm the crows before we were ready to act, and at the same time were to advance with cocked guns in our hands. The only way of moving forwards at all, I found to be that of turning my shoulders as much as possible to the dead branches, and breaking my way as gently as I could. At last we reached the trees upon which the crows were roosting; but as the foliage of the young pines was extremely dense, and the birds were full forty feet above the ground, it was out of the question to distinguish where the greatest number were situated. Selecting the trees which appeared by the greater darkness of their summits to be most heavily laden with our game, my companion and I pulled our triggers at the same moment. The report was followed by considerable outcries from the crows, by a heavy shower of pine twigs and leaves upon which the shot had taken effect, and a deafening roar caused by the sudden rising on the wing of the alarmed sleepers. One crow at length fell near me, which was wounded too badly to fly or retain his perch, and as the flock had gone entirely off, with this one crow did I return, rather crest fallen from my grand nocturnal expedition. This crow, however, afforded me instructive employment and amusement during the next day, in the dissection of its nerves and organs of sense, and I know not that I ever derived more pleasure from any anatomical examination, than I did from the dissection of its internal ear. The extent and convolutions of its semicircular canals, show how highly the sense of hearing is perfected in these creatures, and those who wish to be convinced of the truth of what we have stated in relation to them, may still see this identical crow skull, in the Baltimore Museum, to which I presented it after finishing the dissection. At least, I saw it there a year or two since, though I little thought, when employed in examining, or even when I last saw it, that it would ever be the subject of such a reference "in a printed book."

Not easily disheartened by preceding failures, I next resolved to try to outwit the crows, and for this purpose prepared a long line, to which a very considerable number of lateral lines were tied, having each a very small fishing hook at the end. Each of these hooks was baited with a single grain of corn, so cunningly put on, that it seemed impossible that the grain could be taken up without the hook being swallowed with it. About four o'clock, in order to be in full time, I rowed up to the sandy point, made fast my main line to a bush, and extending it toward the water, pegged it down to the other end securely in the sand. I next arranged all my baited lines, and then covering them all nicely with sand, left nothing exposed but the bait. This done, I scattered a quantity of corn all around, to render the baits as little liable to suspicion as possible. After taking a final view of the arrangement, which seemed a very hopeful one, I pulled my boat gently homeward, to wait the event of my solicitude for the capture of the crows. As usual, they arrived in thousands, blackened the sand beach, chattered, screamed, and fluttered about in great glee, and finally sailed over the creek and away to their roost, without having left a solitary unfortunate to pay for having meddled with my baited hooks. I jumped into the skiff, and soon paid a visit to my unsuccessful snare. The corn was all gone; the very hooks were all bare, and it was evident that some other expedient must be adopted before I could hope to succeed. Had I caught but one or two alive, it was my intention to have employed them to procure the destruction of others, in a manner I shall hereafter describe.

NO. XII.

Had I succeeded in obtaining some living crows, they were to be employed in the following manner. After having made a sort of concealment of brushwood within good gunshot distance, the crows were to be fastened by their wings on their backs, between two pegs, yet not so closely as to prevent them from fluttering or struggling. The other crows, who are always very inquisitive where their species is in any trouble, were expected to settle down near the captives, and the latter would certainly seize the first that came near enough with their claws, and hold on pertinaciously. This would have produced fighting and screaming in abundance, and the whole flock might gradually be so drawn into the fray, as to allow many opportunities of discharging the guns upon them with full effect. This I have often observed, that when a quarrel or fight took place in a large flock or gang of crows, a circumstance by no means infrequent, it seemed soon to extend to the whole, and, during the continuance of their anger, all the usual caution of their nature appeared to be forgotten, allowing themselves at such times to be approached closely and regardless of men, fire-arms, or the fall of their companions, continuing their wrangling with rancorous obstinacy. A similar disposition may be produced among them by catching a large owl, and tying it with a cord of moderate length to the limb of a naked tree in a neighbourhood frequented by the crows. The owl is one of the few enemies which the crow has much reason to dread, as it robs the nests of their young, whenever they are left for the shortest time. Hence, whenever crows discover an owl in the day time, like many other birds, they commence an attack upon it, screaming most vociferously, and bringing together all of their species with in hearing. Once this clamour has fairly begun, and their passions are fully aroused, there is little danger of their being scared away, and the chance of destroying them by shooting is continued as long as the owl remains uninjured. But one such opportunity presented during my residence where crows were abundant, and this was unfortunately spoiled by the eagerness of one of the gunners, who, in his anxiety to demolish one of the crows fixed upon some that were most busy with the owl, and killed it instead of its disturbers, which at once ended the sport. When the crows leave the roost, at early dawn, they generally fly to a naked or leafless tree in the nearest field, and there plume themselves and chatter until the daylight is sufficiently clear to show all objects with distinctness. Of this circumstance I have taken advantage several times to get good shots at them in this way. During the day time, having selected a spot within proper distance of the tree frequented by them in the morning, I have built with brushwood and pine bushes a thick, close screen, behind which one or two persons might move securely without being observed. Proper openings, through which to level the guns were also made, as the slightest stir or noise could not be made at the time of action, without a risk of rendering all the preparations fruitless. The guns were all in order and loaded before going to bed, and at an hour or two before daylight, we repaired quietly to the field and stationed ourselves behind the screen, where, having mounted our guns at the loop-holes to be in perfect readiness, we waited patiently for the daybreak. Soon after the gray twilight of the dawn began to displace the darkness, the voice of one of our expected visitants would be heard from the distant forest, and shortly after a single crow would slowly sail towards the solitary tree and settle on its very summit. Presently a few more would arrive singly, and in a little while small flocks followed. Conversation among them is at first rather limited to occasional salutations, but as the flock begins to grow numerous, it becomes general and very animated, and by this time all that may be expected on this occasion have arrived. This may be known also, by observing one or more of them descend to the ground, and if the gunners do not now make the best of the occasion, it will soon be lost, as the whole gang will presently sail off, scattering as they go. However, we rarely waited till there was a danger of their departure, but as soon as the flock had fairly arrived and were still crowded upon the upper parts of the tree, we pulled triggers together, aiming at the thickest of the throng. In this way, by killing and wounding them, with two or three guns, a dozen or more would be destroyed. It was of course needless to expect to find a similar opportunity in the same place for a long time afterwards, as those which escaped had too good memories to return to so disastrous a spot. By ascertaining other situations at considerable distances, we could every now and then obtain similar advantages over them.

About the years 1800, 1, 2, 3, 4, the crows were so vastly accumulated and destructive in the state of Maryland, that the government, to hasten their diminution, received their heads in payment of taxes, at the price of three cents each. The store-keepers bought them of the boys and shooters, who had no taxes to pay, at a rather lower rate, or exchanged powder and shot for them. This measure caused a great havoc to be kept up among them, and in a few years so much diminished the grievance, that the price was withdrawn. Two modes of shooting them in considerable numbers were followed and with great success; the one, that of killing them while on the wing towards the roost, and the other attacking them in the night when they had been for some hours asleep. I have already mentioned the regularity with which vast flocks move from various quarters of the country to their roosting places every afternoon, and the uniformity of the route they pursue. In cold weather, when all the small bodies of water are frozen, and they are obliged to protract their flight towards the bays or sea, their return is a work of considerable labour, especially should a strong wind blow against them; at this season also, being rather poorly fed, they are of necessity less vigorous. Should the wind be adverse, they fly as near the earth as possible, and of this the shooters at the time I allude to took advantage. A large number would collect on such an afternoon, and station themselves close along the foot-way of a high bank, over which the crows were in the habit of flying; and as they were in a great degree screened from sight as the flock flew over, keeping as low as possible because of the wind, their shots were generally very effectual. The stronger was the wind, the greater was their success. The crows that were not injured found it very difficult to rise; and those that diverged laterally, only came nearer to gunners stationed in expectation of such movements. The flocks were several hours in passing over, and as there was generally a considerable interval between each company of considerable size, the last arrived, unsuspecting of what had been going on, and the shooters had time to recharge their arms. But the grand harvest of crow heads, was derived from the invasion of their dormitories, which are well worthy a particular description, and should be visited by every one who wishes to form a proper idea of the number of these birds, that may be accumulated in a single district. The roost is most commonly the densest pine thicket that can be found, generally at no great distance from some river, bay, or other sheet of water, which is the last to freeze, or rarely is altogether frozen. To such a roost, the crows, which, are during the day-time, scattered over perhaps more than a hundred miles of circumference, wing their way every afternoon, and arrive shortly after sunset. Endless columns pour in from various quarters, and as they arrive pitch upon their accustomed perches, crowding closely together for the benefit of the warmth and the shelter afforded by the thick foliage of the pine. The trees are literally bent by their weight, and the ground is covered for many feet in depth by their dung, which by its gradual fermentation, must also tend to increase the warmth of the roost. Such roosts are known to be thus occupied for years, beyond the memory of individuals; and I know of one or two, which the oldest residents in the quarter state to have been known to their grandfathers, and probably had been resorted to by the crows during several ages previous. There is one of great age and magnificent extent, in the vicinity of Rock Creek, an arm of the Patuxent. They are sufficiently numerous on the rivers opening into the Chesapeake, and are every where similar in their general aspect. Wilson has signalled such a roost at no great distance from Bristol, Pa. and I know by observation, that not less than a million of crows sleep there nightly during the winter season.

To gather crow heads from the roost, a very large party was made up, proportioned to the extent of surface occupied by the dormitory. Armed with double barrelled and duck guns, which threw a large charge of shot, the company was divided into small parties, and these took stations, selected during the day time, so as to surround the roost as nearly as possible. A dark night was always preferred, as the crows could not when alarmed fly far, and the attack was delayed until full midnight. All being at their posts, the firing was commenced by those who were most advantageously posted, and followed up successively by the others, as the affrighted crows sought refuge in their vicinity. On every side the carnage then raged fiercely, and there can scarcely be conceived a more forcible idea of the horrors of a battle, than such a scene afforded. The crows screaming with fright and the pain of wounds, the loud deep roar produced by the raising of their whole number in the air, the incessant flashing and thundering of the guns, and the shouts of their eager destroyers, all produced an effect which can never be forgotten by any one who has witnessed it, nor can it well be adequately comprehended by those who have not. Blinded by the blaze of the powder, and bewildered by the thicker darkness that ensued, the crows rise and settle again at a short distance, without being able to withdraw from the field of danger; and the sanguinary work is continued until the shooters are fatigued, or the approach of daylight gives the survivors a chance of escape. Then the work of collecting the heads from the dead and wounded began, and this was a task of considerable difficulty, as the wounded used their utmost efforts to conceal and defend themselves. The bill and half the front of the skull were cut off together, and strung in sums for the tax-gatherer, and the product of the night divided according to the nature of the party formed. Sometimes the great mass of shooters were hired for the night, and received no shares of scalps, having their ammunition provided by the employers; other parties were formed of friends and neighbours, who clubbed for the ammunition, and shared equally in the result.

During hard winters the crows suffer severely, and perish in considerable numbers from hunger, though they endure a wonderful degree of abstinence without much injury. When starved severely, the poor wretches will swallow bits of leather, rope, rags, in short any thing that appears to promise the slightest relief. Multitudes belonging to the Bristol roost, perished during the winter of 1828-9 from this cause. All the water courses were solidly frozen, and it was distressing to observe these starvelings every morning winging their weary way towards the shores of the sea in hopes of food, and again to see them toiling homewards in the afternoon, apparently scarce able to fly.

In speaking of destroying crows, we have never adverted to the use of poison, which in their case is wholly inadmissible on this account. Where crows are common hogs generally run at large, and to poison the crows would equally poison them; the crows would die, and fall to the ground, where they would certainly be eaten by the hogs.

Crows, when caught young, learn to talk plainly, if pains be taken to repeat certain phrases to them, and they become exceedingly impudent and troublesome. Like all of their tribe, they will steal and hide silver or other bright objects, of which they can make no possible use.

Reminiscences of a Voyage to India.

We are tempted to insert, from the same journal, the following Reminiscences of a Voyage to India, written by DR. REYNELL COATES, of this city. They furnish descriptions in a department of natural history but little attended to, and are penned with a skill which will produce lasting fame to the author, should he undertake a more extended effort.

NO. I.

The American public need not be reminded of the folly of those tourists, who, after a week's residence in a capital city, take passage in a line of coaches, and hastily circumambulating a small portion of a great continent, return to launch out into profound disquisitions on national character and the mutability of governments. I am not of this school; but as no one can travel round two thirds of the circumference of our globe, either by land or sea, without acquiring many facts, and making many observations highly interesting to those who quietly enjoy the sweets of social intercourse around the paternal hearth, I hope that these detached reminiscences, while they contribute to my own happiness by recalling scenes of grandeur and of beauty which I can never hope to revisit, may also prove a harmless recreation.

MINUTE ANIMALS OF THE OCEAN.

The innumerable tribes of insects which swarm in every part of the world, delighting us by the brilliancy of their colouring, or tormenting us with their attacks upon our persons or our property, although their armies sometimes render whole countries uninhabitable, destroying every blade of grass in their career; even these seemingly interminable hosts must yield the palm in number, beauty, every thing except destructiveness, to the sky-tinted denizens of the ocean. Every leaf of sea-weed, every fragment of floating timber, teems with life in some of its most interesting forms, and the blue expanse of waves is every where studded with animated gems, which sail along its surface or lie hidden in its bosom.

The seaman, as the vessel hurries along, catches occasional glimpses of misty specks floating beneath him, which, to his careless eye, appear like the spawn of fishes, or the slime washed from their bodies, yet in these unpromising and neglected atoms, closer examination discovers beings whose delicacy of structure defies the pencil, and whose tints are rivalled only by those of a summer's evening.

It is much to be regretted that many minds capable of enjoying, in the highest degree, those pleasures which may be drawn from every department of natural history, are arrested on the threshold of the study by the dry and technical systems, which are but the common-place books of the science, but which are too generally regarded as the science itself. Some knowledge of these systems seems indispensable to the grand and general views which constitute the chief interest of many departments of nature; but the minute inhabitants of the ocean possess a charm for every eye, an interest peculiarly their own. In observing their beauties and their manners, the traveller would find delightful occupation, and the tedium of the sea would be forgotten.

Much of my time was employed in catching these minute animals with a net of bunting secured to a cane twelve feet in length, with which practice soon rendered me so adroit, that little escaped me that floated within three feet of the surface. I cannot hope, by mere description, to inspire others with the same enthusiastic admiration which I felt in a personal examination of the wonders of my net; but I trust that, in introducing some of these new acquaintances to your readers, I shall not be accused of making a burdensome addition to their circle.

The vast tract of waters constituting the Gulf stream, stretching itself along the coast of North America, lies like a huge ocean desert, shunned even by the fish, which are seen but rarely within its limits; but on the farther side a counter current travels at a slower pace in the opposite direction. The surface of this current is thickly covered with masses of sea-weed and other floating bodies, swept by the stream from the shores of the Gulf of Mexico and the southern states, and collected in the eddies. Each little tuft, if carefully taken, and placed in a tumbler or basin of salt water, will display a number of beautiful shrimps, spotted, chequered, or striped with every shade of colouring; a variety of minute crabs, little shells, and not unfrequently fish, in comparison with which the minnows of our creeks are leviathans. Most of these various tribes which have been carried by the current from their native shores, would speedily perish in the unfathomable depths of their own element, if deprived for a long time of the support afforded by their little vessel.

One would suppose that a voyage of three thousand miles, performed in company, and within the narrow confines of a tuft of leaves, would be sufficient to establish a good understanding in the little community; but, alas! the natural propensities to violence and plunder, which not even the lofty attribute of human reason can control, here rage with unrestrained violence; no sooner is this mimic world confined within the precincts of the tumbler or the basin, than the whole vessel displays a system of inveterate warfare. In vain do the smaller shrimps dart through the labyrinth of leaves to elude the pursuit of the crabs; they are speedily torn in pieces, or driven from their shelter to become the prey of some voracious fish, which, flying before the persecution of its larger brethren, thus repays the hospitality of those in whose dominions it seeks obscurity and safety. But this ingratitude seldom passes unpunished. Pent within narrow bounds, and unable to elude pursuit by shooting beyond the grasp of its insulted protectors, a desperate conflict ensues between the fish and the crabs, and in a few hours nothing of the animated scene survives, except some two or three mutilated combatants, who, no longer possessed of their dangerous weapons of offence, or exhausted with wounds, are fain to make a peaceable meal upon the carcases of their former associates. What moral might the observer extract from the high daring and noble prowess of these little aquatics, none of which ever acquire the paltry magnitude of three quarters of an inch! What exquisite smiles might be drawn from such a fertile source to embellish the pages of history, or to be sounded upon the harp of flattery, to swell the festive raptures of the hero!

Nothing is more striking to the naturalist than the contrast between the grandeur and the immensity of power displayed by the angry waves around him, and the delicate and fragile forms which crowd their surface.

The crest of a billow, which causes the tough fir-ribbed vessel to tremble beneath it like a child under the rod of its tutor, passes harmlessly over myriads of beings, which, when removed from their native element, dissolve under the fervour of the sun, or break in pieces by their own weight. Yet, unobtrusive as are these lower links in the scale of nature, escaping by their very humility that destruction which so often overwhelms the proud lord of the creation in spite of all his science and his strength, they are often individually dressed in beauty before which the lily would fade, and the rose hide its blushes; and, collectively, they produce some of the most sublime phenomena, which have even astonished the philosopher, building up islands in the midst of the deep, or, in mimic sportiveness, alarming the mariner with the appearance of unreal shoals, and wakening the lightning of the waters to increase the brilliancy of moonlight, or to render more terrific the gloom of the midnight tempest.

This picture may appear too glowing to many, but in my next I will endeavour to establish its correctness.

NO. II.

MOLLUSCAE. FALSE SHOALS.

Those who have sought relief from the summer heats at Long Branch or Cape May, have probably noticed, in their ramblings along the beach, certain gelatinous transparent masses deposited by the receding tide upon the sands. They resemble very large plano-convex lenses, and are devoid of colour, except in a few minute points, which appear like grains of yellow sand, or the eggs of some shells embedded in their substance. This has led many to consider them as the spawn of some marine animal.

If one of these gellies be placed in a tub of brine immediately after it reaches the shore, the observer will be surprised to find it possessed of animation. The superior, or convex part, will expand like the top of an umbrella, and from its under surface several fringed and leaf-like membranes will be developed. The remains of numerous threads, or tendrils, will float out from the margin of the umbrella, following the motions of the animal as it swims around the tub. These threads are often several feet in length before they are broken by the sand; they are probably employed both to entice and secure the prey, and they produce a sharp, stinging sensation, when applied to the skin. It is from the appearance and offensive power of these last organs, that seamen have given the animal the title of the sea nettle, and naturalists the generic name medusa.

I have offered this rude description of the medusa, as a familiar example of the class of animated beings which are the subjects of the following remarks. They are all alike gelatinous and transparent, and many of them melt and flow away when exposed in the open air to the direct rays of the sun.

Of all the tribes of molluscae which are scattered over every part of the ocean, the most splendid and the best known is the Portuguese man-of-war (physalia). This is an oblong animated sack of air, elongated at one extremity into a conical neck, and surmounted by a membranous expansion running nearly the whole length of the body, and rising above into a semicircular sail, which can be expanded or contracted to a considerable extent, at the pleasure of the animal. From beneath the body are suspended from ten to fifty or more little tubes, from half an inch to an inch in length, open at their lower extremity, and formed like the flower of the blue bottle. These have been regarded as temporary receptacles for food, like the first stomach of cattle; but as the animal is destitute of any visible mouth or alimentary canal, and as I have frequently seen fish in their cavities apparently half digested, I cannot but consider them as proper stomachs; nor indeed is it a greater paradox in zoology that an animal should possess many independent stomachs, than that the strange carnivorous vegetable, the sarcines, should make use of its leaves apparently for a similar purpose.

From the centre of this group of stomachs depends a little cord, never exceeding the fourth of an inch in thickness, and often forty times as long as the body.

The size of the Portuguese man-of-war varies from half an inch to six inches in length. When it is in motion, the sail is accommodated to the force of the breeze, and the elongated neck is curved upward, giving to the animal a form strongly resembling the little glass vases which we sometimes see swimming in goblets.

It is not the form, however, which constitutes the chief beauty of this little navigator. The lower part of the body and the neck are devoid of all colour, except a faint iridescence in reflected lights, and they are so perfectly transparent that the finest print is not obscured when viewed through them. The back becomes gradually tinged as we ascend, with the finest and most delicate blue that can be imagined; the base of the sail equals the purest sky in depth and beauty of tint; the summit is of the most splendid red, and the central part is shaded by the gradual intermixture of these colours through all the intermediate grades of purples. Drawn as it were upon a ground-work of mist, the tints have an aerial softness far beyond the reach of art, and warranting the seemingly imaginative description given at the close of the first number.

The group of stomachs is less transparent, and although the hue is the same as that of the back, they are, on this account incomparably less elegant. By their weight and form they fill the double office of a keel and ballast, while the cord-like appendage, which floats out for yards behind, is called by seamen the cable.

The mode in which the animal secures his prey has been a subject of much speculation, for the fish and crabs that are frequently found within the little tubes, are often large enough to tear them in pieces could they retain their natural vigour during the contest. Deceived by the extreme pain which is felt when the cable is brought into contact with the back of the hand, naturalists have concluded, I think too hastily, that this organ secretes a poisonous or acrid fluid, by which it benumbs any unfortunate fish or other animal that ventures within its toils, allured by the hope of making a meal upon what, in its ignorance, it has mistaken for a worm. The secret will be better explained by a more careful examination of the organ itself. The chord is composed of a narrow lair of contractile fibres, scarcely visible when relaxed, on account of its transparency. If the animal be large, this layer of fibres will sometimes extend itself to the length of four or five yards. A spiral line of blue bead-like bodies, less than the head of a pin, revolves around the cable from end to end, and under the microscope these beads appear covered with minute prickles, so hard and sharp, that they will readily enter the substance of wood, adhering with such pertinacity that the cord can rarely be detached without breaking.

It is to these prickles that the man-of-war owes its power of destroying animals much its superior in strength and activity. When any thing becomes impaled upon the cord, the contractile fibres are called into action, and rapidly shrink from many feet in length to less than the same number of inches, bringing the prey within reach of the little tubes, by one of which it is immediately swallowed.

This weapon, so insignificant in appearance, is yet sufficiently formidable even to man. I had once the misfortune to become entangled with the cable of a very large man-of-war while swimming in the open ocean, and amply did it avenge its fellows, who now sleep in my cabinet robbed at once of life and beauty. The pain which it inflicted was almost insupportable for some time, nor did it entirely cease for twenty-four hours.

I might now proceed to describe many analogous animals scarcely inferior in interest, but it is time to notice some individuals of another tribe, residing beneath the surface, and therefore less generally known.

The grandest of these is the beroc. In size and form it precisely resembles a purse, the mouth, or orifice, answering to one of the modern metallic clasps. It is perfectly transparent, and in order to distinguish its filmy outlines, it is necessary to place it in a tumbler of brine held between the observer and the light. In certain directions the whole body appears faintly iridescent, but there are several longitudinal narrow lines which reflect the full rich tints of the rainbow in the most vivid manner, for ever varying and mingling the hues, even while the animal remains at rest. Under the microscope these lines display a succession of innumerable coloured scales or minute fins, which are kept unceasingly in motion, thus producing the play of colours by continually changing the angle of reflection.

The movements of the beroc are generally retrograde, and are not aided by the coloured scales, but depend upon the alternate contraction and dilatation of the mouth. The lips are never perfectly closed, and the little fish and shrimps which play around them are continually entering and leaving them at pleasure. The animal is dependent for its food upon such semi-animated substances as it draws within its grasp by moving slowly backwards in the water, and retains them in consequence of their own feebleness and inability to escape the weakest of snares.

Another tribe of the sea-purses, (salpa,) though much smaller than the beroc, are more complex in structure, and possess a higher interest in consequence of the singular habits of some of the species. They are double sacks, resembling the beroc in general form, but destitute of iridescence.

The outer sack, or mantle, rarely exceeds an inch in length, and is commonly about half as wide. The inner sack is much smaller, and the interval between these forms a cavity for the water which they breathe, and for some of the viscera. Their visible organs are a transparent heart, which can only be seen in the strongest light; a splendid double row of whitish bead-like cavities forming a spiral line near one extremity, and supposed to be either lungs or ovaries; numerous broad, flat, pearly muscles, barely distinguished by their distinctness, and an alimentary canal as fine as horse-hair, with a slight enlargement at one spot, which has been called a stomach. This enlargement resembles both in size and colour a grain of sand. From the base of the animal arises two longer and four or five shorter conical spines of jelly, curved into hooks at the points, by means of which numerous individuals attach themselves together in double rows like the leaflets of a pinnated leaf. Cords of this kind, composed of forty or fifty animals, were often taken, but they separate and reattach themselves at pleasure.

To the gregarious habits of this little mollusque we owe a very singular and striking phenomena, which I have never seen noticed by naturalists, although we frequently witnessed it near the Cape of Good Hope.

The animals are occasionally found associated together in such countless myriads that the sea is literally filled with them, sometimes over three or four square miles of surface, and to the depth of several fathoms. The yellow spots which have been described being the only coloured portions of their body, give to the whole tract the appearance of a shoal or sand bank at some distance below the surface. The deception is heightened by the greater smoothness of the water at these places, particularly in calm weather, for so closely are the animals crowded together, that the water is rendered in a manner less fluid; the smaller billows break around the margin and are lost, while the heavy waves of the southern ocean are somewhat opposed in their progress, and take on in a slight degree the usual appearance of the ground swell. There can be but little doubt that many of the numerous shoals laid down in the charts of this region, but which have never been seen by any but the supposed discoverers, have been immense banks of these gregarious molluscae. In sailing through a tract of this description, in which the progress of the ship was very sensibly retarded, I have dipped up with the ship's bucket a greater bulk of the animals than of the water in which they were suspended. How wonderful are the effects produced by the minute links of creation!

C.

C. wishes those of his friends who have devoted themselves to the study of natural history, to understand distinctly that the anatomical and chemical terms contained in these essays, are employed, not in their scientific but in their popular sense, and also that in drawing the organs of the salpa he has followed Lamarck and Cuvier, without committing himself by any opinions upon the correctness of their generic descriptions, as applicable to this particular species.

No. III.

PHOSPHORESCENCE OF THE OCEAN.

As the glow-worm and the fire-fly enliven the night by land, so do many of the molluscae and other marine animals kindle their mimic fires by sea—but on a far grander and more imposing scale.

If, during a dark night, we watch attentively the advance and retreat of the breakers on the beach, we shall generally perceive the crest of each billow to be illuminated by a faint flash at the moment of its fall; and after the wave subsides, the beach will be spangled with minute but brilliant spots, which shine for a few moments and then disappear. These lights will convey an idea of what is meant by the phosphorescence of the ocean.

At all times, and in nearly all situations, the spray thrown up by the bow of the vessel is thickly strewed during the night with little silvery stars, that dance and whirl about among the eddies, until they are lost in the distance. These luminous particles are generally so small that they are caught with difficulty, and so perfectly transparent, that they can scarcely be distinguished from the drops of brine adhering to the net. Their own radiance, by which they are visible in their native element, is soon lost when brought into the air, for it ceases instantly on the death of the animal. The few specimens which I have examined were either gelatinous molluscae or microscopic shrimps; the former being luminous throughout their entire substance, and the latter, like the glow-worm, emitting an intermittent light from a lantern near the tail.

Such were the appearances noticed in most parts of the North Atlantic Ocean, excepting the Gulf stream. The fretful waves of this region, vexed as it is by perpetual squalls, appear to be wrapped in total darkness. But in the tropical regions, and throughout the vast expanse of the Southern and Indian Oceans, the grandeur and sublimity of the night scene were often beyond description. The vivid hues of "the double headed shot clouds," which rise like immense mountains from the water of the western horizon, seemed to fade into twilight only to give place to a still more beautiful illumination in the bosom of the waves. The bow of the vessel scattered far around a blaze of light, which shone brilliantly under the brightest moon, and was often sufficiently intense to enable us to read upon the deck. Leaning over the stern, our track resembled a vast trough of fire, studded with innumerable floating lanterns and stars, such as fall from an exploding sky-rocket. In the eddies, the whirling of these bodies produced long streams of light like serpents drawn in flame, and occasionally immense globes of fire would roll along beneath the keel, at the depth of several fathoms, yet so intensely bright that the little rudder fish were distinctly visible sporting beneath the cabin windows. These globes are generally as large as a flour barrel, and according to Peron and Lesueur, they are sometimes seen to reach the enormous diameter of twenty feet. I had once the gratification to observe one of these animals within a foot of the surface. It was a medusa, large enough to fill a bushel basket, visible in every fibre by its own illumination.

At these times the crest of every wave resembles a long line of ignited phosphorus, and every dip of the oar, or plunge of the bucket, produces a flash of light, and scattered scintillations on every side. Even the larger fish, when they approach the vessel, are followed by a luminous path like the tail of a comet, and they are often struck with the harpoon, guided by this appearance alone.

The sea at times resembles a field of snow or milk, and Peron asserts that it is often tinged with prismatic colours, varying at every moment; but these phenomena were not witnessed in our voyage.

The strangest of all the modes in which the phosphorescence of the ocean is exhibited, was witnessed near the island of Tristan D'Acunha, under circumstances too impressive to be forgotten.

The night was dark and damp, and the breeze too light to steady the vessel. She rolled heavily over the waves, making it difficult for a landsman to walk the deck. A fog bank, which hung around the northern horizon at sunset, now swept slowly down towards us. The captain ordered the light sails furled in expectation of a squall, and we stood leaning together over the rail, watching the mist, which approached more and more rapidly, till it resembled, in the increasing darkness, an immense wall extending from the water to the clouds, and seemed threatening to crush us beneath it. Just at this moment, a flash, like a broad sheet of lightning, spread itself over the surface of the ocean as far as the eye could reach—five or six times, at intervals of a few seconds, the flash was repeated, and then the vessel was enveloped in the fog. The breeze quickened—the bustle of preparation attracted the attention of every one, and in a few moments we were bounding along at the rate of ten miles an hour, over waves sparkling in the clear moonshine, but the “lightning of the waters” had ceased. I have always regretted that I did not ascertain by what animal this most singular phenomenon was produced, but the wild interest of the scene banished every thought of the kind. In the course of the night we passed through several beds of the salpa, and it is very probable that the flashes were produced by these little creatures, induced, by a wonderful instinct, to act in concert for some inscrutable purpose.

There are few phenomena in nature which have led to a greater diversity of opinion among modern men of science, than the luminous appearance of the ocean during the night. Some have regarded it as the effect of electricity, produced by the friction of the waves; others as the product of a species of fermentation in the water, occurring accidentally in certain places. Many have attributed it to the well known phosphorescence of putrid fish, or to the decomposition of their slime and exuvia, and a few only to the real cause—the voluntary illumination of many distinct species of marine animals, generally analogous to the tribes which were described in the former number of these Reminiscences. Even those authors who have acknowledged the agency of animal life in producing this wonderful appearance, have been in a manner compelled, by its universality, and by the almost incredible multiplication of beings which it infers, to admit the probable co-operation of other causes.

My own observation has led to the conclusion, that the phosphorescence of the ocean is due solely to the peculiar instinct of the molluscs, and some genera of the crustaceae.

The electrical hypothesis is certainly fallacious, for were we even to grant the possibility of producing an electric light in an agitated fluid, which is itself an imperfect conductor, similar to that occasioned by the attrition of white sugar or glass in the dark, the acknowledged physical law, that like causes produce like effects, would lead us to expect an uniform diffusion of the phosphorescence over a considerable extent of water under the same latitude and longitude; but this is not the case. A ship will often be enveloped for a few moments in so bright an illumination that a book may be read upon the deck, and at the next instant she may be involved in almost total darkness. Again, electricity is eliminated with the greatest facility in a cold and dry atmosphere; but the phosphorescence of the ocean is most considerable in tropical climates, nor is it diminished by storms or rain. The supposition of a fermentation of the surface is equally unsatisfactory, for such a process would lead to an equable diffusion of light over the whole space in which it acted. But the luminous matter is almost always seen in distinct masses or particles; and the few exceptions to this rule which have been observed, do not admit of an explanation according to the known effects of fermentation. The light eliminated by putrid fish furnishes a most plausible theory, but the very wide extent of the illumination, is, of itself, sufficient to prove its incorrectness. It has been already shown to what an incalculable amount the living inhabitants of the ocean increase, but the reverse is true of the dead. The air and the water swarm with innumerable depurators, who devour every thing that dies, whether beneath the surface or upon it. The albatross, the stormy petrel, the Cape pigeon, some of the gulls, and other marine fowls, which are constantly soaring by thousands over every sea, seize upon all unprotected animals, dead or living, which remain within their reach. The three former birds will follow the ship for days during calm weather, to share the offals thrown over by the cook; and so ravenous is their appetite, that they are frequently caught with the hook and line baited with meat, and trolled in the wake of the vessel. I have frequently seen them bathing their feathers in the grease which floats around the refuse of the camboose, and skimming it up with their spoon-shaped bills with every demonstration of pleasure. Those bodies that sink by their gravity fall a prey to the fish, and those that are too minute to attract the attention of the larger animals, are speedily devoured by the molluscs. Thus the waters are preserved in a high degree of purity, and probably there does not remain sufficient putrescent matter in a cubic league of water to render luminous a cubic yard. In passing over an extent of ocean greater than the whole circumference of the earth, I did not see a single dead animal of any kind.

The purpose for which this phosphorescence is designed, is lost in conjecture; but when we recollect that fish are attracted to the net by the lights of the fishermen, and that many of the marine shells will leave their native element to crawl around a fire built upon the beach, are we not warranted in supposing that the animals of which we have been speaking, are provided with their luminous properties, in order to entice their prey within their grasp?

In quitting the subject of the minute animals of the ocean, I should not neglect to refer the curious to three engravings in the volume of plates to the Voyage aux Terres Australes, by Peron and Lesueur, where may be seen the happiest efforts of the pencil in delineating some of these interesting beings. The work is contained in the Philadelphia library, and will amply repay the trouble of a visit.

FINLAND SONG.

ADDRESSED BY A MOTHER TO HER CHILD.

By Dr. John Leyden.

Sweet bird of the meadow,
Oh, soft be thy rest!
Thy mother will wake thee
At morn from thy nest;
She has made a soft nest,
Little redbreast, for thee,
Of the leaves of the birch,
And the moss of the tree.
Then soothe thee, sweet bird
Of my bosom, once more!
'Tis Sleep, little infant,
That stands at the door.
“Where is the sweet babe,”
You may hear how he cries,
“Where is the sweet babe
In his cradle that lies;
“In his cradle, soft swaddled
In vestments of down?
“’Tis mine to watch o’er him
Till darkness be flown.”

Biographical Memoir

OF

JOHN LEYDEN, M. D.

From the Miscellaneous Prose Works of Sir Walter Scott, Bart.

INTRODUCTION.

The example of such men as the subject of the following sketch is peculiarly adapted for the instruction of the aspiring and energetic youth of a rising republic. His talents were bestowed by nature, but they were improved, enlarged, and brought into service, by his own assiduity and studious research. The vocation of Leyden's father was little above that of a day labourer, and all his household establishment corresponded with his external means. A friend to whom we had loaned the memoir, says:—“I well and fondly remember the time when I partook of the kind hospitality of the patriarch under the roof of their thatched cottage. Their board was humble, and their fare frugal, but the serenity, the cheerfulness, the intelligence, that pervaded the happy circle, rendered the paternal mansion of Leyden a scene which kings and princes might envy.”

Springing from such origin, bursting, by the force of almost unaided genius, through the many obstacles to success, he at an early age took a distinguished rank among contemporary literary characters. He made for himself a name, and what is still more honourable, he left it untarnished. His principles, based on an immutable foundation, resisted all the allurements of pleasure, and the whisperings of selfishness. Manfully he pursued his course—but his desires soared beyond the power of accomplishment, and he no doubt felt a victim to his eager pursuit after knowledge. Is there not, however, more attained in such a life than in the three score and ten years of the idler, or the dull and lazy plodding of so many of our race?

Where talent and principle are so finely blended, we have the more confidence in recommending it as an example to the young, while we gratify our senior readers with a delightful biographical sketch of a distinguished man, and that sketch written by Sir Walter Scott. The Poetical Remains of Leyden were collected and edited by the Rev. James Morton, and are in the Philadelphia Library, as well as the “Malay Annals,” and an “Historical Account of Discoveries and Travels in Africa,” enlarged and completed by Hugh Murray, Esq. The latter is the basis of a more recent work, entitled, “Narrative of Discovery and Adventure in Africa, by Professor Jameson, James Wilson, and Hugh Murray,” republished in Harper's Family Library.

The subject of the present brief memorial will be long distinguished among those whom the elasticity and ardour of genius have raised to distinction from an obscure and humble origin. John Leyden was descended from a family of small farmers, long settled upon the estate of Cavers, in the vale of Teviot, Roxburghshire, Scotland. He loved to mention some traditional rhymes, which one of his ancestors had composed, and to commemorate the prowess of another, who had taken arms with the insurgent Cameronians, about the time of the revolution, and who distinguished himself by his gallantry at the defence of the church-yard of Dunkeld, 21st August, 1689, against a superior body of Highlanders, when Colonel Cleland, the leader of these rustic enthusiasts, was slain at their head. John Leyden, residing in the village of Denholm, and parish of Cavers Roxburghshire, and Isabella Scott, his wife, were the parents of Dr. Leyden, and still survive to deplore the irreparable loss of a son, the honour alike of his family and country. Their irreproachable life, and simplicity of manners, recommended them to the respect and kindness of their neighbours, and to the protection of the family of Mr. Douglas of Cavers, upon whose estate they resided.

John Leyden, so eminent for the genius which he displayed, and the extensive knowledge which he accumulated during his brief career, was born at Denholm, on 8th September, 1775, and bred up, like other children in the same humble line of life, to such country labour as suited his strength.

"About a year after his birth," says his relative and biographer, Mr. Morton, "his parents removed to Henslawhill, a lonely cottage, about three miles from Denholm, on the farm of Neather Toils, which was then held by Mr. Andrew Blithe, his mother's uncle. Here they lived for sixteen years, during which his father was employed, first as shepherd, and afterwards in managing the whole business of the farm, his relation having had the misfortune to lose his sight. The cottage, which was of very simple construction, was situated in a wild pastoral spot near the foot of Ruberslaw, on the verge of the heath which stretches down from the sides of that majestic hill. The simplicity of the interior corresponded with that of its outward appearance. But the kind affections, cheerful content, intelligence, and piety, that dwelt beneath its lowly roof, made it such a scene as poets have imagined in their descriptions of the innocence and happiness of rural life.

"Leyden was taught to read by his grandmother, who, after her husband's death, resided in the family of her son. Under the care of this venerable and affectionate instructress his progress was rapid. That insatiable desire of knowledge, which afterwards formed so remarkable a feature in his character, soon began to show itself. The historical passages of the Bible first caught his attention; and it was not long before he made himself familiarly acquainted with every event recorded in the Old and New Testament."

Thus Leyden was ten years of age before he had an opportunity of attending a public place of education; and as the death of his first teacher, William Wilson, schoolmaster at Kirktown, soon after took place, the humble studies of the future poet, antiquary, and orientalist, were adjourned till the subsequent year, (1786), when a Mr. W. Scott taught the same school. But the sacred fire had already caught to the ready fuel which nature had adjusted for its supply. The ardent and unutterable longing for information of every description, which characterised John Leyden as much as any man who ever lived, was now roused and upon the watch. The rude traditional tales and ballads of the once warlike district of Teviotdale were the readiest food which offered itself to this awakening appetite for knowledge. These songs and legends became rooted in his memory, and he so identified his feelings with the wild, adventurous, and daring characters which they celebrate, that the associations thus formed in childhood, and cherished in youth, gave an eccentric and romantic tincture to his own mind, and many, if not all the peculiarities of his manner and habits of thinking may be traced to his imitating the manners and assuming the tone of a borderer of former times. To this may be ascribed his eager admiration of adventurous deeds and military achievement, his contempt of luxury, his zealous and somewhat exclusive preference of his native district, an affected dislike to the southron, as the "auld enemies of Scotland," an earnest desire to join to the reputation of high literary acquirements the praise of an adept at all manly exercises, and the disregard of ceremony, and bold undaunted bearing in society, which might be supposed to have characterised an ancient native of the border. In his early days, also, he probably really felt the influence of those superstitious impressions, which at a later period he used sometimes to assume, to the great amusement of his friends, and astonishment of strangers. It was indeed somewhat singular, when he got upon this topic, to hear Leyden maintain powerfully, and with great learning, the exploded doctrines of demonology, and sometimes even affect to confirm the strange tales with which his memory abounded, by reference to the ghostly experiences of his childhood. Even to those most intimate with him, he would sometimes urge such topics, in a manner which made it impossible to determine whether he was serious or jocular; and most probably his fancy, though not his sober judgment, actually retained some impressions borrowed from the scenes he has himself described.

The woodland's sombre shade that peasants fear,
The haunted mountain streams that murmur'd near,
The antique tombstone, and the church-yard green,
Seem'd to unite me with the world unseen:
Oft when the eastern moon rose darkly red,
I heard the viewless paces of the dead,
Heard in the breeze the wandering spirits' sigh,
Or airy skirts unseen, that rustled by.

Scenes of Infancy.

But the romantic legend and heroic ballad did not satiate, though they fed, his youthful appetite for knowledge. The obscure shepherd boy never heard of any source of information within his reach, without straining every nerve to obtain access to it. A companion, for example, had met with an odd volume of the Arabian Nights' Entertainments, and gave an account of its contents, which excited the curiosity of young Leyden. This precious book was in possession of a blacksmith's apprentice, who lived at several miles distance from Denholm, and the season was winter. Leyden, however, waded through the snow, to present himself by daybreak at the forge door, and request a perusal of this interesting book in presence of the owner, for an unlimited loan was scarcely to be hoped for. He was disappointed, was obliged to follow the blacksmith to a still greater distance, where he was employed on some temporary job, and when he found him, the son of Vulcan, with caprice worthy of a modern collector, was not disposed to impart his treasure, and put him off with some apology. Leyden remained stationary beside him the whole day, till the lad, softened, or wearied out by his pertinacity, actually made him a present of the volume, and he returned home by sunset, exhausted by hunger and fatigue, but in triumphant possession of a treasure, for which he would have subjected himself to yet greater privations. This childish history took place when he was about eleven years old; nor is there any great violence in conjecturing that these fascinating tales, obtained with so much difficulty, may have given his youthful mind that decided turn towards oriental learning which was displayed through his whole life, and illustrated by his regretted and too early decease. At least, the anecdote affords an early and striking illustration of the ardour of his literary curiosity, and the perseverance which marked his pursuit of the means for gratifying it.

Other sources of information now began to offer themselves, scanty indeed, compared to those which are accessible to thousands of a more limited capacity, but to Leyden as invaluable as an iron spike, or a Birmingham knife, would have been to Alexander Selkirk, during his solitary residence on Juan Fernandez. From the new teacher at Kirktown, Leyden acquired some smattering of the Latin language; but ere he could make any progress, the school became again vacant in the year 1786. Next year it was again opened by a third schoolmaster, named Andrew Scott, under whom Leyden gained some knowledge of arithmetic. Thus transferred from one teacher to another, snatching information at such times, and in such portions, as those precarious circumstances afforded, he continued not only to retain the elemental knowledge which he had acquired, but to struggle onward vigorously in the paths of learning. It seems probable that the disadvantage sustained from want of the usual assistances to early learning, may, in so energetic a mind as that of Leyden, be in many respects balanced by the habit of severe study, and painful investigation, which it was necessary to substitute for those adventitious aids. The mind becomes doubly familiar with that information which it has attained through its own laborious and determined perseverance, and acquires a readiness in encountering and overcoming difficulties of a similar nature, from the consciousness of those which it has already successfully surmounted. Accordingly, Leyden used often to impute the extraordinary facility which he possessed in the acquisition of languages to the unassisted exercises of his juvenile years.

About this period his predominant desire for learning had determined his parents to breed young Leyden up for the Church of Scotland, trusting for his success to those early talents which already displayed themselves so strongly. Mr. Duncan, a Cameronian minister at Denholm, became now his instructor in the Latin language. It does not appear that he had any Greek tutor; nevertheless he probably had acquired some knowledge of the elements of that language before he attended the College of Edinburgh in 1790, for the purpose of commencing his professional studies. The late worthy and learned Professor Andrew Dalzell used to describe, with some humour, the astonishment and amusement excited in his class when John Leyden first stood up to recite his Greek exercises. The rustic, yet undaunted manner, the humble dress, the high harsh tone of his voice, joined to the broad provincial accent of Teviotdale, discomposed, on this first occasion, the gravity of the professor, and totally routed that of the students. But it was soon perceived that these uncouth attributes were joined to qualities which commanded respect and admiration. The rapid progress of the young rustic attracted the approbation and countenance of the professor, who was ever prompt to distinguish and encourage merit; and to those among the students who did not admit literary proficiency as a shelter for the ridicule due since the days of Juvenal to the scholar's torn coat and unfashionable demeanour, Leyden was in no respect averse from showing strong reasons, adapted to their comprehension, and affecting their personal safety, for keeping their mirth within decent bounds.

The Greek language was long his favourite study, and, considering his opportunities, he became much more intimately acquainted with its best authors than is usual in Scotland, even among those who make some pretensions to literature. The Latin he understood thoroughly; and it is, perhaps, the best proof of his classical attainments, that, at a later period, to use his own expression, "he passed muster pretty well when introduced to Dr. Parr."

Leyden was now at the fountain head of knowledge, and availed himself of former privations, by quaffing it in large draughts. He not only attended all the lectures usually connected with the study of theology, but several others, particularly some of the medical classes,—a circumstance which afterwards proved important to his outset in life, although at the time it could only be ascribed to his restless and impatient pursuit after science of every description. Admission to these lectures was easy, from the liberality of the professors, who throw their classes gratuitously open to young men educated for the church, a privilege of which Leyden availed himself to the utmost extent. There were, indeed, few branches of study in which he did not make some progress. Besides the learned languages, he acquired French, Spanish, Italian, and German, was familiar with the ancient Icelandic, and studied Hebrew, Arabic, and Persian.

But though he soon became particularly distinguished by his talents as a linguist, few departments of science altogether escaped his notice. He investigated moral philosophy with the ardour common to all youths of talent who studied ethics, under the auspices of Professor Dugald Stewart, with whose personal notice he was honoured. He became a respectable mathematician, and was at least superficially acquainted with natural philosophy, natural history, chemistry, botany, and mineralogy. These various sciences he acquired in different degrees, and at different times, during his residence at college. They were the fruit of no very regular plan of study: whatever subject interested his mind at the time attracted his principal attention till time and industry had overcome the difficulties which it presented, and was then exchanged for another pursuit. It seemed frequently to be Leyden's object to learn just so much of a particular science as should enable him to resume it at any future period: and to those who objected to the miscellaneous, or occasionally the superficial nature of his studies, he used to answer with his favourite interjection, "Dash it, man, never mind: if you have the scaffolding ready, you can run up the masonry when you please." But this mode of study, however successful with John Leyden, cannot be safely recommended to a student of less retentive memory and robust application. With him, however, at least while he remained in Britain, it seemed a matter of little consequence for what length of time he resigned any particular branch of study; for when either some motive, or mere caprice, induced him to resume it, he could, with little difficulty, reunite all the broken associations, and begin where he left off months or years before, without having lost an inch of ground during the interval.

The vacations which our student spent at home were employed in arranging, methodising, and enlarging, the information which he acquired during his winter's attendance at college. His father's cottage affording him little opportunity for quiet and seclusion, he was obliged to look out for accommodations abroad, and some of his places of retreat were sufficiently extraordinary. In a wild recess, in the den or glen which gives name to the village of Denholm, he contrived a sort of furnace for the purpose of such chemical experiments as he was adequate to perform. But his chief place of retirement was the small parish church, a gloomy and ancient building, generally believed in the neighbourhood to be haunted. To this chosen place of study, usually locked during week-days, Leyden made entrances by means of a window, read there for many hours in the day, and deposited his books and specimens in a retired pew. It was a well-chosen spot of seclusion, for the kirk (excepting during divine service) is rather a place of terror to the Scottish rustic, and that of Cavers was rendered more so by many a tale of ghosts and witchcraft, of which it was the supposed scene; and to which Leyden, partly to indulge his humour, and partly to secure his retirement, contrived to make some modern additions. The nature of his abstruse studies, some specimens of natural history, as toads and adders, left exposed in their spirit-vials, and one or two practical jests played off upon the more curious of the peasantry, rendered his gloomy haunt not only venerated by the wise, but feared by the simple of the parish, who began to account this abstracted student like the gifted person described by Wordsworth, as possessing——waking empire wide as dreams,

An ample sovereignty of eye and ear;
Rich are his walks with supernatural cheer:
The region of his inner spirit teems
With vital sounds, and monitory gleams
Of high astonishment and pleasing fear.

This was a distinction which, as we have already hinted, he was indeed not unwilling to affect, and to which, so far as the visions existing in the high fancy of the poet can supply those ascribed to the actual ghost-seer, he had indeed no slight pretensions.

Books as well as retirement were necessary to the progress of Leyden's studies, and not always attainable. But his research collected from every quarter such as were accessible by loan, and he subjected himself to the utmost privations to purchase those that were not otherwise to be procured. The reputation also of his prosperous career of learning obtained him occasional access to the library at Cavers; an excellent old collection, in which he met, for the first time, many of those works of the middle ages which he studied with so much research and success. A Froissart, in particular, translated by Lord Berners, captivated his attention with all those tales "to savage virtue dear," which coincided with his taste for chivalry, and with the models on which it had been formed: and tales of the Black Prince, of the valiant Chandos, and of Geoffrey Tete-Noire, now rivalled the legends of Johnnie Armstrong, Walter the Devil, and the Black Douglas.

In the country, Leyden's society was naturally considerably restricted, but while at college it began to extend itself among such of his fellow students as were distinguished for proficiency in learning. Among these we may number the celebrated author of the Pleasures of Hope; the Rev. Alexander Murray, united with Leyden in the kindred pursuit of oriental learning, and whose lamp, like that of his friend, was extinguished at the moment when it was placed in the most conspicuous elevation;* William Erskine, with whom Leyden renewed his friendship in India; the late ingenious Dr. Thomas Brown, distinguished for his early proficiency in the science of moral philosophy, of which he was professor in the Edinburgh College; the Rev. Robert Lundie, Minister of Kelso, and several other young men of talents, who at that time pursued their studies in the University of Edinburgh.

Leyden was also fortunate enough to attract the notice and patronage of Dr. Robert Anderson, of Edinburgh, the first man of letters who presented the public with a complete edition of English poetry, from the time of Chaucer downwards. The notice and encouragement of a gentleman, whose benevolence of disposition placed all his literary experience at the command of the young student, was of the utmost consequence to the direction of his studies, and was always warmly remembered and kindly acknowledged by John Leyden, who, under the doctor's patronage, had also an opportunity of trying his young wings by a flight or two in the poetical department of the Edinburgh Magazine.

In the year 1796, after five or six years spent at the College of Edinburgh, the recommendation of Professor Dalzell procured Leyden the situation of private tutor to the sons of Mr. Campbell of Fairfield, a situation which he retained for two or three years. During the winter of 1798, he attended the two young gentlemen to their studies at the College of St. Andrew's. Here he had the advantage of the acquaintance of Professor Hunter, an admirable classical scholar, and to whose kind instructions he professed much obligation. The secluded situation also of St. Andrew's, the monastic life of the students, the fragments of antiquity with which that once metropolitan town is surrounded, and the libraries of its colleges, gave him additional opportunity and impulse to pursue his favourite plans of study.

* This amiable man, and great orientalist, died within a few months after he had been appointed to the chair of the Hebrew professorship in the University of Edinburgh, in consequence of such a list of splendid attestations of his qualifications, as has rarely honoured the most distinguished scholars.

About the time he resided at St. Andrew's, the renown of Mungo Park, and Leyden's enthusiastic attachment to all researches connected with oriental learning, turned his thoughts towards the history of Africa, in which he found much to enchant an imagination that loved to dwell upon the grand, the marvellous, the romantic, and even the horrible, and which was rather fired than appalled by the picture of personal danger and severe privation. Africa, indeed, had peculiar charms for Leyden. He delighted to read of hosts, whose arrows intercepted the sun-beams; of kings and leaders, who judged of the numberless number of their soldiers by marching them over the trunk of a cedar, and only deemed their strength sufficient to take the field when such myriads had passed as to reduce the solid timber to impalpable dust; the royal halls also of Dahomy, built of skulls and cross-bones, and moistened with the daily blood of new victims of tyranny;—all, in short, that presented strange, wild, and romantic views of what have been quaintly entitled "the ultimities and summities of human nature," and which furnished new and unheard of facts in the history of man, had great fascination for his ardent imagination. And about this time he used to come into company, quite full of these extraordinary stories garnished faithfully with the unpronounceable names of the despots and tribes of Africa, which any one at a distance would have taken for the exorcism of a conjuror. The fruit of his researches he gave to the public in a small volume, entitled "A Historical and Philosophical Sketch of the Discoveries and Settlements of the Europeans in Northern and Western Africa, at the close of the 18th century," crown 8vo. 1799. It is written on the plan of Raynal's celebrated work, and as it contains a clear and lively abridgment of the information afforded by travellers whose works are of rare occurrence, it was favourably received by the public. Among Leyden's native hills, however, there arose a groundless report that this work was compiled for the purpose of questioning whether the evidence of Mungo Park went the length of establishing the western course of the Niger. This unfounded rumour gave offence to some of Mr. Park's friends, nicely jealous of the fame of their countryman, of whom they had such just reason to be proud. And thus, what would have been whimsical enough, the dispute regarding the course of the Niger in Africa, had nearly occasioned a feud upon the Scottish border. For John Leyden happening to be at Hawick while the upper troop of Roxburghshire yeomanry were quartered there, was told, with many exaggerations, of menaces thrown out against him, and advised to leave the town. Leyden was then in the act of quitting the place; but, instead of expediting his retreat, in consequence of this friendly hint, he instantly marched to the market-place, at the time when the corps paraded there, humming surlily, like one of Ossian's heroes, the fragment of a border song,

I've done nae ill, I'll brook nae wrang,
But back to Wamphray I will gang.

His appearance and demeanour were construed into seeking a quarrel, with which his critics, more majorum, would readily have indulged him, had not friendly interposition appeased the causeless resentment of both parties. The History of African Discoveries, Leyden proposed to extend to four volumes 8vo. and had made great preparations for the work; he was in constant communication on the subject with Messrs. Longman and Co., by whom it was to have been published, and some sheets were actually printed, when the design was interrupted by his Indian voyage.

On Leyden's return to Edinburgh from St. Andrew's, he resided with his pupils in the family of Mr. Campbell, where he was treated with that respect and kindness which every careful father will pay to him whose lessons he expects his children to receive with attention and advantage. His hours, excepting those of tuition, were at his own uncontrolled disposal, and such of his friends as chose to visit him at Mr. Campbell's, were secure of a hospitable reception. This class began now to extend itself among persons of an older standing than his contemporaries, and embraced several who had been placed by fortune, or had risen by exertions, to that fixed station in society, to which his college intimates were as yet only looking forward. His acquaintance with Mr. Richard Heber was the chief means of connecting him with several families of the former description, and it originated in the following circumstances.

John Leyden's feelings were naturally poetical, and he was early led to express them in the language of poetry. Before he visited St. Andrew's, and while residing there, he had composed both fragments and complete pieces of poetry in almost every style and stanza which our language affords, from an unfinished tragedy on the fate of the Darien settlement, to songs, ballads, and comic tales. Many of these essays afterwards found their way to the press through the medium of the Edinburgh Magazine, as already mentioned. In this periodical miscellany appeared, from time to time, poetical translations from the Greek Anthology, from the Norse, from the Hebrew, from the Arabic, from the Syriac, from the Persian, and so forth, with many original pieces, indicating more genius than taste, and an extent of learning of most unusual dimensions. These were subscribed J. L.; and the author of this article well remembers how often his attention was attracted by them about the years 1793 and 1794, and the speculations which he formed respecting an author, who, by many indicia, appeared to belong to a part of Scotland with which he himself was well acquainted. About this time also Mr. Archibald Constable, whose enterprising and liberal conduct of business has since made his name so conspicuous as a publisher, was opening business chiefly as a retailer of curious and ancient books, a department in which he possessed extensive knowledge; Mr. Richard Heber, the extent of whose invaluable library is generally known, was, in the winter of 1799–1800, residing in Edinburgh, and a frequenter of course of Mr. Constable's shop, where he made many valuable acquisitions, at a rate very different from the exactions of the present day. In these researches he formed an acquaintance with Leyden, who examined, as an amateur, the shelves which Mr. Heber ransacked as a purchaser, and the latter discovered with pleasure the unknown author of the poems which I have already alluded to. The acquaintance soon ripened into friendship, and was cemented by mutual advantage. Mr. Heber had found an associate as ardent as himself in the pursuit of classical knowledge, and who would sit up night after night to collate editions, and to note various readings; and Leyden, besides the advantage and instruction which he derived from Mr. Heber's society, enjoyed that of being introduced, by his powerful recommendation, to the literary gentlemen of Edinburgh, with whom he lived in intimacy. Among these may be reckoned the late Lord Woodhouselee, Mr. Henry Mackenzie, the distinguished author of The Man of Feeling, and the Rev. Mr. Sidney Smith, then residing in Edinburgh, from all of whom Leyden received flattering attention, and many important testimonies of the interest which they took in his success. By the same introduction he became intimate in the family of Mr. Walter Scott, where a congenial taste for ballad, romance, and border antiquities, as well as a sincere admiration of Leyden's high talents, extensive knowledge, and excellent heart, secured him a welcome reception. And by degrees his society extended itself still more widely, and comprehended almost every one who was distinguished for taste or talents in Edinburgh.

The manners of Leyden, when he first entered the higher ranks of society, were very peculiar; nor indeed were they at any time much modified during his continuing in Europe; and here, perhaps, as properly as elsewhere, we may endeavour to give some idea of his personal appearance and deportment in company.

In his complexion the clear red upon the cheek indicated a hectic propensity, but with his brown hair, lively dark eyes, and well-proportioned features, gave an acute and interesting turn of expression to his whole countenance. He was of middle stature, of a frame rather thin than strong built, but muscular and active, and well fitted for all those athletic exertions, in which he delighted to be accounted a master. For he was no less anxious to be esteemed a man eminent for learning and literary talent, than to be held a fearless player at single-stick, a formidable boxer, and a distinguished adept at leaping, running, walking, climbing, and all exercises which depend on animal spirits and muscular exertion. Feats of this nature he used to detail with such liveliness as sometimes led his audience to charge him with exaggeration; but, unlike the athletic in Æsop's apologue, he was always ready to attempt the repetition of his great leap at Rhodes, were it at the peril of breaking his neck on the spot. And certainly in many cases his spirit and energy carried him through enterprises, which his friends considered as most rashly undertaken. An instance occurred on board of ship in India, where two gentlemen, by way of ridiculing Leyden's pretensions to agility, offered him a bet of sixty gold mohrs that he could not go aloft. Our bard instantly betook himself to the shrouds, and, at all the risk incident to a landman who first attempts such an ascent, successfully scaled the maintop. There it was intended to subject him to a usual practical sea joke, by seizing him up, i. e. tying him, till he should redeem himself by paying a fine. But the spirit of Leyden dictated desperate resistance, and, finding he was likely to be overpowered, he flung himself from the top, and, seizing a rope, precipitated himself on deck by letting it slide rapidly through his grasp. In this operation he lost the skin of both hands, but of course won his wager. But when he observed his friends look grave at the expensive turn which their jest had taken, he tore and flung into the sea the order for the money which they had given him, and contented himself with the triumph which his spirit and agility had gained. This little anecdote may illustrate his character in more respects than one.

In society, John Leyden's first appearance had something that revolted the fastidious and alarmed the delicate. He was a bold and uncompromising disputant, and neither subdued his tone, nor modified the form of his argument, out of deference to the rank, age, or even sex, of those with whom he was maintaining it. His voice, which was naturally loud and harsh, was on such occasions exaggerated into what he himself used to call his saw-tones, which were not very pleasant to the ear of strangers. His manner was animated, his movements abrupt, and the gestures with which he enforced his arguments rather forcible than elegant; so that, altogether, his first appearance was somewhat appalling to persons of low animal spirits, or shy and reserved habits, as well as to all who expected much reverence in society on account of the adventitious circumstances of rank or station. Besides, his spirits were generally at top-flood, and entirely occupied with what had last arrested his attention; and thus his own feats, or his own studies, were his topic more frequently than is consistent with the order of good company, in which every person has a right to expect his share of conversation. He was indeed too much bent on attaining personal distinction in society to choose nicely the mode of acquiring it. For example, in the course of a large evening party, crowded with fashionable people, to many of whom Leyden was an absolute stranger, silence being imposed for the purpose of a song, one of his friends with great astonishment, and some horror, heard Leyden, who could not sing a note, scream forth a verse or two of some border ditty, with all the dissonance of an Indian war-whoop. In their way home, his friend ventured to remonstrate with him on this extraordinary exhibition, to which his defence was, "Dash it, man, they would have thought I was afraid to sing before them." In short, his egotism, his bold assumption in society, his affectation of neglecting many of its forms as trifles beneath his notice, circumstances which often excited against his first appearance an undue and disproportionate prejudice, were entirely founded upon the resolution to support his independence, and to assert that character formed between the lettered scholar, and the wild rude borderer, the counterpart, as it were, of Anacharsis, the philosophic Scythian, which, from his infancy, he was ambitious of maintaining.

His humble origin was with him rather a subject of honest pride than of false shame, and he was internally not unwilling that his deportment should to a certain degree partake of the simplicity of the ranks from which he had raised himself by his talents, to bear a share in the first society. He boasted in retaining these marks of his birth, as the Persian tribe, when raised to the rank of kings and conquerors, still displayed as their banner the leathern apron of the smith who founded their dynasty. He bore, however, with great good-humour all decent railery on his rough manners, and was often ready to promote such pleasantry by his own example. When a lady of rank and fashion one evening insisted upon his dancing, he wrote next morning a lively poetical epistle to her in the character of a dancing bear. This was his usual mode of escaping or apologising for any besot which his high spirits and heedless habits might lead him to commit, and several very pretty copies of complimentary verses were a sort of peace-offerings for trivial encroachments upon the ceremonial of society.

Having thus marked strongly the defects of his manner, and the prejudice which they sometimes excited, we crave credit from the public, while we record the real virtues and merits by which they were atoned a thousand-fold. Leyden's apparent harshness of address covered a fund of real affection to his friends, and kindness to all with whom he mingled, unwearied in their service, and watchful to oblige them. To gratify the slightest wish of a friend, he would engage at once in the most toilsome and difficult researches, and when perhaps that friend had forgotten he ever intimated such a wish, Leyden came to pour down before him the fullest information on the subject which had excited his attention. And his temper was in reality, and notwithstanding an affectation of roughness, as gentle as it was generous. No one felt more deeply for the distress of those he loved. No one exhibited more disinterested pleasure in their success. In dispute, he never lost temper, and if he despised the outworks of ceremony, he never trespassed upon the essentials of good-breeding, and was himself the first to feel hurt and distressed if he conceived that he had, by any rash or hasty expression, injured the feelings of the most inconsiderable member of the company. In all the rough play of his argument too, he was strictly good-humoured, and was the first to laugh, if, as must happen occasionally to those who talk much, and upon every subject, some disputant of less extensive but more accurate information, contrived to arrest him in his very pitch of pride, by a home fact or incontrovertible argument. And, when his high and independent spirit, his firm and steady principles of religion and virtue, his constant good-humour, the extent and variety of his erudition, and the liveliness of his conversation, were considered, they must have been fastidious indeed who were not reconciled to the foibles or peculiarities of his tone and manner.

Many of those whose genius has raised them to distinction, have fallen into the fatal error of regarding their wit and talents as an excuse for the unlimited indulgence of their passions, and their biographers have too frequently to record the acts of extravagance, and habits of immorality, which disgraced and shortened their lives. From such crimes and follies John Leyden stood free and stainless. He was deeply impressed with the truths of Christianity, of which he was at all times a ready and ardent assertor, and his faith was attested by the purity of morals, which is its best earthly evidence. To the pleasures of the table he was totally indifferent, never exceeded the bounds of temperance in wine, though frequently in society where there was temptation to do so, and seemed hardly to enjoy any refreshment excepting tea, of which he sometimes drank very large quantities. When he was travelling or studying, his temperance became severe abstinence, and he often passed an entire day without any other food than a morsel of bread. To sleep he was equally indifferent, and when, during the latter part of his residence in Edinburgh, he frequently spent the day in company, he used, upon retiring home, to pursue his studies till a late hour in the morning, and satisfy himself with a very brief portion of repose. It was the opinion of his friends, that his strict temperance alone could have enabled him to follow so hard a course of reaching as he enjoined himself. His pecuniary resources were necessarily much limited; but he knew that independence, and the title of maintaining a free and uncontrolled demeanour in society, can only be attained by avoiding pecuniary embarrassments, and he managed his funds with such severe economy, that he seemed always at ease upon his very narrow income.

We have only another trait to add to his character as a member of society. With all his bluntness and peculiarity, and under disadvantages of birth and fortune, Leyden's reception among females of rank and elegance was favourable to a distinguished degree. Whether it is that the tact of the fair sex is finer than ours, or that they more readily pardon peculiarity in favour of originality, or that an uncommon address and manner is in itself a recommendation to their favour, or that they are not so readily offended as the male sex by a display of superior learning,—in short, whatever were the cause, it is certain that Leyden was a favourite among those whose favour all are ambitious to attain. Among the ladies of distinction who honoured him with their regard, it is sufficient to notice the late Duchess of Gordon, and Lady Charlotte Campbell, (now Bury,) who were then leaders of the fashionable society of Edinburgh. It is time to return to trace the brief events of his life.

In 1800, Leyden was ordained a preacher of the gospel, and entered upon the functions then conferred upon him, by preaching in several of the churches in Edinburgh and the neighbourhood. His style of pulpit oratory was marked with the same merits and faults which distinguish his poetry. His style was more striking than rhetorical, and his voice and gesture more violent than elegant; but his discourses were marked with strong traits of original genius, and although he pleaded an internal feeling of disappointment at being unequal to attain his own ideas of excellence as a preacher, it was impossible to listen to him without being convinced of his uncommon extent of learning, knowledge of ethics, and sincere zeal for the interest of religion.

The autumn of the same year was employed in a tour to the Highlands and Hebrides, in which Leyden accompanied two young foreigners who had studied at Edinburgh the preceding winter. In this tour he visited all the remarkable places of that interesting part of his native country, and diverging from the common and more commodious route, visited what are called the rough bounds of the Highlands, and investigated the decaying traditions of Celtic manners and story which are yet preserved in the wild districts of Moldart and Knoidart. The journal which he made on this occasion was a curious monument of his zeal and industry in these researches, and contained much valuable information on the subject of Highland manners and traditions, which is now probably lost to the public. It is remarkable, that after long and painful research in quest of original passages of the poems of Ossian, he adopted an opinion more favourable to their authenticity than has lately prevailed in the literary world. But the confessed infidelity of Macpherson must always excite the strongest suspicion on this subject. Leyden composed, with his usual facility, several detached poems upon Highland traditions, all of which have probably perished, excepting a ballad founded upon the romantic legend respecting Macphail of Colonsay and the Mermaid of Corrievrekin, inscribed to Lady Charlotte Campbell, and published in the third volume of the Border Minstrelsy, which appeared at the distance of about a twelvemonth after the two first volumes of that work. The opening of this ballad exhibits a power of numbers, which, for the mere melody of sound, has seldom been excelled in English poetry.* Nor were these legendary effusions the only fruit of his journey; for in his passage through Aberdeen, Leyden so far gained the friendship of the venerable Professor Beattie, that he obtained his permission to make a transcript from the only existing copy of the interesting poem entitled Albania. This work, which is a panegyric on Scotland, in nervous blank verse, written by an anonymous author in the beginning of the eighteenth century, Leyden afterwards republished along with Wilson's Clyde, under the title of Scottish Descriptive Poems, 12mo, 1802.

In 1801, when Mr. Lewis published his Tales of Wonder, Leyden was a contributor to that collection, and furnished the ballad called the Elf-King. And in the following year, he employed himself earnestly in the congenial task of procuring materials for the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, the first publication of the editor of that collection. In this labour he was equally interested by friendship for the editor, and by his own patriotic zeal for the honour of the Scottish Borders, and both may be judged of from the following circumstance. An interesting fragment had been obtained of an ancient historical ballad, but the remainder, to the great disturbance of the editor and his coadjutor, was not to be recovered. Two days afterwards, while the editor was sitting with some company after dinner, a sound was heard at a distance like that of the whistling of a tempest through the torn rigging of the vessel which scuds before it. The sounds increased as they approached more near, and Leyden (to the great astonishment of such of the guests as did not know him) burst into the room, chanting the desiderated ballad, with the most enthusiastic gesture, and all the energy of the saw-tones of his voice already commemorated. It turned out, that he had walked between forty and fifty miles, and back again, for the sole purpose of visiting an old person who possessed this precious remnant of antiquity. His antiquarian researches and poetic talents were also liberally exerted for the support of this undertaking. To the former, the reader owes in a great measure the Dissertation on Fairy Superstition, which, although arranged and digested by the editor, abounds with instances of such curious reading as Leyden alone had read, and was originally compiled by him: and to the latter the spirited ballads entitled Lord Soulis and the Court of Keeldar.

Leyden's next publication was The Complaynt of Scotland, a new edition of an ancient and singularly rare tract bearing that title, written by an uncertain author, about the year 1548. This curious work was published by Mr. Constable, in the year 1801. As the tract was itself of a diffuse and comprehensive nature, touching upon many unconnected topics, both of public policy and private life, as well as treating of the learning, the poetry, the music, and the arts of that early period, it gave Leyden an opportunity of pouring forth such a profusion of antiquarian knowledge in the Preliminary Dissertation, Notes, and Glossary, as one would have thought could hardly have been accumulated during so short a life, dedicated, too, to so many and varied studies. The intimate acquaintance which he has displayed with Scottish antiquities of every kind, from manuscript histories and rare chronicles down to the tradition of the peasant, and the rhymes even of the nursery, evince an extent of research, power of arrangement, and facility of recollection, which has never been equalled in this department.

This singular work was the means of introducing Leyden to the notice and correspondence of Mr. Ritson, the celebrated antiquary, who, in a journey to Scotland, during the next summer, found nothing which delighted him so much as the conversation of the editor of the Complaynt of Scotland, in whose favour he smoothed down and softened the natural asperity of his own disposition. The friendship, however, between these two authors was broken off by Leyden's running his Border hobby-horse a full tilt against the Pythagorean palfrey of the English antiquary. Ritson, it must be well remembered, had written a work against the use of animal food; Leyden, on the other hand, maintained it was a part of a masculine character to eat whatever came to hand, whether the substance was vegetable or animal, cooked or uncooked; and he concluded a tirade to this purpose, by eating a raw beef-steak before the terrified antiquary, who never afterwards could be prevailed upon to regard him, except as a kind of learned Ogre. This breach, however, did not happen till they met in London, previous to Leyden's leaving Britain.

Meanwhile other pursuits were not abandoned in the study of Scottish antiquities. The Edinburgh Magazine was united in 1802 with the old Scots Magazine, and was now put under the management of Leyden by Mr. Constable the publisher. To this publication, during the period of his management, which was about five or six months, he contributed several occasional pieces of prose and poetry, in all of which he was successful, excepting in those where humour was required, which talent, notwithstanding his unvaried hilarity of temper, Leyden did not possess. He was also, during this year, engaged with his Scenes of Infancy, a poem which was afterwards published on the eve of his leaving Britain, and in which he has interwoven his own early feelings and recollections with the description and traditional history of his native vale of Teviot. His individual partiality may be also traced in this interesting poem. Cavers and Denholm, the scenes of his childhood, and Hardou, formerly the seat of an ancient family from which one of his friends is descended, detain him with particular fondness. The poem was composed at different intervals, and much altered before publication. In particular, as it was originally written, the right or southern side of the Teviot was first surveyed, ere the poet took notice of the streams and scenery of the northern banks. A friend objected, that this arrangement was rather geographical than poetical, upon which Leyden new-modelled the whole poem, and introduced the subjects in their natural order, as they would occur to the traveller who should trace the river from its source to its junction with the Tweed. It is another remarkable circumstance, that the author has interwoven in this poem many passages which were originally either fragments or parts of essays upon very different subjects. This will in some degree account for the similes, in particular, not being always such as the subject seems naturally to suggest, but rather calculated to distract the attention, by hurrying it from the vale of Teviot to distant countries, to Africa, to India, and to America, to the palaces of Gondar, and the enchanted halls of the Caliph Vathek. Indeed, as Leyden's reading was at all times somewhat ostentatiously displayed, so in his poetry he was sometimes a little too ambitious in introducing scientific allusions or terms of art, which embarrassed instead of exalting the simplicity of his descriptions. But when he is contented with a pure and natural tone of feeling and expression, his poetical powers claim the admiration and sympathy of every reader.

The friends of Leyden began now to be anxious for his permanent settlement in life. He had been for two years in orders, and there was every reason to hope that he might soon obtain a church, through the numerous friends and powerful interest which he now possessed. More than one nobleman of high rank expressed a wish to serve him, should any church in their gift become vacant; and from the recommendation of other friends to those possessed of political interest, he was almost assured of being provided for, by a crown prescution, on some early opportunity. But his eager desire of travelling, and of extending the bounds of literary and geographical knowledge, had become, as he expressed himself to an intimate friend, "his thought by day and his dream by night, and the discoveries of Mungo Park haunted his very slumbers." When the risk was objected to him, he used to answer in the phrase of Ossian, "Dark Cuchullin will be renowned or dead," and it became hopeless to think that this eager and aspiring spirit could be confined within the narrow sphere, and limited to the humble, though useful, duties of a country clergyman.

It was therefore now the wish of his friends to turn this irresistible thirst for discovery into some channel which might at once gratify the predominant desire of his heart, and be attended with some prospect of securing his fortune. It was full time to take such steps; for in 1802 Leyden had actually commenced overtures to the African Society, for undertaking a journey of discovery through the interior of that continent; an enterprise which sad examples had shown to be little better than an act of absolute suicide. To divert his mind from this desperate project, a representation was made to the Right Hon. William Dundas, who had then a seat at the Board of Control, stating the talents and disposition of Leyden, and it was suggested that such a person might be usefully employed in investigating the language and learning of the Indian tribes. Mr. Dundas entered with the most liberal alacrity into these views; but it happened, unfortunately as it might seem, that the sole appointment then at his disposal was that of surgeon's assistant, which could only be held by a person who had taken a surgical degree, and could sustain an examination before the Medical Board at the India House.

It was upon this occasion that Leyden showed, in their utmost extent, his wonderful powers of application and comprehension. He at once intimated his readiness to accept the appointment under the conditions annexed to it; and availing himself of the superficial information he had formerly acquired by a casual attendance upon one or two of the medical classes, he gave his whole mind to the study of medicine and surgery, with the purpose of qualifying himself for his degree in the short space of five or six months. The labour which he underwent on this occasion was actually incredible; but with the powerful assistance of a gentleman of the highest eminence in his profession, (the late Mr. John Bell of Edinburgh,) he succeeded in acquiring such a knowledge of this complicated and most difficult art, as enabled him to obtain his diploma as surgeon with credit, even in the city of Edinburgh, so long famed for its medical school, and for the wholesome rigour adopted in the distribution of degrees. Leyden was, however, incautious in boasting of his success after so short a course of study, and found himself obliged, in consequence of his imprudence, to relinquish his intention of taking out the degree of M. D. at Edinburgh, and to have recourse to another Scottish University for that step in his profession. Meanwhile the sudden change of his profession gave great amusement to some of his friends, especially when a lady having fainted in a crowded assembly, Dr. Leyden advanced to her assistance, and went through the usual routine of treatment with all the gravity which becomed his new faculty. In truth, the immediate object of his studies was always, in season and out of season, predominant in Leyden's mind; and just about this time, he went to the evening party of a lady of the highest rank with the remnants of a human hand in his pocket, which he had been dissecting in the morning, and on some question being stirred about the muscular action, he was with difficulty withheld from producing this grisly evidence in support of the argument which he maintained. The character of Leyden cannot be understood without mentioning these circumstances that are allied to oddity; but it is not so easy to body forth those qualities of energy, application, and intelligence, by which he dignified his extravagances, and vindicated his assumption of merit, far less to paint his manly, generous and friendly disposition.

In December 1802, Leyden was summoned to join the Christmas fleet of Indiamen, in consequence of his appointment as assistant surgeon on the Madras establishment. It was sufficiently understood that his medical character was only assumed to bring him within the compass of Mr. Dundas's patronage, and that his talents should be employed in India with reference to his literary researches. He was, however, pro forma, nominated to the Madras hospital. While awaiting this call, he bent his whole energies to the study of the Oriental languages, and amused his hours of leisure by adding to the Scenes of Infancy, many of those passages addressed to his friends, and bearing a particular reference to his own situation on the eve of departure from Scotland; which, flowing warm from the heart, constitute the principal charm of that impressive poem. Mr. Ballantyne, of Kelso, an early and intimate friend of Leyden, had just then established in Edinburgh his press, which has since been so distinguished. To the critical skill of a valued and learned friend, and to the friendly, as well as professional care of Mr. Ballantyne, Leyden committed this last memorial of his love to his native land. The last sheets reached him before he left Britain, no more to return.

Upon examining these, it would appear that he imagined his critical friends had exercised, with more rigour than mercy, the prerogative of retrenchment with which he had invested them. He complains of these alterations in a letter, which is no bad picture of his manner in conversation. It is dated from the Isle of Wight, where he states himself to be "like a weathercock, veering about with every wind," expecting and hoping every moment when the boatwain's whistle should pipe all hands on board, and that he may be off from the old island for ever in fifteen minutes. "I fancy," he continues, "you expect to receive a wagon-load, at least, of thanks for your mid-wife skill, in swaddling my bantling so tight, that I fear it will be strangled in the growth ever after. On the contrary, I have in my own mind been triumphing famously over you, and your razor witted, hair-splitting, intellectual associate, whose tastes I do not pretend to think any thing like equal to my own, though, before I left Scotland, I thought them amazingly acute; but I fancy there is something in a London atmosphere, which greatly brightens the understanding, and furbishes the taste. This is all the vengeance you have unfortunately left in my power, for I sincerely am of opinion, that you ought to have adopted the alterations in the first sheet, which I think most indubitably better than those you have retained. The verses you excluded were certainly the most original in all the second canto, and certainly the next best to the Spectre Ship, in the whole poem; and I defy you and —, and the whole Edinburgh Review, to impeach their originality. And what is more, they contained the winding-sheet of the dead child, wet with a mother's roping tears, which was the very idea for the sake of which I wrote the whole episode; so you have certainly what I liked, and left what I did not care a sixpence about, for I would not have been half so enraged, if you had omitted the whole episode; and what is most provoking of all, you expect the approbation of every man of taste for this butchery, this mangling and botching! By Apollo, if I knew of any man of taste that approved of it, I would cut his tongue out. But my only revenge is to triumph over your bad tastes. When — showed me this part, I tore the sheet in wrath, and swore I would have a Calcutta edition, for the mere purpose of exposing your spurious one. But you need not mind much his critical observations. He is a sensible fellow, points very well, understands music, has a fine taste for ornamenting, and perhaps for printing, but he has too fat brains for originality. Now, my dear Ballantyne, though I lift up my voice like a trumpet against your bad taste in criticism, yet I give you all due credit for good intentions, and my warmest thanks for the trouble you have taken, only do not talk of men of taste approving of your vile critical razors—razors of sacrificed! Now, my dear fellow, farewell; commend me warmly to your good motherly mother, and your brothers. I shall be happy to hear of you, and from you, in my exile, and believe me, my dear Ballantyne, to be

Yours, most sincerely,
JOHN LEYDEN."

About the middle of December 1802, John Leyden left Edinburgh, but not exactly at the time he had proposed. He had taken a solemn farewell of his friends, and gone to Roxburghshire to bid adieu to his parents, whom he regarded with the most tender filial affection, and from thence he intended to have taken his departure for London without returning to Edinburgh. Some accident changed his purpose, and his unexpected arrival at Edinburgh was picturesque, and somewhat startling. A party of his friends had met in the evening to talk over his merits, and to drink, in Scottish phrase, his Bonnie. While, about the witching hour, they were crowning a solemn bumper to his health, a figure burst into the room, muffled in a seaman's cloak and travelling cap, covered with snow, and distinguishable only by the sharpness and ardour of the tone with which he exclaimed, "Dash it, boys, here I am again!" The start of astonishment and delight with which this unexpected apparition was received, was subject of great mirth at the time, and the circumstance has been since recalled by most of the party with that mixture of pleasure and melancholy, which attaches to the particulars of a last meeting with a beloved and valued friend.

In London, the kindness of Mr. Heber, his own reputation, and the recommendation of his Edinburgh friends, procured Leyden much kindness and attention among persons of rank and literary distinction. His chief protector and friend, however, was Mr. George Ellis, the well known author of the Specimens of Ancient English Poetry. To this gentleman he owed an obligation of the highest possible value, which we shall give in his own words, in a letter to a friend in Edinburgh, dated 13th January 1803, from which it appears that a disorder, produced by over intense study and anxiety of mind, joined to the friendly intervention of Mr. Ellis, prevented his sharing, in all probability, the fate of other passengers on board the Hindostan, to which unfortunate ship he was originally destined, and which was cast away going down the river.

"You will no doubt be surprised at my silence, and indeed I cannot account for it myself; but I write you now from the lobby of the East India House, to inform you that G. Ellis has saved my life, for, without his interference, I should certainly, this precious day, have been snug in Davy's locker. At my arrival in town, or rather on my journey, I was seized with violent cramps in my stomach, the consequence of my excessive exertion before leaving Scotland, a part of which you know, and a greater part you do not know. The clerks of the India House, who, I suppose, never had the cramp of the stomach in their life, paid no kind of respect to this whatever, but with the most remorseless sang froid told me either to proceed to the Downs, or to vacate the appointment. Neither of these alternatives were much to my taste, especially as I found that getting on board at the Downs would cost me at least £50 or £60 sterling, which I imagined, unlike the bread cast upon the water, would not return even after many days. I, however, passed the principal forms, and was examined by Dr. Hunter on the diseases of warm climates, with tolerable success, but most intolerable anguish, till I contrived to aggravate my distemper so much from pure fatigue and chagrin, and dodging attendance at the India House from ten till four every day, that Dr. Hunter obstinately confined me to my room for two days. These cursed clerks, however, whose laws are like those of the Medes and Persians, though I sincerely believe there is not one of them who has the slightest particle of taste for either Arabic or Persian, not to speak of Sanscrit or Tamalic, made out my appointment and order to sail in the Hindostan, without the slightest attention to this circumstance, and I dare say they would not have been moved had I written and addressed to them the finest ode ever written in Sanscrit, even though it had been superior to those of the sublime Jayadeva. Heber was in Paris, and every person with whom I had the slightest influence out of town; and Ellis, even in the distressed state of his family, as Lady Parker is just dying, and several others dangerously unwell of his relations, was my only resource. That resource, however, succeeded, and I have just got permission to go in the Hugh Inglis to Madras, and am at the same time informed, that the Hindostan, which I ought to have joined yesterday morning, was wrecked going down the river, and one of the clerks whispered me that a great many passengers have been drowned. About fifty persons have perished. So you see there is some virtue in the old proverb, 'He that is born to be hanged,' &c. I feel a strange mixture of solemnity and satisfaction, and begin to trust my fortune more than ever."

After this providential exchange of destination, the delay of the vessel to which he was transferred, permitted his residence in London until the beginning of April 1803, an interval which he spent in availing himself of the opportunities which he now enjoyed, of mixing in the most distinguished society in the metropolis, where the novelty and good humour of his character made ample amends for the native bluntness of his manners. In the beginning of April, he sailed from Portsmouth in the Hugh Inglis, where he had the advantage of being on board the same vessel with Mr. Robert Smith, the brother of his steady friend, the Rev. Mr. Sidney Smith. And thus set forth on his voyage, perhaps the first British traveller that ever sought India, moved neither by the love of wealth nor of power, and who, despising alike the luxuries commanded by the one, and the pomp attached to the other, was guided solely by the wish of extending our knowledge of oriental literature, and distinguishing himself as its most successful cultivator. This pursuit he urged through health and through sickness, unshaken by all the difficulties arising from imperfect communication with the natives, from their prejudices, and those of their European masters, and from frequent change of residence; and unmoved either by the charms of pleasure, of wealth, or of that seducing indolence to which many men of literature have yielded, after overcoming all other impediments. And to this pursuit he finally fell a sacrifice, as devoted a martyr in the cause of science as ever died in that of religion. We are unable to trace his Indian researches and travels with accuracy similar to that with which we have followed those which preceded his departure from Europe, but we are enabled to state the following outlines of his fortune in the east.

After a mutiny in the vessel, which was subdued by the exertions of the officers and passengers, and in which Leyden distinguished himself by his coolness and intrepidity, the Hugh Inglis arrived at Madras, and he was transferred to the duties of his new profession. His nomination as surgeon to the commissioners appointed to survey the ceded districts, seemed to promise ample opportunities for the cultivation of oriental learning. But his health gave way under the fatigues of the climate; and he has pathetically recorded, in his "Address to an Indian Gold Coin," the inroads which were made on his spirits and constitution. He was obliged to leave the presidency of Madras, suffering an accumulation of diseases, and reached, with difficulty, Prince of Wales Island. During the passage, the vessel was chased by a French privateer, which was the occasion of Leyden's composing, in his best style of border enthusiasm, an "Ode to a Malay Cris," or dagger, the only weapon which his reduced strength now admitted of his wielding. The following letter to Mr. Ballantyne, dated from Prince of Wales Island, 24th October, 1805, gives a lively and interesting account of his occupations during the first two years of his residence in India.

"Puloo Penang, October 24, 1805.

"MY DEAR BALLANTYNE,—Finding an extra Indian, the Revenge, which has put into this harbour in distress, bound to Europe, I take another opportunity of attempting to revive, or rather commence, an intercourse with my European friends, for since my arrival in India I have not received a single scrap from one of them,—Proh Deum! Mr. Constable excepted; and my friend Erskine writes me from Bombay, that none of you have received the least intelligence of my motions since I left Europe. This is to me utterly astonishing and incomprehensible, considering the multitude of letters and parcels that I have despatched from Mysore, especially during my confinement for the liver disease at Seringapatam, where I had for several months the honour of inhabiting the place of Tipoo's prime minister. I descended into Malabar in the beginning of May, in order to proceed to Bombay, and perhaps eventually up the Persian Gulf as far as Bassorah, in order to try the effect of a sea voyage. I was, however, too late, and the rains had set in, and the last vessels sailed two or three days before my arrival. As I am always a very lucky fellow, as well as an unlucky one, which all the world knows, it so fell out that the only vessel which sailed after my arrival was wrecked, while some secret presentiment, or rather 'sweet little cherub, that sits up aloft,' prevented my embarking on board of her. I journeyed leisurely down to Calicut from Cananore, intending to pay my respects to the cutwall, and the admiral, so famous in the Lusiad of Camoens; but only think of my disappointment when I found that the times are altered, and the tables turned with respect to both these sublime characters. The cutwall is only a species of borough-bailiff, while the admiral, God help him, is only the chief of the fishermen. From Calicut I proceeded to Paulgancherry, which signifies, in the Tamal language, 'the town of the forest of palms,' which is exactly the meaning of Tadmor, the name of a city founded by Solomon, not for the queen of Sheba, but, as it happened, for the equally famous Queen Zenobia. Thus having demonstrated that Solomon understood the Tamal language, we may proceed to construct a syllogism in the following manner: 'Solomon understood the Tamal language, and he was wise,—I understand the Tamal language, therefore I am as wise as Solomon!' I fear you logical lads of Europe will be very little disposed to admit the legitimacy of the conclusion; but, however the matter may stand in Europe, I can assure you it's no bad reasoning for India. At Paulgancherry I had a most terrible attack of the liver, and should very probably have passed away, or, as the Indians say, changed my climate—an elegant periphrasis for dying however—had I not obstinately resolved on living to have the pleasure of being revenged on all of you for your obstinate silence, and perseverance therein to the end. Hearing about the middle of August, that a Bombay cruiser had touched at Aleppo, between Quilon and Cochin, I made a desperate push through the jungles of the Cochin rajah's country, in order to reach her, and arrived about three hours after she had set sail. Any body else would have died of chagrin, if they had not hanged themselves outright. I did neither one nor the other, but 'tuned my pipes and played a spring to John o' Badenyon,' after which I set myself coolly down and translated the famous Jewish tablets of brass, preserved in the synagogue of Cochin ever since the days of Methusalem. Probably you may think this no more difficult a task than deciphering the brazen tablet on any door of Prince's or Queen's street. But here I beg your pardon; for, so far from any body, Jew, Pagan, or Christian, having ever been able to do this before, I assure you the most learned men of the world have never been able to decide in what language or in what alphabet they were written. As the character has for a long time been supposed to be antediluvian, it has for a long time been as much despised of as the Egyptian hieroglyphics. So much was the diwan or grand vizier, if you like it, astonished at the circumstance, that he gave me to understand that I had only to pass through the sacred cow in order to merit adoption into the holy order of Bramins. I was forced, however, to decline the honour of the sacred cow, for unluckily Phalaris' bull, and Moses' calf, presented themselves to my imagination, and it occurred to me that perhaps the ram-rajah's cow might be a beast of the breed. Being on the eve of a new attack of the liver, I was forced to leave Travancore with great precipitation, in the first vessel that presented itself, which, as the devil would have it, was a Mapilla brig, bound to Puloo Penang, the newly erected presidency on the Straits of Malacca, where I have just arrived, after a perverse pestilent voyage, in which I have been terribly ill of revulsions of bile and liver, without any of the conveniences which are almost necessary to a European in these parts, and particularly to an invalid. We have had a very rough passage, the cabin very often all afloat, while I have been several times completely drenched. In addition to this, we have been pursued by a Frenchman, and kept in a constant state of alarm and agitation; and now, to mend the matter, I am writing you at a kind of naval tavern, while all around me is ringing with the vociferation of tarpaulins, the hoarse bawling of sea oaths, and the rattling of the dice box. However, I flatter myself I have received considerable benefit from the voyage, tedious and disgusting and vexatious as it has been. Thank God, my dear fellow, that you have nothing to do with tedious, tiresome, semi-savages, who have no idea of the value of time whatsoever, and who will dispute even more keenly about a matter of no importance whatsoever, than one that deserved the highest consideration. Not knowing where to begin or where to end, I have said nothing of my previous rambles and traverses in Mysore, or elsewhere; of course, if nobody has heard from me at all, all my proceedings must be completely a riddle. But I beg and request you to consider, that all this is utterly out of my power to prevent, if nobody whatsoever will condescend to take the trouble of writing me; for how, in the name of the great eternal devil, is it possible for me to divine which of my letters arrive at their destination, and which do not? I have now despatched for Europe exactly fifty-seven letters. I had intended to make a dead pause after the fiftieth, for at least a couple of years, and wrote Erskine to that effect; when he informed me in return, that he had the utmost reason to think nobody had ever heard from me at all, not only since I arrived in India, but for some time before leaving London. Utterly amazed, astonished, and confounded at this, I have resolved to write out the hundred complete; and if none of my centenary brings me an answer, why then farewell, till we meet in either heaven or hell! I write no more, except in crooked characters, and this I swear by all petty oaths that are not dangerous.

"Now, my friend, the situation in which I am placed by this most pestiferous silence is extremely odd and perplexing. I am actually afraid to enquire for any body, lest it should turn out that they have for a long time been dead, damned, and strangled. It is all in vain that I search for every obituary, and peruse it with the utmost care, anxiety, and terror. There are many of you good Scotch folks that love to slip slyly out of the world, like a knotless thread, without ever getting into any obituary at all, and, besides it is always very nearly a couple of years before any review, magazine, or obituary, reaches the remote, and almost inaccessible regions in which my lot has been long cast. To remedy a few of these inconveniences, I propose taking a short trip to Bengal, as soon as I have seen how the climate of Puloo Penang agrees with my health, and, as in that region they are generally better informed with regard to all European matters, and better provided with reviews, magazines, and newspapers, I shall probably be able to discover that a good many of you have gone 'to kingdom come,' since I bade adieu to 'Auld Reekie.' But methinks I see you, with your confounded black beard, bull neck, and upper lip turned up to your nose, while one of your eyebrows is cocked up perpendicularly, and the other forms pretty well the base of a right-angled triangle, opening your great glowing eyes, and crying, 'But, Leyden!!!! tell me!!! what the devil you have been doing all this time!—eh!!' 'Why, Ballantyne, d'ye see, mark and observe and take heed—as you are a good fellow, and don't spout secrets in public places, I trust I can give you satisfaction safely.'

"When I arrived in Madras, I first of all reconnoitred my ground, when I perceived that the public men fell naturally into two divisions. The mercantile party, consisting chiefly of men of old standing, versed in trade, and inspired with a spirit in no respect superior to that of the most pitiful pettifogging pedler, nor in their views a whit more enlarged; in short, men whose sole occupation is to make money, and who have no name for such phrases as national honour, public spirit, or patriotism; men, in short, who would sell their own honour, or their country's credit, to the highest bidder, without a shadow of scruple. What is more unfortunate, this is the party that stands highest in credit with the East India Company. There is another party, for whom I am more at a loss to find an epithet. They cannot with propriety be termed the anti-mercantile party, as they have the interests of our national commerce more at heart than the others; but they have discovered that we are not merely merchants in India, but legislators and governors; and they assert, that our conduct there ought to be calculated for stability and security, and equally marked by a wise internal administration of justice, financial and political economy, and by a vigilant, firm, and steady system of external politics. This class is represented by the first, as only actuated by the spirit of innovation, and tending to embroil us everywhere in India. Its members consist of men of the first abilities, as well as principles, that have been draughted from the common professional routine, for difficult or dangerous service. I fancy this division applies as much to Bombay and Bengal as to Madras. As to the members of my own profession, I found them in a state of complete depression; so much so, that the commander in chief had assumed all the powers of the Medical Board, over whom a court martial was at that very time impending. The medical line had been, from time immemorial, shut out from every appointment, except professional, and the emoluments of these had been greatly diminished just before my arrival. In this situation I found it very difficult at first what to resolve on. I saw clearly that there were only two routes in a person's choice; first, to sink into a mere professional drudge, and, by strict economy, endeavour to collect a few thousand pounds in the course of twenty years; or, secondly, to aspire a little beyond it, and by a superior knowledge of India, its laws, relations, politics, and languages, to claim a situation somewhat more respectable, in addition to those of the line itself. You know, when I left Scotland, I had determined, at all events, to become a furious orientalist, nemini secundus, but I was not aware of the difficulty. I found the expense of native teachers would prove almost insurmountable to a mere assistant surgeon, whose pay is seldom equal to his absolutely necessary expenses; and, besides, that it was necessary to form a library of MSS. at a most terrible expense, in every language to which I should apply, if I intended to proceed beyond a mere smattering. After much consideration, I determined on this plan at all events, and was fortunate enough, in a few months, to secure an appointment, which furnished me with the means of doing so, though the tasks and exertions it imposed on me were a good deal more arduous than the common duties of a surgeon even in a Mahratta campaign. I was appointed medical assistant to the Mysore Survey, and at the same time directed to carry on enquiries concerning the natural history of the country, and the manners and languages, &c. of the natives of Mysore. This, you would imagine, was the very situation I wished for; and so it would, had I previously had time to acquire the country languages. But I had them now to acquire after severe marches and countermarches in the heat of the sun, night marches and day marches, and amid the disgusting details of a field hospital, the duties of which were considerably arduous. However, I wrought incessantly and steadily, and without being discouraged by any kind of difficulty, till my health absolutely gave way, and when I could keep the field no longer, I wrought on my couch, as I generally do still, though I am much better than I have been. As I had the assistance of no intelligent European, I was obliged long to grope my way; but I have now acquired a pretty correct idea of India in all its departments, which increases in geometrical progression as I advance in the languages. The languages that have attracted my attention since my arrival have been Arabic, Persian, Hindostani, Mahratta, Tamal, Telinga, Canara, Sanscrit, Malayalam, Malay, and Armonian. You will be ready to ask, where the devil I picked up these hard names, but I assure you it is infinitely more difficult to pick up the languages themselves; several of which include dialects as different from each other as French or Italian from Spanish or Portuguese; and in all these, I flatter myself I have made considerable progress. What would you say were I to add the Maldivian and Mapella languages to these? Besides, I have deciphered the inscriptions of Mavalipoorani, which were written in an ancient Canara character, which had hitherto defied all attempts at understanding it, and also several Lada Lippi inscriptions, which is an ancient Tamal dialect and character, in addition to the Jewish tablets of Cochin, which were in the ancient Malayalam, generally termed Malabar. I enter into these details merely to show you that I have not been idle, and that my time has neither been dissipated, nor devoid of plan, though that plan is not sufficiently unfolded. To what I have told you of, you are to add constant and necessary exposure to the sun, damps and dews from the jungles, and putrid exhalation of marshes, before I had been properly accustomed to the climate, constant rambling in the haunts of tigers, leopards, bears, and serpents of thirty or forty feet long, that make nothing of swallowing a buffalo, by way of demonstrating their appetite in a morning, together with smaller and more dangerous snakes, whose haunts are perilous, and bite deadly; and you have a faint idea of a situation, in which, with health, I lived as happy as the day was long. It was occasionally diversified with rapid jaunts of a hundred miles or so, as fast as horses or bearers could carry me, by night or day, swimming through rivers, afloat in an old brass kettle at midnight! O! I could tell you adventures to outrival the witch of Endor, or any witch that ever swam in egg shell or sieve; but you would undoubtedly imagine I wanted to impose on you were I to relate what I have seen and passed through. No! I certainly shall never repent of having come to India. It has awakened energies in me that I scarcely imagined I possessed, though I could gnaw my living nails with pure vexation to think how much I have been thwarted by indisposition. If, however, I get over it, I shall think the better of my constitution as long as I live. It is not every constitution that can resist the combined attack of liver, spleen, bloody flux, and jungle fever, which is very much akin to the plague of Egypt, and yellow fever of America. It is true, I have been five times given up by the most skilful physicians in these parts; but in spite of that, I am firmly convinced that 'my doom is not to die this day,' and that you shall see me emerge from this tribulation like gold purified by the fire; and when that happens, egad I may boast that I have been refined by the very same menstruum too, even the universal solvent mercury, which is almost the only cure for the liver, though I have been obliged to try another, and make an issue in my right side. Now pray, my dear Ballantyne, if this ever comes to hand, instantly sit down, and write me a letter a mile long, and tell me of all our common friends; and if you see any of them that have the least spark of friendly recollection, assure them how vexatious their silence is, and how very unjust, if they have received my letters; and, lest I should forget, I shall add, that you must direct to me, to the care of Messrs. Binnie and Dennison, Madras, who are my agents, and generally know in what part of this hemisphere I am to be found. But, particularly, you are to commend me kindly to your good motherly mother, and tell her I wish I saw her oftener, and then to your brother Alexander, and request him sometimes, on a Saturday night, precisely at eight o'clock, for my sake to play 'Gingling Johnnie' on his flageolet. If I had you both in my tent, you should drink yourselves drunk with wine of Shiraz, which is our eastern Falernian, in honour of Hafez, our Persian Anacreon. As for me, I often drink your health in water, (ohon a ree!) having long abandoned both wine and animal food, not from choice, but dire necessity. Adieu, dear Ballantyne, and believe me, in the Malay isle, to be ever yours sincerely,

JOHN LEYDEN."

Leyden became soon reconciled to Puloo Penang (or Prince of Wales Island), where he found many valuable friends, and enjoyed the regard of the late Philip Dundas, Esq. then governor of the island. He resided in that island for some time, and visited Achi, with some other places on the coasts of Sumatra and the Malay peninsula. Here he amassed the curious information concerning the language, literature, and descent of the Indi-Chinese tribes, which afterwards enabled him to lay before the Asiatic Society at Calcutta a most valuable dissertation on so obscure a subject. Yet that his heart was sad, and his spirits depressed, is evident from the following lines, written for New Year's Day, 1806, and which appeared in the Government Gazette of Prince of Wales Island:—

Malay's woods and mountains ring
With voices strange and sad to hear,
And dark unbodied spirits sing
The dirge of the departed year.

Lo! now, methinks, in tones sublime,
As viewless o'er our heads they bend,
They whisper, "Thus we steal your time,
Weak mortals, till your days shall end."

Then wake the dance, and wake the song,
Resound the stive mirth and glee;
Alas! the days have pass'd along,
The days we never more shall see.

But let me brush the nightly dews,
Beside the shell-depainted shore,
And mid the sea-weed sit to muse,
On days that shall return no more.

Olivia, ah! forgive the bard,
If sprightly strains alone are dear;
His notes are sad, for he has heard
The footsteps of the parting year.

Mid friends of youth beloved in vain,
Oft have I hail'd the jocund day,
If pleasure brought a thought of pain,
I charm'd it with a passing lay.

Friends of my youth for ever dear,
Where are you from this bosom fled?
A lonely man I linger here,
Like one that has been long time dead.

Foredoom'd to seek an early tomb,
For whom the pallid grave-flowers blow;
I hasten on my destined doom,
And sternly mock at joy or woe!

In 1806 he took leave of Penang, regretted by many friends, whom his eccentricities amused, his talents enlightened, and his virtues conciliated. His reception at Calcutta, and the effect which he produced upon society there, are so admirably illustrated by his ingenious and well-known countryman, General Sir John Malcolm, that it would be impossible to present a more living picture of his manners and mind; and the reader will pardon some repetition, for the sake of observing how the same individual was regarded in two distant hemispheres.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE BOMBAY COURIER.

"Sir,—I enclose some lines,* which have no value but what they derive from the subject. They are an unworthy but sincere tribute, to one whom I have long regarded with sentiments of esteem and affection, and whose loss I regret with the most unfeigned sorrow. It will remain with those who are better qualified than I am to do justice to the memory of Dr. Leyden. I only know that he rose, by the power of native genius, from the humblest origin to a very distinguished rank in the literary world. His studies included almost every branch of human science, and he was alike ardent in the pursuit of all. The greatest power of his mind was perhaps shown in his acquisition of modern and ancient languages. He exhibited an unexampled facility, not merely in acquiring them, but in tracing their affinity and connection with each other, and from that talent, combined with his taste and general knowledge, we had a right to expect, from what he did in a very few years, that he would, if he had lived, have thrown the greatest light upon the more abstruse parts of the history of the east. In this curious, but intricate and rugged path, we cannot hope to see his equal.

"Dr. Leyden had, from his earliest years, cultivated the muses, with a success which will make many regret that poetry did not occupy a larger portion of his time. The first of his essays which appeared in a separate form, was The Scenes of Infancy, a descriptive poem, in which he sung, in no unpleasing strains, the charms of his native mountains and streams in Teviotdale. He contributed several small pieces to that collection of poems called the Minstrelsy of the Scottish Border, which he published with his friend, Walter Scott. Among these, the Mermaid is certainly the most beautiful. In it he has shown all the creative fancy of a real genius. His Ode on the Death of Nelson is, undoubtedly, the best of those poetical effusions that he has published since he came to India. The following apostrophe to the blood of that hero has a sublimity of thought, and happiness of expression, which never could have been attained but by a true poet:—

'Blood of the brave, thou art not lost,
Amid the waste of waters blue;
The tide that rolls to Albion's coast
Shall proudly boast its sanguine hue:

'And thou shalt be the vernal dew
To foster valour's daring seed;
The generous plant shall still its stock renew,
And hosts of heroes rise when one shall bleed.'

"It is pleasing to find him, on whom nature has bestowed eminent genius, possessed of those more essential and intrinsic qualities which give the truest excellence to the human character. The manners of Dr. Leyden were uncourtly, more perhaps from his detestation of the vices too generally attendant on refinement, and a wish (indulged to excess from his youth) to keep at a marked distance from them, than from any ignorance of the rules of good breeding. He was fond of talking, his voice was loud, and had little or no modulation, and he spoke in the provincial dialect of his native country; it cannot be surprising, therefore, that even his information and knowledge, when so conveyed, should be felt by a number of his hearers as unpleasant, if not oppressive. But with all these disadvantages (and they were great) the admiration and esteem in which he was always held by those who could appreciate his qualities, became general wherever he was long known; they, even, who could not understand the value of his knowledge, loved his virtues. Though he was distinguished by his love of liberty, and almost haughty independence, his ardent feelings and proud genius never led him into any licentious or extravagant speculation on political subjects. He never solicited favour, but he was raised by the liberal discernment of his noble friend and patron Lord Minto, to situations that afforded him an opportunity of showing that he was as scrupulous and as inflexibly virtuous in the discharge of his public duties, as he was attentive in private life to the duties of morality and religion.

"It is not easy to convey an idea of the method which Dr. Leyden used in his studies, or to describe the unconquerable ardour with which these were pursued. During his early residence in India, I had a particular opportunity of observing both. When he read a lesson in Persian, a person near him, whom he had taught, wrote down each word on a long slip of paper, which was afterwards divided into as many pieces as there were words, and pasted in alphabetical order, under different heads of verbs, nouns, &c. into a blank book that formed a vocabulary of each day's lesson. All this he had in a few hours instructed a very ignorant native to do; and this man he used, in his broad accent, to call 'one of his mechanical aids.' He was so ill at Mysore, soon after his arrival from England, that Mr. Anderson, the surgeon who attended him, despaired of his life; but though all his friends endeavoured at this period to prevail upon him to relax in his application to study, it was in vain. He used, when unable to sit upright, to prop himself up with pillows, and continue his translations. One day that I was sitting by his bedside the surgeon came in. 'I am glad you are here,' said Mr. Anderson, addressing himself to me, 'you will be able to persuade Leyden to attend to my advice.' I have told him before, and now I repeat, that he will die if he does not leave off his studies and remain quiet.' 'Very well, doctor,' exclaimed Leyden, 'you have done your duty, but you must now hear me; I cannot be idle, and whether I die or live, the wheel must go round till the last;' and he actually continued, under the depression of a fever and a liver complaint, to study more than ten hours each day.

"The temper of Dr. Leyden was mild and generous, and he could bear, with perfect good humour, railery on his foibles. When he arrived at Calcutta in 1805, I was most solicitous regarding his reception in the society of the Indian capital. 'I entreat you, my dear friend, (I said to him the day he landed), to be careful of the impression you make on your entering this community; for God's sake, learn a little English, and be silent upon literary subjects, except among literary men.' 'Learn English!' he exclaimed, 'no, never; it was trying to learn that language that spoilt my Scotch; and as to being silent, I will promise to hold my tongue, if you will make fools hold theirs.'

"His memory was most tenacious, and he sometimes loaded it with lumber. When he was at Mysore, an argument occurred upon a point of English history; it was agreed to refer it to Leyden, and, to the astonishment of all parties, he repeated verbatim the whole of an act of parliament in the reign of James relative to Ireland, which decided the point in dispute. On being asked how he came to charge his memory with such extraordinary matter, he said—that several years before, when he was writing on the changes that had taken place in the English language, this act was one of the documents to which he had referred as a specimen of the style of that age, and that he had retained every word in his memory.

"His love of the place of his nativity was a passion in which he had always a pride, and which in India he cherished with the fondest enthusiasm. I once went to see him when he was very ill, and had been confined to his bed for many days; there were several gentlemen in the room; he enquired if I had any news; I told him I had a letter from Eakdale. 'And what are they about in the borders?' he asked. 'A curious circumstance,' I replied, 'is stated in my letter;' and I read him a passage which described the conduct of our volunteers on a fire being kindled by mistake at one of the beacons. This letter mentioned that the moment the blaze which was the signal of invasion, was seen, the mountaineers hastened to their rendezvous, and those of Liddesdale swam the Liddle river to reach it. They were assembled (though several of their houses were at a distance of six and seven miles) in two hours, and at break of day the party marched into the town of Hawick (at a distance of twenty miles from the place of assembly) to the Border tune of 'Wha da? meddle wi' me.' Leyden's countenance became animated as I proceeded with this detail, and at its close he sprang from his sick bed, and, with strange melody, and still stranger gesticulations, sung aloud, 'Wha da? meddle wi' me, wha da? meddle wi' me.' Several of those who witnessed this scene looked at him as one that was raving in the delirium of a fever.

"These anecdotes will display more fully than any description I can give, the lesser shades of the character

* This lively tune has been called the Gathering of the Elliots, a clan now and formerly very numerous in the district of Liddesdale. The burthen is:

Wha da? meddle wi' me,
And wha da? meddle wi' me;
For my name it is Little Jock Elliot,
And wha da? meddle wi' me?

of this extraordinary man. An external manner, certainly not agreeable, and a disposition to egotism, were his only defects. How trivial do these appear, at a moment when we are lamenting the loss of such a rare combination of virtues, learning, and genius, as were concentrated in the late Dr. Leyden!

"JOHN MALCOLM."

We have little to add to Sir John Malcolm's luminous and characteristic sketch. The efficient and active patronage of Lord Minto, himself a man of letters, a poet, and a native of Teviotdale, was of the most essential importance to Leyden, and no less honourable to the governor-general. Leyden's first appointment as a professor in the Bengal College might appear the sort of promotion best suited to his studies, but was soon exchanged for that of a judge of the twenty-four Purgannahs of Calcutta. In this capacity he had a charge of police, which "jumped with his humour well;" for the task of pursuing and dispersing the bands of robbers who infest Bengal had something of active and military duty. He also exercised a judicial capacity among the natives, to the discharge of which he was admirably fitted, by his knowledge of their language, manners, and customs. To this office a very considerable yearly income was annexed. This was neither expended in superfluities, nor even in those ordinary expenses which the fashion of the east has pronounced indispensable; for Dr. Leyden kept no establishment, gave no entertainments, and was, with the receipt of this revenue, the very same simple, frugal, and temperate student, which he had been at Edinburgh. But, exclusive of a portion remitted home for the most honourable and pious purpose, his income was devoted to the pursuit which engaged his whole soul,—to the increase, namely, of his acquaintance with eastern literature in all its branches. The expense of native teachers, of every country and dialect, and that of procuring from every quarter oriental manuscripts, engrossed his whole emoluments, as the task of studying under the tuition of the interpreters, and decyphering the contents of the volumes, occupied every moment of his spare time. "I may die in the attempt," he writes to a friend; "but if I die without surpassing Sir William Jones a hundred fold in Oriental learning, let never a tear for me profane the eye of a Borderer." The term was soon approaching when these regrets were to be bitterly called forth, both from his Scottish friends, and from all who viewed with interest the career of his ardent and enthusiastic genius, which, despising every selfish consideration, was only eager to secure the fruits of knowledge, and held for sufficient reward the fame of having gathered them.

It is the more necessary to record these facts, as in a newspaper paragraph, apparently drawn up by some personal enemy of Leyden, whose enmity death could not silence, his leaving England was imputed to a desire of money, from which no man was ever more free than John Leyden. To his spirit of disinterested independence, Lord Minto, who possessed the best opportunities of judging, bore a splendid testimony, in a speech delivered at a public visitation of the college of Fort William, soon after Leyden's death.

"No man," said his lordship, "whatever his condition might be, ever possessed a mind so entirely exempt from every sordid passion, so negligent of fortune, and all its grovelling pursuits—in a word, so entirely disinterested—nor ever owned a spirit more firmly and nobly independent. I speak of these things with some knowledge, and wish to record a competent testimony to the fact, that within my experience, Dr. Leyden never, in any instance, solicited an object of personal interest, nor, as I believe, ever interrupted his higher pursuits, to waste a moment's thought on these minor cares. Whatever trust or advancement may at some periods have improved his personal situation, have been, without exception, tendered, and in a manner thrust upon his acceptance, unsolicited, un contemplated, and unexpected. To this exemption from cupidity, was allied every generous virtue worthy of those smiles of fortune, which he disdained to court; and amongst many estimable features of his character, an ardent love of justice, and a vehement abhorrence of oppression, were not less prominent than the other high qualities I have already described."—Poetical Remains, p. lxxiv.

Dr. Leyden accompanied the governor-general upon the expedition to Java, for the purpose of investigating the manners, language, and literature of the tribes which inhabit that island, and partly also because it was thought his extensive knowledge of the eastern dialects and customs might be useful in settling the government of the country, or in communicating with the independent princes in the neighbourhood of the Dutch settlements. His spirit of romantic adventure led him literally to rush upon death; for, with another volunteer who attended the expedition, he threw himself into the surf, in order to be the first Briton of the expedition who should set foot upon Java. When the success of the well-concerted movements of the invaders had given them possession of the town of Batavia, Leyden displayed the same ill-omened precipitation, in his haste to examine a library, or rather a warehouse of books, in which many Indian manuscripts of value were said to be deposited. A library, in a Dutch settlement, was not, as might have been expected, in the best order; the apartment had not been regularly ventilated, and, either from this circumstance, or already affected by the fatal sickness peculiar to Batavia, Leyden, when he left the place, had a fit of shivering, and declared the atmosphere was enough to give any mortal a fever. The presage was too just; he took his bed, and died in three days, on the eve of the battle which gave Java to the British empire.

Thus died John Leyden, in a moment, perhaps, most calculated to gratify the feelings which were dear to his heart; upon the very day of military glory, and when every avenue of new and interesting discovery was opened to his penetrating research. In the emphatic words of scripture, the bowl was broken at the fountain. His literary property was intrusted by his last will to the charge of Mr. Heber, and his early and constant friend Mr. William Erskine of Calcutta, his executors, under whose inspection his poetical remains were given to the public in 1821, with a Memoir of his Life by the Rev. Robert Morton, a friend and relation of the deceased poet. Acquiescing in the sentiment by which it is introduced, it is not easy to resist transcribing from that piece of biography the following affecting passage:

"The writer cannot here resist his desire to relate an anecdote of Leyden's father, who, though in a humble walk of life, is ennobled by the possession of an intelligent mind, and has all that just pride which characterises the industrious and virtuous class of Scottish peasantry to which he belongs. Two years ago, when Sir John Malcolm visited the seat of Lord Minto, in Roxburghshire, he requested that John Leyden, who was employed in the vicinity, might be sent for, as he wished to speak with him. He came after the labour of the day was finished, and, though his feelings were much agitated, he appeared rejoiced to see one who he knew had cherished so sincere a regard for his son. In the course of the conversation which took place on this occasion, Sir J. Malcolm, after mentioning his regret at the unavoidable delays which had occurred in realising the little property that had been left, said he was authorised by Mr. Heber (to whom all Leyden's English manuscripts had been bequeathed) to say, that such as were likely to produce a profit should be published as soon as possible, for the benefit of the family. 'Sir,' said the old man with animation, and with tears in his eyes, 'God blessed me with a son, who, had he been spared, would have been an honour to his country! As it is, I beg of Mr. Heber, in any publication he may intend, to think more of his memory than my wants. The money you speak of would be a great comfort to me in my old age; but thanks to the Almighty, I have good health, and can still earn my livelihood; and I pray therefore of you and Mr. Heber to publish nothing that is not for my son's good fame.'"

Since that period the Commentaries of Baber, translated from the Turki language, chiefly by Dr. Leyden, and completed by his friend and executor, William Erskine, were published, in 1826, for the advantage of Mr. Leyden, senior. It is a work of great interest to those who love the study of Indian antiquities, being the autobiography of one of the Mogul Emperors of Hindustan, who, like Cæsar, recorded his own conquests, but, more communicative than the Roman, descended to record his amusements, as well as to relate deeds of policy and arms. He recapitulates his drinking bouts, which were, in spite of Koran and Prophet, both deep and frequent; and the whole tenor of the history gives us the singular picture of a genuine sultan of the ancient Tartar descent, in his strength and his weakness, his virtues, his follies, and his crimes.

The remains of John Leyden, honoured with every respect by Lord Minto, now repose in a distant land, far from the green-sod graves of his ancestors at Hazeldean, to which, with a natural anticipation of such an event, he bids an affecting farewell in the solemn passage which concludes the Scenes of Infancy:

The silver moon, at midnight cold and still,
Looks, sad and silent, o'er yon western hill;

While large and pale the ghostly structures grow,
Rear'd on the confines of the world below.
Is that dull sound the hum of Teviot's stream?
Is that blue light the moon's, or tomb-fire's gleam,
By which a mouldering pile is faintly seen,
The old deserted church of Hazeldean;
Where slept my fathers in their natal clay,
Till Teviot's waters rolled their bones away?
Their feeble voices from the stream they raise,— "Rash youth! unmindful of thy early days,
Why didst thou quit the peasant's simple lot?
Why didst thou leave the peasant's turf-built cot,
The ancient graves, where all thy fathers lie,
And Teviot's stream, that long has murmured by?
And we—when Death so long has closed our eyes,
How wilt thou bid us from the dust arise,
And bear our mouldering bones across the main,
From vales, that knew our lives devoid of stain?
Rash youth! beware, thy home-bred virtues save,
And sweetly sleep in thy paternal grave!"

Such is the language of nature, moved by the kindly associations of country and of kindred affections. But the best epitaph is the story of a life engaged in the practice of virtue and the pursuit of honourable knowledge; the best monument, the regret of the worthy and of the wise.

THE MERMAID.

BY J. LEYDEN.

The following poem is founded upon a Gaelic traditional ballad, called Macphail of Colonsay, and the Mermaid of Corrireckin. The dangerous gulf of Corrireckin lies between the islands of Jura and Scarba, and the superstition of the islanders has tenanted its shelves and eddies with all the fabulous monsters and demons of the ocean. Among these, according to a universal tradition, the mermaid is the most remarkable. In her dwelling, and in her appearance, the mermaid of the northern nations resembles the syren of the ancients. The appendages of a comb and mirror are probably of Celtic invention.

The Gaelic story declares, that Macphail of Colonsay was carried off by a mermaid, while passing the gulf, above mentioned: that they resided together, in a grotto beneath the sea, for several years, during which time she bore him five children: but, finally, he tired of her society, and, having prevailed upon her to carry him near the shore of Colonsay, he escaped to land.

The inhabitants of the Isle of Man have a number of such stories, which may be found in Waldron. One states, that a very beautiful mermaid fell in love with a young shepherd, who kept his flocks beside a creek, much frequented by these marine people. She frequently caressed him, and brought him presents of coral, fine pearls, and every valuable production of the ocean. Once upon a time, as she threw her arms eagerly round him, he suspected her of a design to draw him into the sea, and, struggling hard, disengaged himself from her embrace, and ran away. But the mermaid resented either the suspicion, or the disappointment, so highly, that she threw a stone after him, and flung herself into the sea, whence she never returned. The youth, though but slightly struck with the pebble, felt, from that moment, the most excruciating agony, and died at the end of seven days.—Waldron's Works, p. 176.

Another tradition of the same island affirms, that one of these amphibious damsels was caught in a net, and brought to land, by some fishers, who had spread a snare for the denizens of the ocean. She was shaped like the most beautiful female down to the waist, but below trailed a voluminous fish's tail, with spreading fins. As she would neither eat nor speak, (though they knew she had the power of language,) they became apprehensive that the island would be visited with some strange calamity, if she should die for want of food; and therefore, on the third night, they left the door open, that she might escape. Accordingly, she did not fail to embrace the opportunity; but gliding with incredible swiftness to the sea-side, she plunged herself into the waters, and was welcomed by a number of her own species, who were heard to enquire, what she had seen among the natives of the earth. "Nothing," she answered, "wonderful, except that they were silly enough to throw away the water, in which they had boiled their eggs."

Collins, in his notes upon the line,

"Mona, long hid from those who sail the main," explains it, by a similar Celtic tradition. It seems, a mermaid had become so much charmed with a young man, who walked upon the beach, that she made love to him; and, being rejected with scorn, she excited, by enchantment, a mist, which long concealed the island from all navigators.

I must mention another monkish tradition, because, being derived from the common source of Celtic mythology, they appear the most natural illustrations of the Hebridean tale. About fifty years before Waldron went to reside in Man, (for there were living witnesses of the legend when he was upon the island,) a project was undertaken, to fish treasures up from the deep, by means of a diving bell. A venturesome fellow, accordingly, descended, and kept pulling for more rope, till all they had on board was expended. This must have been no small quantity, for a skilful mathematician, who was on board, judging from the proportion of line let down, declared, that the adventurer must have descended at least double the number of leagues, which the moon is computed to be distant from the earth. At such a depth, wonders might be expected, and wonderful was the account given by the adventurer, when drawn up to the air.

"After," said he, "I had passed the region of fishes, I descended into a pure element, clear as the air in the sereneest and most unclouded day, through which, as I passed, I saw the bottom of the watery world, paved with coral, and a shining kind of pebbles, which glittered like the sun-beams, reflected on a glass. I longed to tread the delightful paths, and never felt more exquisite delight, than when the machine, I was inclosed in, grazed upon it."

"On looking through the little windows of my prison, I saw large streets and squares on every side, ornamented with huge pyramids of crystal, not inferior in brightness to the finest diamonds; and the most beautiful building, not of stone, nor brick, but of mother-of-pearl, and embossed in various figures, with shells of all colours. The passage, which led to one of these magnificent apartments, being open, I endeavoured, with my whole strength, to move my enclosure towards it; which I did, though with great difficulty, and very slowly. At last, however, I got entrance into a very spacious room, in the midst of which stood a large amber table, with several chairs round, of the same. The floor of it was composed of rough diamonds, topazes, emeralds, rubies, and pearls. Here I doubted not but to make my voyage as profitable as it was pleasant; for, could I have brought with me but a few of these, they would have been of more value than all we could hope for in a thousand wrecks; but they were so closely wedged in, and so strongly cemented by time, that they were not to be unfurnished. I saw several chains, carcanets, and rings, of all manner of precious stones, finely cut, and set after our manner; which I suppose had been the prize of the winds and waves: these were hanging loosely on the Jasper walls, by strings made of rushes, which I might easily have taken down; but, as I had edged myself within half a foot reach of them, I was unfortunately drawn back, through your want of line. In my return, I saw several comely mermen, and beautiful mermaids, the inhabitants of this blissful realm, swiftly descending towards it; but they seemed frightened at my appearance, and glided at a distance from me, taking me, no doubt, for some monstrous and new-created species."—Waldron, ibidem.

It would be very easy to enlarge this introduction, by quoting a variety of authors, concerning the supposed existence of these marine people. The reader may consult the Telliamed of M. Maillet, who, in support of the Neptunist's system of geology, has collected a variety of legends, respecting mermen and mermaids, p. 230, et sequen. Much information may also be derived from Pontoppidan's Natural History of Norway, who fails not to people her seas with this amphibious race.* An older authority is to be found in the Kongs skugg-sie, or Royal Mirror, written, as its believed, about 1170. The mermen, there mentioned, are termed hafstræmbur (sea-giants), and are said to have the upper parts resembling the human race; but the author, with becoming diffidence, declines to state positively, whether they are equipped with a dolphin's tail. The female monster is called mar-gyga (sea-giantess), and is averred, certainly, to drag a fish's train. She appears, generally, in the act of devouring fish, which she has caught. According to the apparent voracity of her appetite, the sailors pretended to guess what chance they had of saving their lives in the tempest, which always followed her appearance.—Speculum Regale, 1768, p. 166.

* I believe something to the same purpose may be found in the school editions of Guthrie's Geographical Grammar, a work, which, though, in general, as sober and dull as could be desired by the gravest preceptor, becomes of a sudden uncommonly lively, upon the subject of the seas of Norway, the author having thought meet to adopt the right reverend Erick Pontoppidan's account of mermen, sea-snakes, and krakens.

Mermaids were sometimes supposed to be possessed of supernatural powers. Resenius, in his life of Frederick II. gives us an account of a syren, who not only prophesied future events, but, as might have been expected from the element in which she dwelt, preached vehemently against the sin of drunkenness.

The mermaid of Corrivrekin possessed the power of occasionally resigning her scaly train, and the Celtic tradition bears, that, when, from choice or necessity, she was invested with that appendage, her manners were more stern and savage than when her form was entirely human. Of course, she warned her lover not to come into her presence, when she was thus transformed. This belief is alluded to in the following ballad.

THE MERMAID.

On Jura's heath how sweetly swell
The murmurs of the mountain bee,
How softly mourns the writhed shell
Of Jura's shore, its parent sea!
But softer, floating o'er the deep,
The mermaid's sweet sea-soothing lay,
That charmed the dancing waves to sleep,
Before the bark of Colonsay.
Aloft the purple pennons wave,
As parting gay from Crinan's shore,
From Morven's wars, the seamen brave
Their gallant chieftain homeward bore.
In youth's gay bloom, the brave Macphail
Still blamed the lingering bark's delay;
For her he chid the flagging sail,
The lovely maid of Colonsay.
"And raise," he cried, "the song of love,
The maiden sung with tearful smile,
When first, o'er Jura's hills to rove,
We left afar the lonely isle!
'When on this ring of ruby red
Shall die,' she said, 'the crimson hue,
Know that thy favourite fair is dead,
Or proves to thee and love untrue.'
Now, lightly poised, the rising ear
Disperses wide the foamy spray,
And, echoing far o'er Crinan's shore,
Resounds the song of Colonsay.
"Softly blow, thou western breeze,
Softly rustle through the sail,
Soothe to rest the furrowed seas,
Before my love, sweet western gale!
"Where the wave is tinged with red,
And the russet sea-leaves grow,
Mariners, with prudent dread,
Shun the shelving reefs below.
"As you pass through Jura's sound,
Bend your course by Scarba's shore,
Shun, O shun, the gulf profound,
Where Corrivrekin's surges roar!
"If, from that unbottomed deep,
With wrinkled form and writhed train,
O'er the verge of Scarba's steep,
The sea-snake heave his snowy mane,*

* "They, who, in works of navigation, on the coast of Norway, employ themselves in fishing or merchandise, do all agree in this strange story, that there is a serpent there, which is of a vast magnitude, namely two hundred feet long, and moreover twenty feet thick; and is wont to live in rocks and caves, towards the sea-coast about Berge; which will go alone from his holes, in a clear night in summer, and devours calves, lambs, and hogs; or else he goes into the sea to feed on polypus, locusts, and all sorts of sea-crabs. He hath commonly hair hanging from his neck, a cubit long, and sharp scales, and is black, and he hath flaming shining eyes. This snake disquiets the shippers, and he puts up his head on high, like a pillar, and catcheth away men, and he devours them; and this happeneth not but it signifies some wonderful change of the kingdom near at hand; namely that the princes shall die, or be banished; or some tumultuous wars shall presently follow."—Olaus Magnus, London, 1558, rendered into English by J. S. Much more of the sea-snake may be learned from the credible witnesses cited by Pontoppidan, who saw it raise itself from the sea, twice as high as the mast of their vessel. The tradition probably originates in the immense snake of the Edda, whose folds were supposed to girdle the earth.

"Unwarp, unwind his oozy coils,
Sea-green sisters of the main,
And in the gulf, where ocean boils,
The unwildly wallowing monster chain.

"Softly blow, thou western breeze,
Softly rustle through the sail,
Soothe to rest the furrowed seas,
Before my love, sweet western gale!"

Thus, all to soothe the chieftain's woe,
Far from the maid he loved so dear,
The song arose, so soft and slow,
He scanned her parting sigh to hear.

The lonely deck he paces o'er,
Impatient for the rising day,
And still, from Crinan's moonlight shore,
He turns his eyes to Colonsay.

The moonbeams crisp the curling surge,
That streaks with foam the ocean green;
While forward still the rowers urge
Their course, a female form was seen.

The sea-maid's form, of pearly light,
Was whiter than the downy spray,
And round her bosom, heaving bright,
Her glossy, yellow ringlets play.

Borne on a foamy-crested wave,
She reached amain the bounding prow,
Then, clasping fast the chieftain brave,
She, plunging, sought the deep below.

Ah! long beside thy feigned bier,
The monks the prayers of death shall say,
And long for thee, the fruitless tear
Shall weep the maid of Colonsay!

But downwards, like a powerless corse,
The eddying waves the chieftain bear;—
He only heard the moaning hoarse
Of waters, murmuring in his ear.

The murmurs sink by slow degrees;
No more the surges round him rave;
Lulled by the music of the seas,
He lies within a coral cave.

In dreamy mood reclines he long,
Nor dares his tranced eyes unclose,
Till, warbling wild, the sea-maid's song,
Far in the crystal cavern, rose;

Soft as that harp's unseen control,
In morning dreams that lovers hear,
Whose strains steal sweetly o'er the soul,
But never reach the waking ear.

As sunbeams, through the tepid air,
When clouds dissolve in dew unseen,
Smile on the flowers, that bloom more fair,
And field, that glow with livelier green—

So melting soft the music fell;
It seemed to soothe the fluttering spray—
"Say, heardest thou not these wild notes swell?"
"Ah! 'tis the song of Colonsay."

Like one that from a fearful dream
Awakes, the morning light to view,
And joys to see the purple beam,
Yet fears to find the vision true,

He heard that strain, so wildly sweet,
Which bade his torpid languor fly;
He feared some spell had bound his feet,
And hardly dared his limbs to try.

"This yellow sand, this sparry cave,
Shall bend thy soul to beauty's sway;
Canst thou the maiden of the wave
Compare to her of Colonsay?"

Roused by that voice, of silver sound,
From the paved floor he lightly sprung,
And, glancing wild his eyes around,
Where the fair nymph her tresses wrung,

No form he saw of mortal mould;
It shone like ocean's snowy foam;
Her ringlets waved in living gold,
Her mirror crystal, pearl her comb.

Her pearly comb the syren took,
And careless bound her tresses wild;
Still o'er the mirror stole her look,
As on the wondering youth she smiled.

Like music from the greenwood tree,
Again she raised the melting lay;
—"Fair warrior, wilt thou dwell with me,
And leave the maid of Colonsay?"

"Fair is the crystal hall for me
With rubies and with emeralds set,
And sweet the music of the sea
Shall sing, when we for love are met.

"How sweet to dance, with gliding feet,
Along the level tide so green,
Responsive to the cadence sweet,
That breathes along the moonlight scene!

"And soft the music of the main
Rings from the motley tortoise-shell,
While moonbeams, o'er the watery plain,
Seem trembling in its fitful swell.

"How sweet, when billows heave their head,
And shake their snowy crests on high,
Serene in Ocean's sapphire bed,
Beneath the tumbling surge, to lie;

"To trace, with tranquil step, the deep,
Where pearly drops of frozen dew
In concave shells, unconscious, sleep,
Or shine with lustre, silvery blue!

"Then shall the summer sun, from far,
Pour through the wave a softer ray,
While diamonds, in our bower of spar,
At eve shall shed a brighter day.

"Nor stormy wind, nor wintry gale,
That o'er the angry ocean sweep,
Shall o'er our coral groves assail,
Calm in the bosom of the deep.

"Through the green meads beneath the sea,
Enamoured, we shall fondly stray—
Then, gentle warrior, dwell with me,
And leave the maid of Colonsay!"

—"Though bright thy locks of glistening gold,
Fair maiden of the foamy main!
Thy life-blood is the water cold,
While mine beats high in every vein.

"If I, beneath thy sparry cave,
Should in thy snowy arms recline,
Inconstant as the restless wave,
My heart would grow as cold as thine."

As cygnet down, proud swelled her breast;
Her eye confessed the pearly tear;
His hand she to her bosom prest—
"Is there no heart for rapture here?"

"These limbs, sprung from the lucid sea,
Do not warm blood their currents fill,
No heart-pulse riot, wild and free,
To joy, to love's delicious thrill!"

"Though all the splendour of the sea
Around thy faultless beauty shine,
That heart, that riots wild and free,
Can hold no sympathy with mine.

"These sparkling eyes, so wild and gay,
They swim not in the light of love:
The beauteous maid of Colonsay,
Her eyes are milder than the dove!

"Even now, within the lonely isle,
Her eyes are dim with tears for me;
And canst thou think that syren smile
Can lure my soul to dwell with thee?"

An oozy film her limbs o'erspread;
Unfolds in length her scaly train;
She tossed, in proud disdain, her head,
And lashed, with webbed fin, the main.

"Dwell here, alone!" the mermaid cried,
"And view far off the sea-nymphs play;
Thy prison-wall, the azure tide,
Shall bar thy steps from Colonsay.

"Where'er, like ocean's scaly brood,
I cleave, with rapid fin, the wave,
Far from the daughter of the flood,
Conceal thee in this coral cave.

"I feel my former soul return;
It kindles at thy cold disdain:
And has a mortal dared to spurn
A daughter of the foamy main?"

She fled; around the crystal cave
The rolling waves resume their road,
On the broad portal idly rave,
But enter not the nymph's abode.

And many a weary night went by,
As in the lonely cave he lay,
And many a sun rolled through the sky,
And poured its beams on Colonsay;

And oft, beneath the silver moon,
He heard afar the mermaid sing,
And oft, to many a melting tune,
The shell-formed lyrea of ocean ring;

And, when the moon went down the sky,
Still rose, in dreams, his native plain,
And oft he thought his love was by,
And charmed him with some tender strain;

And, heart-sick, oft he waked to weep,
When ceased that voice of silver sound,
And thought to plunge him in the deep,
That walled his crystal cavern round.

But still the ring, of ruby red,
Retained its vivid crimson hue,
And each despairing accent fled,
To find his gentle love so true.

When seven long lonely months were gone,
The mermaid to his cavern came,
No more misshapen from the zone,
But like a maid of mortal frame.

"O give to me that ruby ring,
That on thy finger glances gay,
And thou shalt hear the mermaid sing
The song, thou lovest, of Colonsay."

"This ruby ring, of crimson grain,
Shall on thy finger glitter gay,
If thou wilt bear me through the main,
Again to visit Colonsay."

"Except thou quit thy former love,
Content to dwell, for aye, with me,
Thy scorn my finny frame might move
To tear thy limbs amid the sea."

"Then bear me swift along the main,
The lonely isle again to see,
And, when I here return again,
I plight my faith to dwell with thee."

An oozy film her limbs o'erspread,
While slow unfolds her scaly train,
With gluey fangs her hands were clad,
She lashed with webbed fin the main.

He grasps the mermaid's scaly sides,
As, with broad fin, she oars her way;
Beneath the silent moon she glides,
That sweetly sleeps on Colonsay.

Proud swells her heart! she deems at last,
To lure him with her silver tongue,
And as the shelving rocks she past,
She raised her voice, and sweetly sung.

In softer, sweeter strains she sung,
Slow gliding o'er the moonlight bay,
When light to land the chieftain sprung,
To hail the maid of Colonsay.

O sad the mermaid's gay notes fell,
And sadly sink, remote at sea!
So sadly mourns the writhed shell
Of Jura's shore, its parent sea,

And ever as the year returns,
The charm-bound sailors know the day;
For sadly still the mermaid mourns
The lovely chief of Colonsay.

ON SEEING AN EAGLE PERCHED ON THE TOMBSTONE OF ARISTOTEMENES.

"Majestic bird! so proud and fierce,
Why tower'st thou o'er that warrior's hearse?"—
"I tell each godlike earthly king,
Far as o'er birds of every wing,
Supreme the lordly eagle sails,
Great Aristomenes prevails.

"Let timid doves, with plaintive cry,
Coo o'er the graves where cowards lie;
'Tis o'er the dauntless hero's breast
The kingly eagle loves to rest."

As good poetry is a rarity of late, a few more specimens of the talent of Dr. Leyden are inserted; the Ode to an Indian Gold Coin is probably better known than most of his productions, but is not on that account less worthy of preservation.

ODE TO AN INDIAN GOLD COIN.

Written in Chérical, Malabar.

Slave of the dark and dirty mine!
What vanity has brought thee here?
How can I love to see thee shine
So bright, whom I have bought so dear?—
The tent-ropes flapping lone I hear
For twilight-converse, arm in arm;
The jackal's shriek bursts on mine ear,
When mirth and music went to charm.

By Chérical's dark wandering streams,
Where cane-tufts shadow all the wild,
Sweet visions haunt my waking dreams
Of Tevot lov'd while still a child,
Of castled rocks stupendous pil'd
By Esk or Eden's classic wave,
Where loves of youth and friendships smil'd,
Uncurs'd by thee, vile yellow slave!

Fade, day-dreams sweet, from memory fade!—
The perish'd bliss of youth's first prime,
That once so bright on fancy play'd,
Revives no more in after-time.
Far from my sacred natal clime,
I haste to an untimely grave;
The daring thoughts that soar'd sublime
Are sunk in ocean's southern wave.

Slave of the mine! thy yellow light
Gleams baleful as the tomb-fire drear.—
A gentle vision comes by night
My lonely widow'd heart to cheer;
Her eyes are dim with many a tear,
That once were guiding stars to mine:
Her fond heart throbs with many a fear!—
I cannot bear to see thee shine.

For thee, for thee, vile yellow slave,
I left a heart that lov'd me true!
I cross'd the tedious ocean-wave,
To roam in climes unkind and new.
The cold wind of the stranger blew
Chill on my wither'd heart:—the grave
Dark and untimely met my view—
And all for thee, vile yellow slave!

Ha! com'st thou now so late to mock
A wanderer's banish'd heart forlorn,
Now that his frame the lightning shock
Of sun-rays tipt with death has borne?
From love, from friendship, country, torn,
To memory's fond regrets the prey,
Vile slave, thy yellow dross I scorn!
Go mix thee with thy kindred clay!

MACGREGOR.

Written in Glenorchy, near the scene of the massacre of the Macgregors.

In the vale of Glenorchy the night-breeze was sighing
O'er the tombs where the ancient Macgregors are lying:
Green are their graves by their soft murmuring river,
But the name of Macgregor has perish'd for ever.—
On a red stream of light, from his gray mountains glancing,
The form of a spirit seem'd sternly advancing;
Slow o'er the heath of the dead was its motion,
As the shadow of mist o'er the foam of the ocean;
Like the sound of a stream thro' the still evening dying—
"Stranger, who tread'st where Macgregor is lying!
Dar'st thou to walk unappall'd and firm-hearted
Midst the shadowy steps of the mighty departed?
See, round thee the cairns of the dead are disclosing
The shades that have long been in silence reposing!
Through their form dimly twinkles the moon-beam descending,
As their red eye of wrath on a stranger are bending.
Our gray stones of fame though the heath-blossoms cover,
Round the hills of our battles our spirits still hover;
But dark are our forms by our blue native fountains,
For we ne'er see the streams running red from the mountains.

Our fame fades away like the foam of the river,
That shines in the sun ere it vanish for ever;
And no maid hangs in tears of regret o'er the story,
When the minstrel relates the decline of our glory.

The hunter of red deer now ceases to number
The lonely gray stones on the fields of our slumber.
Fly, stranger, and let not thine eye be reverted!
Ah! why should'st thou see that our fame is departed?"

A LOVE TALE.

A FRAGMENT.

The glance of my love is mild and fair
Whene'er she looks on me;
As the silver beams, in the midnight air,
Of the gentle moon; and her yellow hair
On the gale floats wild and free.

Her yellow locks flow o'er her back,
And round her forehead twine;
I would not give the tresses that deck
The blue lines of her snowy neck,
For the richest Indian mine.

Her gentle face is of lily hue;
But whene'er her eyes meet mine,
The mantling blush on her cheek you view
Is like the rose-bud wet with dew,
When the morning sun-beams shine.

"Why heaves your breast with the smother'd sigh?
My dear love, tell me true!
Why does your colour come and fly,
And why, oh! why is the tear in your eye?
I ne'er lov'd maid but you.

"True I must leave Zeania's dome,
And wander o'er ocean-sea;
But yet, though far my footsteps roam,
My soul shall linger round thy home,
I'll love thee though thou love not me."

She dried the tear with her yellow hair,
And rais'd her watery eye,
Like the sun with radiance soft and fair,
That gleams thro' the moist and showery air
When the white clouds fleck the sky.

She rais'd her eye with a feeble smile,
That through the tear-drops shone!
Her look might the hardest heart beguile,—
She sigh'd, as she press'd my hand the while,
"Alas! my brother John.

"Ah me! I lov'd my brother well
Till he went o'er the sea;—
And none till now could ever tell
If joy or woe to the youth befel;
But he will not return to me."

TO CAMOENS.

FROM THE PORTUGUESE OF DE MATOS.

So com o grande e immortal Camoens, &c.
Camoens, o'er thy bright immortal lays,
Of mournful elegy or lyric song,
How fleetly glide the rapid hours along!
I give to thee my nights, to thee my days.
The harms of fortune and the woes of love,
The changes of thy destiny severe,
I mark with sadly sympathetic tear,
And can but sigh for what was thine to prove.
For thee, mine eyes with bursting tears o'erflow,
Majestic poet! whose undaunted soul
Brav'd the ill-omen'd stars of either pole,
And found in other climes but change of woe.
What bard of fickle fortune dare complain,
Who knows thy fate, and high immortal strain?

TO THE COURIER DOVE.

FROM THE ARABIC.

Fair traveller of the pathless air,
To Zera's bowers these accents bear,
Hid in the shade of palmy groves,
And tell her where her wanderer roves!
But spread, O spread your pinion blue,
To guard my lines from rain and dew:
And when my charming fair you see,
A thousand kisses bear from me,
And softly murmur in her ear
How much I wish that I were near!

EPITAPH.

FROM THE LATIN.

Once in the keen pursuit of fame
I, school-boy-like, pursued a bubble:
But Death, before I gain'd a name,
Stept in and sav'd a world of trouble.

Waltham.

BEING THE THIRD VOLUME OF THE LIBRARY OF ROMANCE, EDITED BY LEITCH RITCHIE.

The plan of the "Library of Romance," published in London, and edited by Leitch Ritchie, has an object similar to our own—the dissemination of polite literature at a cheaper rate than usual. Instead of three volumes, to which works of fiction have heretofore been extended, Mr. Ritchie confines each author to one, which is sold at about one fourth of the usual price; and we furnish the same matter at about one eighth of even his very reduced London rate. The first of his series contained "The Ghost Hunter and his Family," which, though evincing considerable talent, as a whole is incongruous and extravagant. The second number contains the story of "Schinderhannes, the Robber of the Rhine," of which we published a short sketch in the "Lives of Banditti." The work now published constitutes the third volume of the Library of Romance, and is the only one received which we have deemed worthy of republication. We consider Waltham to possess claims to attention; the character of Murdoch Macara, the Scotsman, is forcibly sketched and in bold relief; while the numerous incidents of the novel are natural, and highly interesting. The author, though now anonymous, cannot probably continue long unknown; and though he may not be pronounced a Walter Scott, yet the talents, cultivation of mind, and knowledge of the human heart, displayed even in this single volume, entitle him to a high niche in the literary temple.

CHAPTER I.

Arnwood Castle in — shire, the only remaining residence of the barons of that name, who once were mighty men in its neighbourhood, was a much more sightly mass than structures of so ancient a date commonly are. Having been strongly built at first, partly from the whim and partly from the poverty of its owners, little money had been wasted in patching and disfiguring it with subsidiary buildings; and, excepting a wing of light gothic, only the height of one story, which contained two or three handsome rooms, the old castle still stood in all its heavy strength, and frowned in its original feudal gloom, as the most prominent object in the irregular landscape over which it presided. Every one on his approach admired the relief which the elegant addition which we have mentioned gave to the venerable strength of the huge dark pile, and all were disposed to compliment the taste of the departed lord, under whose superintendence it had been raised. But in truth the praise was less due to my lord of the time, who was little more than a mere man of war, like his ancestors, than to the chance of his stumbling upon a tasteful architect, who, struck with the beauty of a tall tower at the back angle, which was raised in a peculiar taste, and was now known by the name of the Lark's Tower, as well as with the picturesque appearance of a building and grounds too much out of the way of common gazers to be observed, suggested to the owner the idea of the terrace, for the erection of which, if tradition can be believed, he never was fully paid.

Among the undulating grounds, neglected masses of old trees and straggling brushwood, which covered the slopes towards the sea that washed the shore, scarcely a mile distant from the castle, and nearly in its front, there still stood various remains of old buildings—low thick walls, with vaults and caves, and strangely shaped mounds—of which nobody could give any account, except that they had remained there a stumbling block to any sort of comfortable hunting, and a refuge for gypsies, smugglers, and travelling thieves, from time immemorial, who made no sort of scruple of dislodging the badgers and rabbits from such comfortable quarters, whenever it answered their purpose to appropriate them for the time to themselves. Among these, was an ancient oblong vault, connected with a dilapidated chapel, wherein lay interred the lords of Arnwood, even from the time of Edward the Fifth, and a tall strange looking building, standing in an exposed situation, which might pass either for an antique pleasure-house, a smaller castle, a watch tower, or a species of landmark or observatory, according to the wish and fancy of the enquirer. This last was called the Pilot's Mark, and stood near the neck of a small peninsula, running into the sea, and beneath a sloping bare sort of headland, which rose black and craggy nearly behind, and went by the name of Hail Hill, probably from its cold seaward aspect and appearance. By the side of the little peninsula and the tower, and between these and the castle, was a small nook of the sea, of a tolerable depth of water, which was known by the name of Pirate's Creek; but so ignorant and incurious were the country people, that not a soul could tell how or whence these names originated.

It may well be supposed that this deserted and uncultivated neighbourhood, which was seven miles distant from any thing like a village, was at the time little frequented by strangers, and no favourite residence even of its own lords in former times, so long as they had more desirable estates elsewhere, and could keep a house in London. Still less, if possible, were its peculiar advantages and comforts perceptible to the common gaze of the proprietor of a modern mansion situated within eye-shot and almost at a stone's throw from the castle,—whose white surface, neatly shaven lawn, and closed windows, seemed to be placed within view of the latter noble fabric, almost in the very spirit of contradiction, and formed one of those harsh contrasts that too often mar, not only the general effect, but the peculiar romance of a scene like this.

In the solitary retirement of the castle the Dowager Lady Arnwood had resided, forgotten by the world, in quiet and meditative seclusion, ever since the death, at an early age, of the late lord. Indeed, scarcely a carriage, by any chance or upon any occasion, entered the old neglected gate, except that of the physician: not even a horseman halted at the threshold, except the post-boy with an occasional letter from her beloved and only son, on his travels abroad; or perhaps the vicar on his careful pony, to pay his distant visit and eat his sober dinner, well seasoned with moral reflections and religious discourse, upon the vanity of worldly grandeur, and the liability of riches to make to themselves wings and flee away.

The Lady Arnwood was, however, surprised one day by the unaccustomed presence of the post-boy just mentioned, fraught with a letter, in whose direction she instantly recognised the hand-writing of her son. Breaking it open, with all a mother's anxious impatience, she hastily read the following:—

"My very dear mother—I presume, that before this reaches you, you will have heard from the mouth of my late tutor, Mr. Johnston, that a difference between us, of a serious nature, the particulars of which it is not necessary now to detail, caused his dismissal a short time since. It is not expedient that I should at present enter upon a defence of charges which perhaps he has not even preferred to you. I had hoped to have been fortunate enough to obtain the company of my friend, Sir Eustace Walford, to the castle, whose testimony would at once have removed any doubt or anxiety that Mr. Johnston's representations may have occasioned, at the same time that his presence would have afforded a relief to the monotony of the scene at Arnwood. He is, however, unavoidably detained by particular business at Paris. You may expect to see me on the day after the receipt of this letter. Believe me, my very dear madam, your ever affectionate son, ARNWOOD."

It would not be easy to describe the effect of these few lines from her son, upon the mind of Arnwood's sad and anxious mother; or the weight that the letter removed from her spirits, and the satisfaction and pleasure it gave, notwithstanding the misrepresentations of the quondam tutor, Mr. Johnston, who had waited upon her on his return from Paris, but who had now left the protection of the castle for ever.

When, however, the news descended to the housekeeper's room on the following morning, from my lady's own mouth, that the young Lord Arnwood was absolutely expected home that very day—never was there in any quarter such a consternation of surprise and important preparation. Mr. Mollison, the generalissimo of butlers, was in a perfect panic, at the fifty hundred things that devolved upon him instantly "to be, to do, and to suffer," on such an extraordinary occasion, and ran about everywhere, doing nothing from not knowing what to do first—rubbing his hands, and giving all sorts of contradictory orders, and wondering above all things that my lady, who must have known what was to happen on the day before, should have had the cruelty to keep up the news for a whole day, and then let them out upon him like a clap of thunder, without giving him one night to think of all that was to be done.

The first thing he could muster presence of mind sufficient to effect, was to mount up into one of the neglected chambers, and fetch forth an old moth-eaten flag, which it had been the immemorial custom at Arnwood to hoist upon days of emergency, as he said; meaning days when any particular event took place at the castle, at which all were expected to rejoice. But so few occasions of rejoicing of any sort had of late taken place in this lonely building, that the flag was all but gone, being as thin and frail as a cobweb. However, up it must go, and a perplexing piece of business the rearing of it was to the honest major-domo, particularly from the flurry of his mind consequent upon this great event. The old tapestry in the gloomy room above, which in ancient times had been called the banquetting room, was to be shaken out and set in order; the hangings in the green drawing-room, which had been put up at the late lord's marriage, were to be unshrouded; the few remaining servants to be marshalled out in as much state as small numbers and other deficiencies would admit of; and a man to be stationed in the Lark's Tower, under the ragged flag, to keep a look out, and to give a signal to crooked Robert and his old wife, who dwelt at the porter's lodge; and, if time would permit, the whole country round was to be raised to welcome the young heir home to his castle of Arnwood; above all a fête was to be gotten up to please the domestics. As for Mrs. Goodyear the housekeeper, she was no less distracted with business and preparation; she broke two antique china dishes with her own hands in the ardour of scolding the housemaids, and scalded her fore-fingers in the most painful manner, by dipping it into a pot to make good her assertion that its contents did not boil.

At length, the numerous affairs below stairs were got into some sort of order. Mrs. Goodyear in gown and cap, with as much comfort as her scalded finger would admit of, and having her little gold watch hanging by her side, with her usual complacency crossed her hands before her, and looked out down the long avenue for the coming of my lord.

But the only person in view was Mark Forward, the footman, and man of all-work, who had early been despatched with an invitation to Lady's Arnwood's favourite, the rector, requesting his company to dinner to meet the young heir; he being the only gentleman, within twenty miles, whom my lady would condescend to invite as a relief to the solitude of her days, and to bear witness to the fallen fortunes of the ancient house of Arnwood.

"Any travellers to be seen on the road as you came, Mr. Mark?" said the housekeeper, looking out.

"Travellers, ma'am, on any road hereabouts? Don't mention such a thing, ma'am, if you please, only to make one's mouth water."

"Then there's no appearance of my lord yet, nor of any strangers whatever, Mark?"

"Nothing o' th' sort, ma'am. Travellers indeed! any where within ten miles of this black old castle—one might as well expect to see a bonfire on Hail Hill, over beyond, or a mermaid singing ballads in the Pirate's Creek, as a traveller here of a whole winter. Not so much as a tinker or a pedlar to enliven us this month past, and even old Alic the fiddler has deserted us. Not so much as a custom-house officer or exciseman ever passes; nor even a smuggler comes near the creek now—neither man nor maiden whatsoever, and a whole-some young fellow like me, wasting my precious youth in an old castle among the rocks. By gad, ma'am, you'll get out of bed some morning and find me hanging on the bough of one of the trees in the wood, like another Absalom."

"And as for me, Mr. Mark," said the housekeeper, surveying herself, "I may deck myself, and dress myself, and I may wear my clothes, and my trinkets, and what signifies how well a woman looks, when there's no one to see her?"

"Well, I can't stop here, ma'am, in this sort o' lamentation. But what, in the name of goodness, is that dangling at the top o' the flagstaff in the turret there?"

"It is the flag, no doubt, that Mr. Mollison hoisted for my lord."

"Flag, ma'am, ho! ho! and he not come home yet, supposing it were a flag. But it's more like one of the brooms that the skippers in the bay put up at the mast-head when their shabby craft is for sale, or as a signal of distress, than any token of rejoicing. 'Faith the castle itself may be for sale for aught I know."

"Lord! Mr. Mark, do ye think so, and nearly a year's wages due to me?"

"Oh! no fear of us, ma'am," said the wag, whose selfishness was not so ready to take the alarm, "but that is a poor forlorn looking thing that Mollison has hoisted up there, and flutters about too much like the old flag-end of nobility, so tattered yet so lofty. Alack a-day, Mrs. Goodyear, it's a sad thing altogether, and a bad bargain my young lord has to come home to, come when he may."

It was towards evening that Lord Arnwood found himself approaching his native home, and the daylight of a short winter's day was just dying away, as from a height which he had much longed to arrive at, he first obtained a view of the distant sea and the naked tower of the Pilot's Mark, and afterwards descried the black turrets of Arnwood. The thoughts of the youth had already been none of the pleasantest, nor is a solitary ride of seventy miles on a drizzling gloomy day in February, after a week's sickness, at all favourable to the dispersion of gloomy reflections. Arnwood, amid the torpor of his weary journey, had been striving the whole day to excite in himself feelings of joy at returning to his home, and meeting his remaining parent. But when he first obtained a view of the old castle, standing bleak and solitary, amid irregular, ill kept, woody grounds, where the old oaks shot up their scattered leafless trunks, and spread forth their ragged boughs over the never-ending brushwood—and where not a living soul seemed stirring around, nor a face was to be seen willing to offer him a welcome, nor a sound heard but the harsh sea-breeze whistling in the leafless wood—when he surveyed all this, his melancholy deepened into a still more unpleasant and even gloomy feeling.

At length the sad inhabitants of the castle were gladdened by the unusual sound of a vehicle stopping at the entrance, and in an instant all the disposable servants were at the door. Mr. Mollison condescended to open the carriage with his own hand, and greeted his lord with a hearty and comforting welcome; while Mrs. Goodyear was overcome even to weeping when his lordship shook hands with her in the hall, as an old friend.

We tarry not to describe the meeting between the noble youth and the solitary dowager of the castle; which, however affecting to both in the first instance, and productive of a transient feeling of pleasure on either side, soon gave place to the overwhelming gloom superinduced by the dreary solitude of the old castle, and the melancholy reflections on the probable fortunes of their house; which were indeed too well grounded in probability, and altogether of a nature corresponding with the spot in which they were engendered.

CHAPTER II.

The quiet solitude of the castle of Arnwood was but little disturbed by the return of the young lord. In a few days he was seen, without being looked at, gliding out and in, and mounting the narrow stairs of the Lark's Tower, to a small apartment near its summit, which he chose to call his study; and there, while the usual economy of the household went on almost by signs, he was occupied in looking out upon the sea when the weather was stormy, or poring over his books—and all with such perfect stillness, that the whole building you would have sworn was tenanted only by the few birds which built among its sheltered nooks, and the ravens which wheeled and screeched round its lofty turrets. Sometimes, indeed, he was observed on the back of an old hunter, splashing and wheeling among the broken hollows near Pirate's Creek, in weather when even to behold such frightful doings, aggravated the excruciating tyranny of Mr. Mollison's rheumatism; and, on other occasions, when the wind blew and blasted so fearfully around the castle, that the man who ventured out of doors found no small difficulty in keeping his head where it was placed by nature, or his feet on the solid earth, the poking major-domo might be found peeping and peering from some of the small loop windows in the tower, and holding up his hands as he descried the young lord flying along the beach in the distance, on his lean hunter, with the spray buzzing round and over him, "as if," as he was wont to say, "seven devils were at his heels."

Some time after his arrival, as the spring advanced, and the weather became more mild and genial, a slight stir took place in the neighbourhood, in consequence of a shipwreck at no great distance—with its various concomitant circumstances, such as the coming and going of persons in authority, the landing and embarkation of men in small boats along the coast, and nightly parties about the Pirate's Creek.

One morning, at this period, just as Lord Arnwood was preparing to go out, a strange, weather-beaten looking man was seen making his way towards the castle, crossing the green sward, and cutting off the angles of the walks where he chose, as he, for despatch and shortness, approached it from the side next the sea. When he had drawn near, he stood before the front entrance, gazing awkwardly about him; until wheeling round, and discovering the door leading into the servants' apartments, he forthwith entered, and was at once confronted by the tall form of Mr. Mollison, who, with great state and dignity, demanded of the stranger what he wanted.

The person so addressed, who was a square-built man, with a shrewd, good-humoured countenance, seemed not of those who are prone to be abashed even by the majesty of a Mollison; but, on the contrary, giving the great man of the pantry a most familiar, and, as the latter thought, a decidedly impudent nod of the head, he began by delivering, with a strong Scotch accent, the following unceremonious enquiry:

"A fine day, friend; is your maister at hame?"

"My master! what is it you mean, sir?" said the major-domo, in consternation at such want of respect.

"Ou ay, your maister. I'm sure ye're no the maister yoursel, honest man, eh?"

"Honest man, sir, how? what are you? how dare you call me honest man?"

"Ou, indeed, friend, ye'll doubtless no be o'er honest; but I just want the gentleman ye see—the maister of this auld black building."

"Master? Is it his lordship you're enquiring for, my man?"

"Ou, ay, friend, I believe he is a lord: I should mind folk's teetles. I want to see him, honest friend."

"You want to see my lord? How dare you speak to me, and of my lord, in this shocking manner. What are you, sir?"

"Poohoo! so ye're taking the strunts, are ye? Deevil the like o' these flunkies and servant men I ever saw; and dare na speak to them for pride."

"Servant men, you scoundrel; do you call me a servant man? Ho! Mark, Robin, Will—is there nobody here to dip this impudent Scotchman in the horsepond?"

"Lord, I would like to see the best flunkie that ever licked a plate, put hands on me!" said the Scotchman, smiling contemptuously, and spitting in his palm as he grasped the short stick on which he leaned, while Mark Forward and others of the servants mustered round to witness the rare excitement of a fray.

"What's all this to do?" said Mark, striking in, and rejoicing at the idea of a quarrel. "What are ye all about, gentlemen?"

"Faith, ye're a coevil like fallow," said the stranger, not less pleased at all times than Mr. Mollison himself, at being so addressed: "Ye see I was just speering in the polest manner at that ill-fared body wi' the meal on his pow, how I would get to see my lord, when, fuff! he gets up in a passion, and scoggles on me like a turkey cock. Deevil sic an a body I ever saw."

"Will you stand there, Mark Forward, and hear me insulted at this rate, by an impudent vagabond?" said Mollison, stamping in a fume.

"Here's a pretty piece of work under my lord's own window," exclaimed the shrill voice of Mrs. Goodyear brought also into the scene; "what is it you want here, good man?"

"I just want ao word of my lord, ma'am," said the stranger, touching his hat with a politeness which was quite remarkable, from contrast with his former roughness.

The sagacious Scotchman, having an instinctive persuasion of female influence, and having almost won the favour of Mrs. Goodyear by the politeness with which he addressed her, followed up his advantage by a speech of such rough manliness and potential persuasion, that she soon prevailed upon Mark Forward, who had visibly enjoyed the humiliation of the butler, to take up the stranger's request, and obtain him an interview with Lord Arnwood.

"What is your pleasure with me, friend?" said Arnwood, as the visitor was ushered into his presence.

"I want to take a bit hoose from you, my lord."

"Take a hoose from me? I have none to let that I know of; and my steward is the man for these matters."

"Ou, I never talk about buzziness to servants when I can get at the maister, my lord, that's my way. Its just a hoose I want, an ye'll gie me 't for a sma' rent—a very sma' rent, nae doot, for it's standing horn idle, an bringing in naething that I can see."

"What hoose is it?"

"Deed, sir—that is, my lord, it can scarcely be ca'd a hoose, ava; and as to any rent, I am sure it is worth next to naething—an' whatever ye'll get for it will be perfect found siller. It's just that auld place doon by the sea-side they ca' the Pilot's Mark, an' it's sadly out o' repair."

"I don't mean to let the Pilot's Mark, my friend."

"Ou yes, my lord, ye'll let it; it'll aye bring in something in the shape o' siller, and ony thing's better than naething: but ye see, my lord, it's no for mysel' I want it, it's for another gentleman."

"Oh, it's for another gentleman," said Lord Arnwood, smiling.

"Deed is it, my lord, an he's a real gentleman, and sair reduced in the world; an' the poor gentleman has set his mind on it, for ye see he is a little odd in his way, since the world went against him, and winna be persuaded; an' I'm sure he'll get his death in it, when the northeasters begin to blast off the sea. But what will be the rent o't, my lord? ye know that siller is siller in thae times."

"What is the gentleman's name, and how has he become reduced?" said his lordship, highly amused with the man and his request."

"His name is Waltham, my lord, and he fell into bad hands, and lost a deal o' siller, and his lady died, and—but ye see it's nae my part to speak about family affairs."

"And you are his servant, I presume?"

"A sort of assistant, my lord, his principal—that is, his general doer, and man of business, baith out an' in. And what'll be the rent o' that rack of a place, my lord?"

"What rent would you or your master offer for the Pilot's Mark, and the seaward land," said his lordship, entering into the man's humour, "if I left it to your own conscience?"

"Hoot, my lord, dinna speak about conscience in thae times, when siller is sae precious. I never heard a gude bargain maker say mickle about conscience on his ain side in my life, whatever he did o' the conscience o' his neighbour; and a bargain's a bargain ony how, as your lordship knows."

"But your offer, sir. How much do you offer for the Mark and its appurtenances?"

"Me offer?" said the Scotchman, with a flourish; "Catch me making an offer! Na, na, my lord—its no what 'll I gie, but what 'll ye take, that's my way of doing business."

"Well then, to be short, suppose I offer it to your master for thirty pounds per annum."

"Thirty pounds! such an enormous soom for a perfect limbo, without a lock or a bolt in order. Na, na, my lord, that 'll never do."

"How did you come, my friend, to find out in what order it is?"

"Me, your lordship? hav'n't I been out through't an' in through't, wi' the key I got frae the crooked eliel at the lodge? Do you think I'm talking about a blind bargain, all this time? Na, na."

"Well, my good friend, instead of thirty pounds per annum, suppose I offer it to your master for five, while it is my pleasure to allow him to retain it."

"Five pounds, did your lordship say? Noo, that's something conscientious.—A-weel, a-weel, I suppose we must gie your lordship the five pounds per annum, payable quarterly, an' possession to be had immediately, and so forth. Noo will your lordship just gie me a bit scrape o' a pen for 't. I like things o' sic importance in black and white."

"No, no," said his lordship. "You must take my word for this, and my steward shall attend to see that this person is a reduced gentleman, as you represent;" and so saying, he had some difficulty in getting the Scotchman dismissed without a written memorandum of so good a bargain.

The man was no sooner gone than something struck Lord Arnwood in this matter, to which his unsuspicious good nature had so readily led him to consent. The Pilot's Mark had never been intended for a regular habitation, but had been used by the former lords of Arnwood, for various temporary purposes of their own, either of pleasure or convenience; and there was something like folly, if not degradation to his house, in giving into the possession of a stranger, even upon the plea of benevolence, a pleasure house of the family, erected on a spot so favourable to smuggling or any other illegal purpose—to which it, for aught he knew, might eventually be abused. However, as he had been abruptly led by the importunity and odd humour of this forward Scotchman, to give his word to its being transferred for a time to the possession of the stranger, all that he could now do, was to give instructions for its being ascertained, whether the new possessor was worthy of his benevolence, and, in every respect, a fit and proper tenant.

Meantime the Scotchman's boat, which had been kept waiting for him in the Pirate's Creek, soon brought him to a small inn, at a few miles' distance, which having reached, he ran up stairs to the apartment occupied by his master.

"Well, Murdoch, how have you sped?" enquired, as he turned round to meet him, a middle-sized elderly gentleman, with a fine expression of countenance, and a nervous twinkle of the eye.

"Ha, ha, ha!" was all our friend could get out, throwing up his arms and bursting into an obstreperous fit of laughter.

"What does the man mean?"—said the other—"Is this the way you answer my enquiry?"

"Ha, ha, ha, ha!"—went on Murdoch, reeling round the room in his unceremonious mirth.

"For God's sake, Murdoch!" said the gentleman, "check this unseasonable convulsion, and inform me of the issue of your mission."

"Mission, sir! dinna speak about missions to me! Lord, I'm nae missionary."

"I'm glad to see you in such humour, Murdoch."

"Humour! Odd sir! I've been laughing the whole way frae the mickle castle—laughing by land and sea, 'till the vera boatmen gird'd wi' me, like crawfish. Lord, I never made sic a bargain, a' the bargains ever I made."

"Then, I presume, you have got the Pilot's Mark for me."

"Gotten it! ay, and for black naething! ha, ha, ha! I've often heard, that lords and gentles were fules; but sic a born idiot, as yon sweet-mouthed lord, I never saw. To gie awa a place like the Pilot's Mark, for thirty pounds a year, it's perfect nonsense."

"Well, I suppose that is cheap enough, Murdoch, as you say so."

"Cheap!—He sought thirty pounds—but do ye think I make bargains that way? Na, na, what do you think of sic? Na, its true, sir—five pounds a year! as I shall answer.—Ha, ha, ha! Yon a lord? He's a perfect fule. Kears na mair about making a bargain, than a cow does about a chest o' drawers."

"But, I fear, Murdoch, that you have succeeded through some imprudent narration of my circumstances. I should be sorry —"

"Me, sir! Na, faith! I've kent the worl' over lang for that. Ca' a man puir indeed? in thae days. Na, na—your rogue 'll get plenty of friends, but your puir man name."

"That was wise—and now tell me, Murdoch, what sort of a man is his lordship?"

"Ou, a weel far'd lad—as plain spoken as you or me; an' quite conversible, for a' his lofty look. But it was astonishing how he laughed at me, an' he sic a fule himself."

"It would not be astonishing, if I were to laugh heartily at you this moment, Murdoch, if I were in spirits for such an indulgence," said the gentleman sadly. "But how did you manage to make your way into his lordship's presence?"

"Manage, sir! Ha, ha, ha!—sic a brulzie as I had wi' a whole posse o' mealy-headed scoundrels—but I gar'd them a' stand round—for ye see, sir, there was a sonsie woman o' a housekeeper; a widow she was, I could see by the tail o' her ee—an' I soon saw my cannical road; so I set myself to tickle the gray mare,—for ye ken sir, women are women; an' pooh! I was na a blink o' getting in afore his lordship."

"Well, Murdoch, you have managed this business very well: and now I must caution you, when we get there, to keep as much out of sight as possible, and never go towards the castle; and, above all things, keep a shut mouth, if you're to have a day's peace."

"Hard conditions, maister—the last in particular."

"And get every thing as decent as possible, and as comfortable as circumstances will permit."

"Ou ay, maister, nae fears o' me; an' there's plenty o' lime for white wash, an' I'll make you so gontee! an' Miss —"

"Hush! Hayn't I told you, Murdoch, never to mention her name."

"Gude sake, maister!" said Murdoch; starting at Mr. Waltham's earnest manner. "Ye put a bung into my mouth, when I offer to speak about the lady, as I were naething but a sounding bag."

"Murdoch, beware; I tell you your tongue is your only enemy."

"Deevil a bit, sir. It's my only friend. What was it that got you the Pilot's Mark, that ye hae set your mind on, but my tongue, maister?"

"Not forgetting your thorough impudence, Murdoch. But come, you know what is necessary to be done; and set about it instantly."

The spring advanced, and still Lord Arnwood persisted in remaining at the castle, living in almost unbroken solitude. Some slight changes had, however, taken place in this retired neighbourhood, which served as materials for the vacant gossip of the slender community, and secured them from the desperation of reading, or thinking, or any similarly troublesome resource of compunctious idleness.

One of the events alluded to, was the preparation which had actively commenced, for the intended coming of Mr. Bolton, the great rich squire of New Hall, at the large staring building, which, as we have already said, overlooked the irregular pleasure-grounds of Arnwood, (to which its cut-paper gardens and lands had originally belonged); who, with all his train, was shortly expected to give life and spirit to this deserted neighbourhood. That he would do all this was evident, from the bustle and activity that prevailed among the cloud of tradesmen, artisans, and artists, by whom the quiet solitudes of Arnwood began to be invaded and disturbed; and the endless importations of furniture, provisions, and wines, intended to supply the profuse luxury of the establishment.

The other principal event which employed common gossip, was the strange conduct and appearance, when a sight of them could be had, of the singular occupants of the Pilot's Mark; who had taken up their abode in this lone, starved-looking, and inconvenient building, with such unobserved celerity, and mysterious silence, that it might have been supposed the sea had thrown them up out of its womb, or the clouds dropt them under the lee of Hall Hill, the sterile appendage to their comfortless habitation.

Meantime, the preparation and profusion appearing daily at New Hall, began to excite such envy among the domestics at the dull castle of Arnwood, as no pride of family and title, of which servants always partake, could long stand against. The cook and the kitchen maids began to whisper together in dark dissatisfaction, and the footmen scowled at my lord, and even at their more delicate lady, and began to lay plots and plans, born of rebellious discontent, as their teeth watered at the thoughts of the tempting perquisites of extravagance, and the pleasant and neighbouring windfalls of profusion.

These symptoms (particularly after the éclat of the arrival of Mr. Bolton and his friends at New Hall), had their full effect upon the melancholy dowager and her proud son; who, with the sensitive jealousy of conscious poverty acting upon mental and family elevation, began even to watch the countenances, and to understand the feelings of their own servants.

This state of mind on the part of the young lord, was confirmed by the effect of a serious communication with his mother upon the affairs of their house. The anxious and depressed dowager entered into a long detail of the circumstances that had straitened the property of Arnwood during the life of her husband, which no after economy or prudence had been able to re-adjust; and concluded by laying her serious commands upon him to pay his addresses to the squire's sister, and, by marriage with her, to renovate the honours of their house. We need hardly describe the manner in which this proposal was received. But to Arnwood his mother's commands were sacred, and the restoration of his family paramount to every other selfish feeling, so that he not only consented, but at length indulged the desire of accomplishing the sacrifice.

CHAPTER III.

There was by this time gathered into the mansion of New Hall every variety of people; country squires, and city squires, and jockey gentlemen, and good shots, and five-bar-gate gentlemen, and picture dealers, and villa builders, and musical amateurs, and seafaring gentlemen, and fat ladies and their lean daughters. All these, and more, were congregated at New Hall, all in their turn, and sometimes altogether, compressed into the ample area of the mansion.

And besides these, there were other sorts of zoological varieties rushing in crowds, with vehicles, dogs, and servants, on their backs, or at their tails, as the case happened, towards this hitherto secluded neighbourhood.

How the corks flew, and the wine flowed! while the hall echoed with the fantastic music and the volatile heels of the dancers, and the welkin rang with the huzzas of the guests, until the night wore away in feverish joy, and the pure morning appeared fresh and odoriferous over quiet dale and woodland.

The contrast between the profuse on-goings at the hall and the economical monotony of the old castle of Arnwood was indeed very remarkable. Philosophy itself, at least all that Lord Arnwood could muster, was not proof against the tantalising display, and ostentatious waste of wealth, thus held up before the eyes of his calculating economy. It is not surprising, therefore, that the secret repinings and involuntary feelings of irrepressible envy which exist in human nature under such circumstances, should have extended more undisguisedly to the servants at the castle; all of whom, from the great Mr. Mollison down to the very scullions and market-boy, became first discontented and mutinous, and then began to melt away one by one for engagements at the Hall, until Arnwood was in danger of being left without a servant. Even the lofty major-domo began to deliberate upon the expediency of resigning the pride of birth, laying down the emblems of legitimate nobility, and losing the remembrance of buried greatness, for the substantial fatness of New Hall; and Mrs. Goodyear was absolutely wild with envy and vexation, at her own lot, since one of the maids who had left the castle and gone to the Hall, had already achieved a husband from the flock of dissolute serving-men domesticated with the wealthy squire.

But Lord Arnwood might glance with as much affected contempt as he pleased over the swarming grounds and smoking chimneys of New Hall. Wealth is wealth: and at length many persons whom Arnwood justly respected began to condescend to partake of the hospitality of his rich neighbour; and after a time, his own pride gave way before the reasonings of his mother, and a few civilities having passed between them, he finally accepted an invitation to spend an evening at the open house of his neighbour.

The remaining servants at the castle thought the world was turned upside down, and that chaos was come again, as they assisted their lord into his carriage to go to dine with Squire Bolton; and his lordship proceeded, reasoning with himself as he went upon the influence of circumstances, and the inevitable necessity to which men and things are forced to submit, and which often brings about the strangest occurrences, and baffles all the calculations of experience.

But Mr. Bolton, who never troubled himself about any necessity but the necessity of company, without which he could not exist, was so far a man of the world that he knew how to assort his guests; and he contrived, upon this occasion, to select the best specimen of his friends and companions to meet Lord Arnwood. And in truth, the company of men conversant with the world, even though their knowledge include a familiarity with the worst part of it, cannot, in our opinion, be unserviceable to a young man just entering life, even in a moral point of view; at least, we think we may assert, without danger of contradiction, that a knowledge of the world does not necessarily contaminate the mind or paralyse the feelings; and that in most cases, to speak plainly, a great deal more depends on the soil, than on the seed.

We have made this slight digression for the purpose of accounting for the readiness with which Lord Arnwood fell into the humour of his host and the habits of his company; and though, at first sight, there did appear to be something in the ceremony of the household, if not repugnant to, at least hardly in accordance with, the aristocratical notions and feelings of the guest, yet as there was no lack of that which supplies the want of every other charm—an apparent heartiness of welcome—it would have seemed something worse than coldness or reserve, had he given Bolton cause of suspicion that he was insensible to his advances.

Indeed every body seemed to be met together for the common purpose of unreserved enjoyment. There were few ladies present, and those few offered but little restraint to the preponderating sex; some of whom, perhaps, would have submitted to no such tyranny as the presence or influence of well-bred women is usually supposed to institute.

As it was, Mr. Bolton himself stood out in advantageous relief. He was a man of about five-and-thirty years of age, of a hale rotundity of aspect, in which constitutional good-humour was blended with an acquired shrewdness, rather perhaps, to the disadvantage of the former; and every thing in his person, manner, and address, bespoke him a man perfectly well acquainted with the external forms of society up to a certain point—yet with an alloy of positive vulgarity, and offensive grossness.

In a religious devotion to the bottle, however, he was excelled by none, and he applied himself to his congenial duties upon this occasion with a fervour that could not but prove contagious to his admiring companions. It was too evident that they were all set in for a carouse under the special patronage of Bacchus himself. From these devotees Lord Arnwood with difficulty escaped to the drawing-room, where company, if not more attractive from its intrinsic excellence, yet from other causes more interesting to him, awaited his attention.

Miss Bolton was a female fac-simile of her brother; lively, entertaining and agreeable; with all the factitious vivacity of a young lady educated in London, and with that vocabulary of small talk, which among those most interested in its details, readily passes current for native good sense and polished wit. She seemed by no means disposed to discourage the advances of so altogether eligible a person as Lord Arnwood, but was, on the contrary, bent upon making him her exclusive object of attention for the evening.

It was during an interesting tête-à-tête in which the young pair were engaged, that the other gentlemen entered the drawing-room from below.

"Do you see that, squire?" said one of his friends, winking an eye, and his forefinger applied to the opposite side of his nose with peculiar elegance, as he looked across to Arnwood and Miss Bolton, "there's something for you to look at."

"What is it?" asked the squire, who was far from sober, and could not see very clearly.

"Do you not see how Miss Bolton and that young sprig of nobility are flirting? How would you like the title of Lady Arnwood for your sister friend Bolton?"

"My Right Honourable Sister!" was all that the squire could say, parodying the exclamation of Overreach.

"Well, Bolton, what say you? You know we are not marrying men, therefore confess—elucidate."

"I don't know that I would allow Beckey to marry this boy, with all his pride. What comfort would the girl have with a fellow that sits all day over his books in the castle yonder, and can't take his wine of an evening like a gentleman?"

"Nothing very extraordinary in that," remarked a pinched faced person, a rich citizen from the metropolis, "for they say he is mad."

"Mad! hush, he will hear us! But what say you—mad?" said Bolton, who had, after all, some thoughts of trying to match his sister with Arnwood, and was by no means pleased at such a surmise.

"Yes, mad!" said Sir Jacob, coarsely; "I have it from a gentleman who was his tutor and companion, and who travelled with him all over the continent."

"How mad, sir; pray how?" enquired the squire.

"Why, how are half your fashionable people mad? from having too much money perhaps, or too little: or from having too much to do if they are in the cabinet, or too little if they are out; or because my lord is not made a duke; or my lord's sister has married a swindler; or from twenty other causes."

"God keep us out of ear-shot of you when you get fully mad, Sir Jacob," said Mr. Bolton. "But you have not yet said a word in the case of Lord Arnwood."

"Pardon me, Mr. Bolton," replied the other, "I would not speak evil of dignitaries, although Mr. Johnston says this lord is an idiot, and that the very servants call him the mad Lord Arnwood. Who knows, after all, but he may be your brother-in-law ere long?"

"Not so hasty, sir," said a severe looking person, edging in; "you talk as cheaply of men of family and title as if we could buy and sell aristocratical connection on the stock exchange. If you could make out that to be the case, I would speculate to the utmost extent of my fortune."

"Think you so, Hulson?" said Mr. Bolton, a dark scowl coming over his countenance, a frequent and inexplicable expression which interrupted his ordinary and constitutional good humour; "think you lightly of the power of money? I tell you a poor lord may be noble in character as well as blood; but as a man among his equals, and with man's infirmities, he is a daily sufferer, whose case is deeply to be commiserated."

"Perhaps you are right," said Sir Jacob, somewhat amazed at the nature of this remark, so altogether different from his own narrow speculations.

"And I am not to be told," continued Bolton, sternly, "what money can do; I know it, sir, I know it well."

"Well," said Hulson, wishing to revive the original gaiety with which he had commenced, "there they still are—Miss Bolton and this young lord—as prominent as the two figures in the picture of courtship."

"Pon my honour, we are a pretty set of fellows," said the host, changing the discourse, "crowding together here, and leaving the ladies to themselves;" and so saying, and setting the example, the group separated and mingled with the company.

The gentlemen were however, after a short interval, driven again to their wine; and soon became more vehement in their mirth, and more irregular in their conversation. Groups were formed for the expression of more private feelings, according to the degree of friendship subsisting between the parties, and hands began to be grasped, and toasts to be drank, as friendship, inebriety, or good-humour dictated.

In the course of this flow of soul and wine, Mr. Bolton having succeeded in getting Lord Arnwood close to him, talked with considerable freedom, and, as the latter thought, with much good sense, upon various matters foreign and domestic. But his lordship could not help remarking that he occasionally allowed to escape strangely profligate sentiments, and showed a stern decision of character very different from that, which, from the rosy good-humour and bluff hospitality of his open countenance and frank demeanour, a stranger might reasonably have given him credit for.

Mr. Bolton, however, seemed anxious to cultivate the friendship of Arnwood; and before they parted, reproaching him for the distance he kept, and hinting at matters which he could not have ventured to speak of in his sober moments, he begged that he would make use of his friendship without reserve, seeming extremely desirous of the honour of serving him. The company at length grew tired of one another, and even of the bottle; the wine became flat and sickening, and the murmur of confused talk, and the shout of the occasional bacchanalian stave began to die away, as the guests dropped gradually off towards their apartments, and Lord Arnwood was suffered to depart.

When he reached the door the moon was shining brightly over the landscape, although it was near day-break; yet, in spite of the lateness of the hour, with the perverseness of inebriety, he would not consent to make use of the carriage that waited, but insisted upon walking across the lawn and through his own grounds to the castle.

Wrapping therefore his cloak around him, he set off to brush the night dew from the green sward, and proceeded on foot over the irregular grounds towards his own home. He managed to pilot his way by the moonlight through the clumps and shrubbery, although sadly perplexed by the dark shadows flung from them over the park; and he mounted one or two of the green slopes which interrupted the plantation, standing still occasionally when he came to an open spot, and gazing upon the scene with excited admiration.

He had approached the side of a line of chestnuts, and was making his way over the sward at considerable speed and in much good-humour with himself, when he heard distinctly a foot tripping in the shadow of the trees almost close to him.

"Who is there?" he called out quickly—but the foot stopped, and no reply was made.

Again he pushed forward, and again the foot went, trip, trip, by his side.

"Come along, friend, whoever you are," said Arnwood, calling out without apprehension, "and let us go forward together."

No answer was returned, but a human figure was now visible, moving in the shade of the trees.

At length, as he began to walk slower, and to keep a look out on the dark side, a man's voice struck up with the not unpleasant warble of a song.

"A pleasant stave enough, friend," said Arnwood, when he had ended, "and the more so that I had no right to expect such entertainment among these bushes and brakes at this hour of the night."

"It's morning, Lord Arnwood," said the voice.

"Faith I believe it is, honest friend," replied Arnwood, pleased at the probability of an adventure.

"You're in high spirits, my lord," said the voice.

"Pretty much so, my invisible friend," said his lordship, "and the morning is beautiful, as you see."

"There are light days and dark days to us all," said the stranger, to his lordship's surprise, although he thought the voice, or at least the accent, was not unknown to him.

"There are so," said Arnwood.

"But there's a time to laugh an' a time to weep, my lord," continued the voice, descending into its natural accent. "An' ye hae heard fine things the night nae doubt," said the Scotchman, drawing near.

"True enough, friend; but hadnt you better give me another stave, since you favour me with your company homewards?"

"Ou ay, I've no refuse a song after your lordship has been up at the big hoose there, eating the fat, an' drinking the sweet with Dives an' his crew. But mickle ye'll make by that, if ye kenn'd but a'!" and Murdoch struck up these strange lines.

When the hawk parts wi' his wing,
Gentle John, simple John;
And the lavrock winna sing,
Gentle John—simple.
When the corbie kames th' lambkin's head,
An' feeds the crow with flesh and bread,
You may say its news indeed,
Gentle John, simple John;
Gang an' tell your news with speed,
Gentle John—simple.

"A strange ditty, my friend," said Arnwood, beginning to get sobered,—a "very strange."

"Ou ay, my lord, but there's many strange things in the world, an' ye see I hae a bit word o' sang just to fit ony thing that happens."

"Have you indeed? But what earthly occurrence can be fitted by the Sybilline stuff you have now uttered?"

"Ay, man, that's just the question!"

"Who are you, friend, crossing my lawn at this unseasonable hour?"

"Do ye no ken me, my lord? Dinna ye mind Murdoch Macara, o' the Pilot's Mark? Faith I'm no afraid to tell my name. An' if I take a short cut through the ground o' this dismal castle, an' gang a bit out o' my road to sing your lordship a sang, an' guide you through the park when ye're a wee the waur for drink, odd—is n't that a friend's turn?"

"I the worse for drink? how dare you say so?" exclaimed Arnwood, laughing at Murdoch's plainness.

"Gude faith, my lord, it's naething but a gentleman's case to be staggering hame fou, at twa in the morning. I ken nae better folk than them that tak a drap o' drink now an' then. It's better may be than sitting in an auld turret, or on a rock o' the sea, getting the merlises i' your head, like your lordship and my ain maister. It's my notion that that was the way the folk turned themselves into warlocks, an' took up dealings wi' the devil himsel, langsyne, the Lord preserve us."

"Does your master live in the Pilot's Mark, then?"

"He does, my lord, canny an' quiet."

"Quiet he must be, for I've never seen nor heard of him but from yourself."

"Ye hae muckle to see an' hear baith, my lord, that ye dinna think of just now; an' my maister kens —"

"Well, sir, what does your master know?"

"Ou naething; that is, it's no for me to speak about gentlefolks' affairs, but my maister is an odd man, an' he kens mair than he says about us all, an' about the drunken young squire above, and about what's to happen, for he's a woary reader o' books, and ye see he's concerned for your lordship, an' grateful because ye gi'd him the Pilot's Mark to live in; an' he says —"

"What does he say?" said Arnwood, somewhat impatiently, as Murdoch hesitated.

"He says he does not like to hear o' your going to gorge wi' the herd o' cattle up i' the squire's house yonder; for he says that it's like the snare o' the fowler, an' the trap that's hidden among the blossoms and the bonny flowers on the brae;" and the Scot hesitated again and looked up in Arnwood's face.

"Go on, friend; I want to know your meaning."

"Ou, naething, my lord, but he kens the lady that's the squire's sister, and he says you'd better be waury; but for all that, he aye says—"

Every man maun dree his fate,
An' every bird will hae its mate."

"Does he say so?" said Arnwood, as the man stopped, looking hard at him in the moonlight.

"But ye see, my lord," continued Murdoch—"there now, I've brought you near to the black old castle. Heh, it's a gruesome looking place for a young gentle like you to be living in at the age o' twenty, wi' naething but your sickly lady mother, sitting a' day listening to the ticking o' the clock. Oh, oh! When I was your age!—but it's just as Mr. Waltham says:—"

Every man maun dree his fate,
An' every bird will hae its mate."

"But I say, my lord, never heed my clavers, only take tent o' the squire, take tent o' the squire! But now, as the ghost in the play says—"

The cock begins to crow,
An' the day begins to daw, an' so a sound sleep an' a blythe wakening, my lord."

With this the eccentric Scotchman turned off, and darting into the nearest plantation towards the sea, was instantly out of sight; while Arnwood, somewhat sobered—by this adventure, having reached home, retired to his apartment.

CHAPTER IV.

Lord Arnwood's intimacy at New Hall increased daily; and, with that felicity of self-adaptation, which mankind has consented to call habit, he would doubtless have resigned himself to the influence of the society into which he was thrown, and been content to settle down into a better sort of country gentleman—with the additional blessing of a wife in the person of Miss Bolton—had not one or two circumstances occurred in the meantime, rising like beacons to warn him of his danger.

These circumstances, however, it would be difficult to describe, or rather they are not worth the trouble of description; the effect being produced by the thousand almost imperceptible nothings which, occurring and uniting in the still life of society, resemble the coral insects that build islands in mid ocean. Certain small traits of character, in addition, had been discovered in Mr. Bolton, which would not have been visible at a first glance, even in the least artificial natures; and the occupant of New Hall was not one of those men who are said to "improve upon acquaintance."

If, however, the expediency of breaking off all further connection with Mr. Bolton, and of resigning his as yet unannounced pretensions to his sister, had been previously a question with Lord Arnwood, the affair was altogether decided one day at a dinner party at New Hall, by the unexpected presence of Mr. Johnston, his former tutor. This circumstance, of itself an evidence of the squire's real feelings towards him, coupled with the now obvious fact of a recent but close intimacy between the two worthies, was sufficient to stimulate the jealous pride of the young lord, who, impatient of the company at the squire's table, contrived to depart at a much earlier hour than was consistent with the bacchanalian habits of his host.

The mansion of New Hall was situated nearer to the Pilot's Mark than to the Castle of Arnwood; and as it was yet early, although becoming quickly dark, his lordship preferred walking home, taking a circuit by an avenue that skirted the foot of Hail Hill, and in the direction of the lonely building by the sea, called the Mark, towards which he felt an involuntary attraction. After a smart walk he had passed the Mark, and reached a rising ground at the extremity of the plantations belonging to the castle, and above the cliffs; where he stood for some moments inhaling the fresh sea air, and musing, as he looked seaward, upon the still night-scene—when he perceived through the darkness a man stealing up from under one of the green conical banks which lay between himself and the Mark, and formed a sort of boundary to this part of his property.

"Who comes?" enquired Arnwood, somewhat taken by surprise.

"Who are you that asks?" grumbled the man, in no civil tone.

"You are insolent, sirrah!" said Arnwood, the surliness of the man's reply stimulating still more the angry feelings which the wine and the company had tended to excite.

"I wonder who it is that calls me insolent," retorted the man, drawing near in the dark, for Lord Arnwood had stepped into a narrow pass which ran along the brow of the cliff, and led towards the Pirate's Creek below. "Stand off, I say!" added the unknown, apparently ignorant of the rank of him whom he addressed.

"You pass not without giving account of your business here," said Arnwood, his suspicions awakened; and with more bravery than prudence he stood forward to stop the stranger's passage.

"The devil I don't!" and the fellow came rudely forward.

"Do you brave me?" said his lordship, giving the man a push; "Stand off!"

"Stand off!" repeated the other scoffingly; and in an instant they came in contact and grappled.

Arnwood struggled with the stranger in the dark, more from momentary passion than from any definite spirit of opposition, or feeling of apprehension; but he speedily found that his strength was much inferior to that of the broad, muscular and full-grown man, who held him in his gripe. He continued to wrestle bravely with his unknown enemy, until they turned the brow of the cliffs, and a fall being the consequence, they rolled together, Arnwood holding his adversary firmly in his grasp, until they fell over the edge, and were both precipitated a considerable space among the rocks below.

The stranger in a short time recovered sufficiently from the fall to get upon his legs; though not without several groans at the pain of his bruises, and curses upon the adversary who had helped him to this unlucky adventure; but Arnwood neither moved nor spoke—lying to all appearance dead among the rocks.

"A pretty fellow you must be, to wrestle with Bill Weathersheet," said the large heavy man—looking down on his prostrate antagonist; "and yet working starboard and larboard, as furiously as if you had been as broad in the beam as a first-rate. Confound the rocks and the stones! they have nearly stove in my hull timbers. Hollo, old fellow!—I think ye ha' gotten a raker in this last tack; Haigh! By the powers, he does'n't stir!"

When the man found that his unknown adversary still lay motionless, with some alarm, and many exclamations, delivered in a mixed nautical phraseology, he began to raise him up and turn him round, until finding that he exhibited no signs of life, he at length lifted the youth upon his back, and in this manner carried him to the Pilot's Mark. When he arrived there, he stopped for a few moments at the low Gothic door of the building, to consider what he ought to do; the result of which reflection led him to give it two or three kicks with his foot, his hands being employed with the burden he carried.

"What's there?" cried a voice within.

"Please you to open the door, Mr. Macara," said the man with the burden; "it is Bill Weathersheet, with a pirate, or an exciseman in tow. For God's sake open the door, and let in the living and the dead, or else come out with a shovel and pickaxe."

"What's the matter, noo? What is it ye want, Will Weathersheet?" grumbled the voice of Murdoch, as he unwillingly drew the bolts. "Could na ye come in by the back door? Deevil sic an unfortunate body as me alive! Rest nor peace I can get nane. The maister is nae sooner gone to bed, an' me set down to draw my breath in peace and quietness, but dunt gangs the door, as loud in this back o' beyont place, as if it were a public change house."

"Here's a bad job, Mr. Macara; just stand out of my way."

"Eh! Lord guide us, what's that? A dead man!"

"Shut the door, you Scotch idiot! If he's dead, you may take the hanging on yourself, for keeping him so long outside."

"What do you say about Scotch idiot, ye blackguard? I wish I had you, and your dead game, on the windy side o' the door again; I would teach you manners—for naming Scotchman an' hanging thegither. Lord 'a mercy me, what's this? what's this?" exclaimed the Scot in a frenzy of terror, as he looked upon the pallid features of Lord Arnwood, who was now laid on a bench before them.

"I told you it was a bad job," said the sailor, contemplating the body—"but he can't be dead. And he's a gentleman too—Lord, Murdoch, they'll hang us both!"

"God forgie you, William Weathersheet, if ye hae murdered the young Lord Arnwood."

"Lord Arnwood?" echoed the man, starting with amazement.

"I tell you!" exclaimed the Scotchman, almost crying, "that is Lord Arnwood, o' the black cattle aboon. God forgie you! God forgie you! But I think he's no' dead; he's only in a dwam. An the bluid's streaming frae the back o' his head. Haud aff your hands, Will Weathersheet, you an' me are no' fit to doctor a lord."

Saying this, Murdoch took the lifeless body in his arms, and telling the man threateningly to stay where he was, he forthwith carried his charge up stairs to a back chamber, muttering to himself all the while, as he went—

"I'll bring him up to the Lady Agatha, if the maister should brain me for it. She's the only one to restore him; an' she'll wash his face wi' a sponge, an' revive him wi' smelling draps, an' she'll dress his head wi' her white fingers, as gentle as a pet lamb, and wi' her vera kindness she'll bring him to—if the life's in him. Och, och! the bonny young lord, that gied us this quiet dwelling for a perfect wanworth. Hech, hech! I've often heard, that lords an' nobles were fules an' tyrants, but there's my ain maister an' Miss Agatha,—an' there's this genty lord; they're every one kind and considerate, out an' in, and wad na harm a flea. Och, och!"

With many such lamentations the Scot carried Lord Arnwood up, laid him on his master's bed, and set about restoring him; acting, however, by the orders of one who soon made her appearance, and seemed no novice at such benevolent offices, and who commenced dressing his wounds and performing the part of his nurse with an anxiety and gentle skill which were soon successful.

Arnwood was for some time in that state of half-consciousness in which surrounding objects are seen and voices heard, without a distinct perception of the reality of either the one or the other. At first, he felt a soft hand holding his own, and the fingers pressing his pulse. A pale female face seemed, sometimes to be close to his, so that he could feel her warm breath upon his cheek; and the long dark hair which fell from her stooping head, while she dressed his wounds, he felt sweeping gently over his neck. Then his awaking eye fastened and dwelt upon a figure which reminded him of a Grecian sculpture, watching in a sitting posture, between himself and the light; and while dreamingly contemplating the features which he was too giddy to see distinctly, he thought the dark hazel eyes beamed upon him with such a lovely expression, that whether sleeping or waking, his involuntary admiration caused a sigh to escape from his breast.

At this moment the figure rose, and seemed to bend solicitously over him; and though his eyes were half closed, he perceived her smile with so captivating a softness, that believing himself to be in a dream, he lay motionless; fearing to break so delicate a vision.

At length he looked long and steadfastly, as if striving against the drowsy confusion of his brain. He perceived himself to be in a small bed-chamber, neatly arranged; the furniture being rather separately elegant than consistently tasteful. The figure of the lady, however, still attracted his interest so exclusively, that as he gazed upon the graceful bend of the body, between himself and the single taper—the neck tangled with long dark hair, and the features perfect in their outline and expression—he was unable to suppress the exclamation—"Lady! how is this? Where am I?"

The lady started, as if suddenly alarmed, and rising up and glancing towards him with a pleased smile, his eyes followed her as she silently glided out of the room.

Lord Arnwood, with swimming head, was making an effort to sit up in the bed, and trying to decide whether he were in a dream or not, when the figure of Murdoch Macara came on tiptoe into the room.

"How do you feel yourself, my lord?" said Murdoch, with all a Scotchman's effort at politeness, and pleased to see the patient looking better.

"I feel strangely," said his lordship; "are you the Scotchman of the Pilot's Mark?"

"Ou ay, my lord. Faith I'm glad to hear your Englified tongue again. God! I got sic a fright wi' you. Faith I thought your lordship had kicked the bucket."

"Kicked what?"

"Ou naething. I see you're no used wi' Scotch folk. Hech, but I'm glad to hear you speak! I aye think there's little fear o' folk when their tongue keeps waggin'; that was the vera word John Tamson used to say to his wife."

"Oh, my head, my head," groaned Arnwood; his pain and confusion of brain returning.

"Just whisht, my lord," said Murdoch, shaking his head and winking, as one would do to hush a child; "just lie down an' be quiet for a minute, for ye see my lord, you hae gotten a sair demish, an' nae doubt your head's whirlin' round."

"What is this that has happened to me, friend?"

"Ou naething, my lord, but just a bit crunt on the crown among the stanes. But it will be hale against the morn. Od, I've seen an Eirishman wad hae gotten his head dang as braid at night as a pease bannock, an' gin the vera next day the fallow would be deevil a hair the waur o't."

Having indulged himself with this morsel of talk, while he was prescribing silence to the patient, Murdoch tripped cautiously away, and then returning with Will Weathersheet, they carried Arnwood down stairs, and laying him upon a sort of litter which they had hastily furnished with blankets, in less than half an hour they had him brought to the entrance of his own castle.

Arnwood had sunk again into a half-conscious state as they were carrying him home; but when he found himself in his own apartment (Murdoch being in the meantime occupied in answering the enquiries of the alarmed servants, by telling them that his lordship had merely met with a slight accident) the young lord waved his hand for the domestics to retire, and leave Murdoch alone with himself.

"Where have I been, my friend," enquired Arnwood feebly, "and what has happened to me? for I feel both pain of body and confusion of mind."

"It's naething ava, my lord, but just a bit accident that happened on your road hame frae the muckle hall aboon, wi' a wee drap drink in your head. Od, ye never gang near that place but something happens your lord."

ship. But ye see, there's naething extraordinar' in a drunken squabble an' a broken crown."

"But was there not a lady?"

"Lady! your lordship's perfectly in a mistack. Wha was aboot you but only mysel an' big Will Wathersheet? an' twel' he's no like a lady; wi' a pair o' whiskers on his haffits, an' as mickle black hair as wad fill a mattress. Noo, my lord, slup to your bed. It's nae good for young gentlemen to let ladies run in their heads."

"I am certain there was a lady," said Arnwood, musing; "I could not be deceived; I am sure of it."

"Hoot, my lord, just keep yourself quiet. Ye've been dreaming; young men are aye dreaming aboot ladies. Lordsake! think ye that ladies are to be found on the sea-shore like cockle-shells; an' wha ever heard o' a lady in sic a lonesome place as the Pilot's Mark?"

"Then I have been at the Pilot's Mark?"

"Ou ay, my lord. But ye're a great deal better noo, an' just be advised to slup to your rest, and here's my gausey acquaintance, the housekeeper, got up out o' her warm bed to see after you."

The housekeeper and other servants entered as the Scotchman left the apartment, and his lordship was soon settled for the night.

The effect of the fall that Lord Arnwood had met with among the rocks, was more to stupify and confuse him, than of any serious consequence otherwise, for the bruises were but slight, and having once been dressed, began to heal rapidly. The giddiness and swimming in his head, however, and the confused and painful sensation, confined him to bed for two or three days after the accident.

When he awakened on the following morning, he tried to recal with some distinctness, a recollection of the events of the preceding night, but with little success; the impression of a delicious dream with which his slumbers had been visited, and the supposed reality of the previous night, were so mingled together. But among his confused reminiscences of something real, of falling over rocks, and of being carried home in the open air, the most vivid and interesting was that of a strange lady, a figure very different from Miss Bolton's, moving gently about him in an unknown apartment; and he remembered distinctly certain long tresses of hair falling over a beautiful Grecian face, placed between himself and a single taper.

With these were blended some vague fancies about the mysterious tenant of the Pilot's Mark, whom he had never yet seen, and regarding whom he began to be uneasily curious; for the notion had taken irresistible hold of him, that this strange person was in some manner, as yet unknown, destined to become linked or entangled with him and his future fate.

And yet he blamed himself for allowing one of whom he knew so little to obtain a footing so near him; as sometimes persons will call themselves, when too late, to account, for doing a thing from motives of benevolence or kindness, of which they do not very clearly see the real end or purpose. And this he did from the very reasonable motive which directs people whose tranquillity is liable to be easily disturbed, and whose feelings are easily affected, to be proportionably cautious how they place these valuable instruments of happiness at the disposal of others.

In consequence of such fancies and reflections, he determined within himself to see the stranger of the Mark, and to ascertain from his own lips what were his station and mode of life; resolving that if he should, from all he could learn, come to any unfavourable conclusions, he would immediately eject him from his present asylum.

Agreeably to this resolution, he ventured down towards the shore on the fourth day after the accident, determined to walk to the Pilot's Mark, and ascertain in person something more satisfactory regarding its mysterious occupant.

He was proceeding leisurely along on the sands, the day being warm and still, watching the slow ripple of the waters upon the shore, and occasionally looking out upon the small craft which lingered on the trembling waves towards the seaward horizon, when he perceived, under the cliffs on his right, the figure of an elderly man, reclining in apparently indolent meditation upon the bank. He judged that this could be no other than the occupant of the Mark, from the little likelihood of any person coming from a distance being so much at his ease in so solitary a spot: but after observing him for a while, his constitutional delicacy overcame his first resolution to address him, and he passed on.

The other, watching Arnwood, and seeming to perceive his intention, after a few moments' hesitation rose and came forward, while his lordship stood still expecting his approach.

The stranger, a man about fifty, his appearance dignified and even impressive, on drawing near raised his hat with respectful politeness, showing a well formed reverend head, quite bald on the top, which added much to the impressiveness of his pale care-worn features, and said "I believe I have the honour of addressing Lord Arnwood."

"You make no mistake, sir," said Arnwood.

"It is full time, my lord," added the gentleman, with tremulous seriousness, "that I should make my acknowledgments to you for giving me (for so I may call it) the retired domicile beyond the creek, which I am assuredly most grateful for. I am the person who occupies the Pilot's Mark, my lord, and your tenant, since you choose so considerably to put a nominal rent upon the place."

"I am happy that it has been in my power," replied Arnwood, "to render you any obligations, but you greatly overrate this trifling service."

"Those who have nothing to give in return, seldom receive an obligation; and when they do, they cannot easily overrate that which is so valuable from its rarity."

"Nay," said Arnwood, interested by the old gentleman's manner, "I trust that favours, more worthy the name than any thing you allude to, are not so very rare."

"Retain your opinion, my lord, while you can, but I am an old man," and he shook his head.

"But, sir," said Arnwood, drawing nearer, and wishing to come with delicacy to his object, "there surely must be something peculiar in that case which makes a gentleman express so much gratitude for such an inconvenient solitude as the old building you occupy."

"Every case seems peculiar when considered by itself."

"You will excuse me," said Arnwood, "but I have some curiosity to know why you chose this melancholy spot, or how a person of your appearance should prefer so to seclude himself; and whether you are comfortable in the Mark—and, in short, whether I can further serve you."

"Pray be plain, my lord. You have some suspicions regarding me, and wish to know something of my way of life."

"I wish not to be intrusive, but, in so sequestered a neighbourhood, even our idleness and self-love make the character and actions of others the subject of scrutiny."

"True; and that scrutiny has given me to know, that you are well worthy the confidence of an unfortunate gentleman. As to how I live?—look abroad upon that wide and deep ocean. It is often raging and tumultuous, and swallows up the small and great; but its mighty fury is the sublime energy of nature, which those who have suffered from the treachery and inhumanity of mankind can look upon with admiration; for while these great waters so often engulf the merchant and his gold, they throw gently out upon their yellow sands a simple subsistence to an unfortunate like myself."

"Thus, my lord, I exist, while you allow me to live in this much valued solitude. Do you see that little dark spot in the offing? that is a small boat wherein my poor faithful Scotch servant, Murdoch Macarn, and another, are drawing from the prolific deep my means of subsistence and comparative content."

"But, pray do not think me impertinent, sir—your fortune? for surely"

"You are right, my lord," said the stranger. "I had fortune once, fortune that I thought inexhaustible; identified, as it seemed, with me and my house. I dreamed, as others do, that it would descend to my posterity also, as it had descended to me. But time is continually unfolding to us the great truth, that we know nothing, and that our presumption never appears more striking than when we attempt to speculate upon human destiny."

Arnwood was unable for a moment to reply to this speech of the remarkable stranger, partaking as it did of a train of thought which his own circumstances had led him to indulge. But his curiosity to learn more of his new acquaintance being strongly excited, he ventured to make the enquiry—

"And pray, how has your property been taken from you?"

"Can your lordship tell me how that cloud in the sky has obtained the fantastic shape it now bears?" he replied, looking reverently upwards, "or from what region in the heavens it has come, or where it will be, or what shape it will assume, by to-morrow night?"

"I cannot."

"Can you tell from what point of the heavens the lightning will shoot forth, or where on earth the bolt will fall, or whom it will strike and destroy? If you cannot tell how destruction comes, can you tell how the rose-bud opens in summer? If not, how can I show you the real cause of my misfortunes? Ask any of the ruined men, whom you may see wasting the weary hours in the neighbourhood of a metropolis, and he will tell you a common-place story, full of wearying details of the harassing calamities of civilised life. He will tell you of fine prospects which totally disappointed him, and promising events which ended in ruin. He will tell you of false friends and hidden enemies; and so could I. All these things are palpable to our senses; but of their hidden springs, or their ultimate end, we are without understanding."

"You have, then, been deprived of your fortune?" said Arnwood.

"Yes, my Lord; and while I, its rightful owner, pine here in poverty and solitude, my destroyer wastes it in riot and extravagance. You may imagine the like in that great, great mansion," he added, turning towards New Hall, "which like a bloated upstart, seems to overlook, almost with scorn, your own venerable castle."

"And all this is done to you wrongfully?"

"Truly, my lord, by bitter wrong."

"And might you not recover it by law?"

"I might not," replied the stranger, with a sad and resigned look.

"And pray, sir, why?"

"The law is not for men when they are poor. The law is a luxury to the vindictive man, or the amateur of legal justice; and the poor have no luxuries except religion and a good conscience, and these are luxuries which but few of the rich have much enjoyment of."

"Pardon me, sir: but if any one has obtained your property illegally, as you seem to intimate, you are surely wrong in not seeking its restoration publicly. The law would compel him to restore it."

Mr. Waltham again shook his head, and after a pause continued. "The law, my lord, is very good and very efficient, as a general instrument for the distribution of good and evil, in a way that often baffles human calculation; but, like other monsters begotten by civilisation, it is, as I have said, very much subject to the power of money, which I am now without. But even supposing I were able to pay for, and willing to encounter, the anxieties and risks of a chase after justice, I am now convinced I should be only striving in vain against my own fate."

"Your fate," said Arnwood.

"Yes, my lord, certainly."

"Pray explain yourself."

"I cannot explain, my lord."

"No?"

"Men," continued the stranger, "have in all ages made children of themselves, by attempting to explain things of which they are ignorant. For my part, I hold it to be more consistent with reason and dignity to be silent. But I see my boat approaching the shore, and honest Murdoch with his fish," said Mr. Waltham, rising and moving towards the sea. "Their dinner will be more luxurious at New Hall than our's at the Mark."

"Can I do you any service, sir," said Arnwood, "by an introduction to Mr. Bolton at the Hall?"

"Mr. Waltham only shook his head, and said, 'the gossip of the neighbourhood informs me that you are about to marry Miss Bolton. Do not expend your feelings or waste your time upon what is not to be.'"

"I am very much obliged to the neighbourhood for the earliness of its information," replied Arnwood smiling; "but how know you? Do you know any thing against the lady?"

"I know nothing of importance either in her favour or against her, my lord, but I am much deceived if she or her fortune will ever be your's."

"You surprise me by the strangeness of your prognostications," said Arnwood; "be kind enough to explain, I entreat."

"It is not to be," replied Mr. Waltham, turning from him and moving towards the boat. "Good morning, my lord."

Lord Arnwood returned home deeply interested by the stranger's conversation, and determined upon taking the first favourable opportunity of meeting him again.

CHAPTER V.

The preparations for an entertainment to be given at the castle on his coming of age, now entirely occupied Lord Arnwood, and required him to go several times to the nearest considerable town: so that his mind was in general diverted from the subject of the conversation just detailed, and the other matters with which his thoughts were usually occupied.

The effect of these employments, together with his occasional visits to New Hall, was seconded by his own efforts to prevent his mind from recurring to any thoughts but those of future happiness and good fortune. The only thing that disturbed these ideas, and at times gave him real uneasiness, was a vague and dream-like recollection which haunted his imagination, of a female face and figure, of such romantic beauty and perfection, that he could not bear to dwell upon the real or fancied image, while a union was contemplated with a person so entirely dissimilar as Miss Bolton. Sometimes, while conversing with the latter, and looking in her face as that of his proposed companion for life, the lovely image of the other came so vividly before his fancy, that he felt convinced of the reality of her existence, and that he must have seen such a being, and received at her hands the soothing services which, he dimly remembered, had excited his interest on the occasion of his accident at the Pilot's Mark.

When the morning of the day which he had so long anticipated, at length arrived, he started from his bed at an early hour, and looked out upon the broad landscape, and upwards to the sky, as if surprised to find that this should be like other days, and should come without any distinguishing peculiarity. But truly on this calm morning, "no prodigy appeared in earth or air." The rich green of summer showed every object on brake and woodland, only by the depth and darkness of its various shades of tint, as they seemed yet to slumber under the dewy mist; not a breath moved the leaves on the old oaks of the lawn in front of the castle; and even the bleak sweep of Hail Hill in the distance, receding behind the stalwart nakedness of the Pilot's Mark, seemed to-day to smile with unwonted warmth and emulous vegetation.

As he looked thoughtfully towards the sea on the left, nothing, he imagined, could be more interesting than its appearance on this his birth-day. A single dark sail lingered far in the offing, beyond which, along the whole horizon, a streak of white light marked the morning sky, and gleamed upon the farther sea; which slumbered so quietly, and murmured so musically soft, that its calmness seemed to convey a reproach to all who, on a morning like this, could suffer their hearts to beat with any vain anxiety about what the day was to bring forth.

A great day this was, however, at Arnwood castle, and an unspeakably great man was Mr. Mollison, the chief servant and director of the external and internal economy of the important affair. Mrs. Goodyear, the housekeeper, had scolded for a whole fortnight past without intermission, which she did mechanically and with perfect good nature, whenever there was anything to do; and the other servants were in a state of excitement, much like the crew of an old laid-up man of war, clearing the deck for an unexpected engagement.

The farmers, his lordship's tenants, for whom he had prepared a dinner on the lawn, shortly after their usual hour, soon began to muster with their wives and daughters; a new flag, which Mr. Mollison had made ready for the occasion, fluttered gaily from the flag-staff on the top of the Lark's Tower, and the park began to assume quite a lively appearance. The Rev. Mr. Stone, the much respected rector of the parish, made his appearance, his old carriage newly painted; and shortly after came Mr. Bolton and his sister, accompanied by Mr. Hulson and Sir Jacob Benson, his particular friends.

Lord Arnwood found it, however, a less easy matter to preside at a banquet, and take the lead in a festive entertainment got up to express joy, than he had supposed; for to "mimic sorrow when the heart's not sad," is infinitely less difficult than to maintain a joyous countenance and affect mirth under the pressure of contrary feelings.

But while his determination was strengthened to make himself agreeable to the Boltons, and condescending to the friends whom they had brought with them, his dislike of the squire, augmented by his conversation with his new friend of the Pilot's Mark, unaccountably increased. His mother had appeared at the table only for a moment, and Mr. Stone, the venerable rector, not seeming to enjoy himself, had retired early, and he was thus left entirely to the society of the squire and his friends. Whether it was that the unavoidable prospect of a connection, the thought of which had always hurt his pride, now more than ever pained his mind, as he contemplated it closely; or that the boisterous coarseness and drunken freedom of the New Hall gentlemen were this night more apparent than usual—certain it is that these circumstances, added to his involuntary recollection of the mysterious hints of the strange person of the Pilot's Mark, had an extraordinary effect upon his feelings in the course of the evening, and greatly increased the disgust with which he began to regard his guests.

As they went on to drink deep, his perceptions seemed to be sharpened, rather than blunted, by the wine he swallowed, and he perceived evidently that the squire and his friends not only made more free than usual, but that their frank joviality and vulgar coarseness amounted to a disrespect, if not contempt, of himself. Forgetting, therefore, in his indignation, how great a leveller of all conditions is the inspiring juice of the grape, he watched the words and manners of his guests with a critical and haughty jealousy.

Lord Arnwood had remarked on some former occasions, that when Mr. Bolton had drunk freely, he was in the habit of disputing upon the power of money—just as some men contend about religion when they get into the same state; and that praise of the rich, and sneering ridicule of the pretensions of those who were comparatively poor, were always favourite subjects of drunken conversation and congratulatory flattery, as the hour grew late, between himself and his friends.

This night, however, they carried their speculations upon the subject, a topic upon which Lord Arnwood was naturally exceedingly sensitive, to a pitch that roused all his pride of family; and he retorted upon Sir Jacob, one of the squire's friends, in such terms of contempt, as showed that his inward indignation was fast getting the better of his usual efforts at self-command.

"It may appear to you, perhaps, my lord," said Sir Jacob, "that my friend Bolton speaks too strongly; but, after all, what business has any man to think this and the other of himself if his bank account is at low water; or what can a man expect to enjoy in this world, if he cannot pay for it?"

"Very little, truly," said Arnwood, thoughtfully; "but I merely ventured a remark upon the misfortune it is to virtue and good feeling among men, as well as to the general diffusion of happiness, that such opinions should be recognised and applauded; while I expressed a wish that the advantages of commerce could be enjoyed with less of that degrading and unhappy concomitant, which I regret to know is so general in this mercantile community."

"It is not for you or I, my lord," said Mr. Bolton, "to trouble ourselves about the state of society and the diffusion of happiness, and all that."

"Upon my word, I believe not," replied Arnwood; "and yet one cannot help sometimes lamenting that shopkeeping prejudices should have in many instances reached the higher classes, to the destruction of all elevated feeling; and that thus the great national value of an aristocracy is so far lost."

"I should be glad to know what your lordship means by shopkeeping prejudices," said Bolton, warmly. "I can't understand what sort of pride any man can have if it is not in his money and his money's worth; and if you mean by shopkeeping prejudices the practical sense and prudence of substantial men who have made their own fortunes, I say it hardly becomes those to talk against them who have scarcely one guinea to rub against another."

"It becomes every one to speak the truth, sir," replied Arnwood, contemptuously, "to those who have capacity to understand, and a disposition to relish it. But I fully grant that to many it is bitterly unpalatable."

"Truth—ha—ha!—as if there were any want of truth. There is no want of truth as far as I can see, but great want of money in this world," said the squire, winking significantly to his friends. "I wonder what your lordship will treat us with next? The diffusion of happiness, no doubt, or the amelioration of society, ha, ha! I never hear a man talk of these things, but I begin to suspect that his pockets are d——d empty, or that perhaps his coat is out at elbows, ha, ha, ha!"

"And I never hear a man talk as you are now doing," said Arnwood, his wrath throwing completely off his former restraint, "but I strongly suspect that he is a disgrace to his species, and is, in short, to use your own phraseology, d——d worthless."

"How dare you say so to me?" said Bolton, with the greatest wrath: one would think from the way you talk, that you had something to uphold your aristocratic pride; that you were not obliged to borrow money of your own neighbours, who are able to buy you—young man—yes, to buy you, and this old rat-trap of a castle, twice over."

"For God's sake, gentlemen, drop this argument, and this unbecoming language," said the others, now interfering.

"I wish to give no offence, I am sure," said Mr. Bolton, unable to endure the laughty intensity of Arnwood's look of defiance. "But what is the use of a man's money if he must submit to hear such language?"

"You are like people of your stamp, sir," said Arnwood, with more calmness, "if you think that a principal use of it is to furnish an excuse for insulting those who possess it not, yet have pretensions and qualities which throw it into comparative contempt."

"A very likely matter, ha, ha," retorted Bolton, laughing scornfully, "but I have sworn it—and no poor lord, who cannot afford to look over his own door, shall ever form a union with me, or feather his hungry nest with my good money!"

"I have long had a strong suspicion, sir," said Arnwood, with bitter scorn, "that money obtained by (and he whispered a word in Bolton's ear,) would bring me neither comfort nor honour."

"What is it you say, my lord?" said Bolton, rising and gasping with horror at the mention of a word which Arnwood had received from Mr. Waltham of the Mark; "take my defiance, and dare to repeat that word again, and—"

"Ha! forget you to whom you presume to offer defiance," said Arnwood; "wretched man, if the mention of a word thus affects you, your defiance I despise."

"You are a villain," exclaimed Bolton, rising and striking the table with violence.

Lord Arnwood made no verbal reply, but taking up the glass of wine before him, threw it into Mr. Bolton's face.

The quarrel had now gone beyond all management, and Mr. Bolton, who seemed perfectly astonished that any man who was not rich should dare to resent his insolence, was quite furious; and was with difficulty restrained by his friends from attempting to knock his entertainer down.

"When shall we meet to settle this," said he, as soon as he could recover breath.

"As early as you please," answered Arnwood, with perfect calmness.

"To-morrow morning, then,—and you shall be my second, Hulson," said Mr. Bolton to one of his friends present.

"Why not to-night?" said Arnwood sternly, and almost happy at the opportunity of giving vent to his roused feelings; "why not this instant; the moon will be sufficient light for such work as this."

The proposal was after some moments agreed to, and pistols being objected to by Arnwood as likely to alarm his mother, it was agreed that they should fight with the small sword, and soon the whole party descended the stairs together.

They proceeded to some distance in the rear of the castle and towards the shore, to find a spot free from shadow.

When they had arrived at a convenient place, not far from the remains of the chapel before noticed, and the family burying-ground, the combatants took their swords and commenced with great fury, particularly on the part of Bolton, who pushed with ferocious desperation; but a few passes showed the superior swordsmanship and coolness of Lord Arnwood. The latter soon assumed the offensive, and pushing his adversary hard, wounded him slightly in the shoulder; when the scream of a female was heard behind them, and instantly a stranger wrapped in a cloak rushed between the combatants.

"Desist—put up your weapons!" said the intruder.

All present seemed amazed at this interruption, while the combatants took breath.

"And is it you, Lord Arnwood?" said the interrupter of the duel, "how often am I to find you warring against your fate?"

At the sound of the voice, Mr. Bolton started; and when the stranger turned so that the moon shone full on his face, and showed the features of Mr. Waltham of the Pilot's Mark, the former seemed paralysed, and ready to drop into the arms of his second.

"My lord, put up your sword, and seek your home," said Mr. Waltham; "you may as well attempt to stab the air, as to do that which fate has reserved for me to accomplish. Be content, and leave to me the pleasure or the crime of taking the life of that villain, when the steady finger of Heaven shall point to the day and the hour of his ultimate destiny.

"What is this? How are you here?" exclaimed Mr. Bolton, his choked voice gasping with horror as he stood staring upon the stranger.

"Go, miscreant!" said the latter, turning to the squire. "Go, sir. For the present you are safe. Every thing abides its time."

"What can all this mean!" said Lord Arnwood. "How is this, Mr. Waltham, that you interrupt me in taking vengeance on this man?"

"Vengeance is mine!" exclaimed the stranger of the Mark. "It is not for you to talk of vengeance while my wrongs remain unavenged."

Here Mr. Bolton strove to say something to Mr. Waltham, but his agitation was so great that nothing intelligible could be made out. These seconds now interfered, and whispering to Lord Arnwood that his adversary was wounded, the latter was led slowly off the field.

"What brings you here at this time of night, Mr. Waltham?" again enquired Arnwood in surprise.

"This is neither the time nor the place for explanation: meet me on the beach to-morrow morning, and I will explain all; you have been in darkness too long:"—and he prepared to depart.

"But tell me, I entreat you, how knew you we were to meet, and here?"

"To-morrow I will satisfy you," replied Mr. Waltham. "Did I not tell you, that you were not to marry Miss Bolton? But farewell!" and he moved from the spot.

As Lord Arnwood turned towards the castle, he could not refrain from looking round to ascertain whether any one had accompanied Mr. Waltham to the scene just past; and as he watched for a moment, he distinctly observed a female form emerge from the shadow into the open moonlight, when, taking her conductor's arm, the pair proceeded onwards in the direction of the Pilot's Mark.

CHAPTER VI.

Lord Arnwood was punctual to his appointment on the next morning, actuated by no slight impatience to hear from the lips of Mr. Waltham such particulars of his history as would, at the same time that they cleared up the mystery attaching to his extraordinary tenant, discover the relation that had heretofore subsisted between him and Mr. Bolton; and while they laid bare the character and former pursuits of one whose reputation, even in a worldly sense, was now more than doubtful, would place him upon his guard against any future overtures or correspondence that might be made or sought by him.

With this view, no sooner was he seated by the side of his new friend, than he besought him earnestly to disclose those events in his life, which more especially related to his neighbour of the Hall.

"On a previous occasion, Mr. Waltham," said he, "you alluded to your own experience, and to events in your past life; pardon my curiosity—but your circumstances seem so remarkable, that it would gratify me much to know something of your history."

"It is painful to me to speak of sad events," sighed Mr. Waltham, pressing his hand on his heart, "but I owe to you any thing you ask, that may even by chance gratify or instruct you. But the tale of a stranger's life, which will occupy some time in the narration, may only weary, without interesting you."

"I feel that what you may please to tell me regarding you, will interest me much," said Arnwood, "pray proceed."

"You were of age the other day, my lord: I came of age five and thirty years ago, attended by an éclat that seems now astonishing to me, when I think of all that has since happened. Without entering into particulars regarding my forefathers, I shall only say, that my father was of a collateral branch of a noble family, well known in—shire. Having a turn for mercantile adventure, rather than employ his time in pursuits merely fashionable, he entered into various speculations, connected with the public securities, and with our Indian possessions, in which he was singularly fortunate, and amassed riches as if by magic.

"Thus when, by the death of my elder and only brother, I found myself the heir to all the wealth accumulated by my father; and when, under these circumstances, I became of age, there seemed to be no end to the feasting and rejoicing, with which the day was hailed by crowds of worshipping sunshine friends. In like manner, shortly after my father died, there seemed to be as little end to the property of one kind and another of which I was the inheritor.

"I was now a man of large fortune, and launched into society, and into all the expenses to which I was advised by those who were best fitted to prescribe to me the conduct becoming a rich commoner of England. I kept large establishments in town and country, which I never visited; and laid out grounds and erected buildings for which I had no use. I kept a number of servants who tried to make me vain, if, indeed, it was possible to augment the vanity of which I had so sufficient a share—but these were more a plague to me and a restraint, than an addition to my enjoyments; and, in short, I committed all the enormities, which seem so common-place in the telling, that persons born to much wealth are so prone to fall into in the thoughtless wantonness of abundance."

"Were you very happy, sir, in the enjoyment of such ample means of gratifying your wishes?" said Lord Arnwood, interrupting him. "It may appear absurd in me to ask such a question,—but did you enjoy life very highly, when you had all this wealth?"

"Not very highly, my lord. But I should have been a churl or a stoic, if I did not enjoy the world very much, in a certain sense, at least for a time. To be sure, this facility of obtaining whatever my wanton fancy wished for, made me something of a voluptuary; and, at length, I often felt wretched and worn out from very satiety, and the want of something that was worth sighing for, but which was beyond my reach. Still it would be to adopt the ignorant cant of preaching poverty and envious vulgarity, if I did not admit, that, upon the whole, I enjoyed life extensively; and that I saw and heard such things as they only whom some natural taste and abundant wealth have admitted into the third heaven of luxury, both in the refined and sensual meaning of the word, can know or conceive.

"I admit with the vulgar, that, although I had twenty houses, I could not live in more than one at a time: nor of my scores of beds, could I use more than very few myself—and the same with the horses in my stables, or the dishes on my table. Yet I will not allow, but that there is much pleasure in the consciousness of having, and being able to enjoy, if men would only use their blessings, as blessings;—and it is glorious to have no care about the sordid wants and petty anxieties which harass nearly all mankind."

"Allow me to ask you," said Lord Arnwood, as he paused; "did you exercise much benevolence in circumstances so favourable to that virtue? I should really like to know if, when you had such means, you were of much service to others in the world, by contributing to lessen the amount of human suffering. You see, sir, I draw upon your candour."

"I cannot say that I did," answered Mr. Waltham, "to any material extent; and to tell you all the reasons would involve disquisitions which must be tedious to you. To say truth, I positively knew nothing of the sufferings of the unfortunate among my fellow men, although I had amply the power to relieve them. In fact, I was quite ignorant of human life and its deprivations; how then could I sympathise with misery which I hardly could conceive; or how should I be expected to relieve suffering of which I was too rich to have the most distant apprehension, and too thoughtless and wanton in the gratification of my own wishes, to understand either the nature or the intensity? In fact, I knew nothing of the world until I myself experienced misfortune and calamity, and learned to know the depths of social sympathy, and the solemn seriousness of even physical evil.

"In my thirtieth year, I was surprised at finding that my money was not inexhaustible; and that, in fact, my affairs were in a state of confusion, which, in the course of the year, became still worse confounded." I was alarmed, and grew thoughtful, at the bare idea of such an impossibility as the miracle that I should not be rich; and waxing serious and romantic, as I became comparatively poor, I began to admire and to hate in good earnest. I discovered also that I had fallen into the habit of talking of the qualities of the heart and understanding, as I came to know my own weaknesses; and I now looked abroad, and discriminated character, and admired beauty—and moreover, I, for the first time in my life, fell deeply and seriously in love.

"I married a lady of no fortune, but the most amiable, I might say the most admirable, of human beings. We retired into the country, where we principally resided for several years, and where I was made the happy father of two daughters, as simple and beautiful as their angelic mother.

"But there was one event happened before my thirtieth year was completed, besides my marriage, which fully awakened me to thought, and prepared me in some measure for the changes that followed. This was the circumstance of my non-election for the seat in parliament I had occupied with perfect credit to myself, and satisfaction to my constituents, for the previous six years. At this election, there started a competitor in the person of a Colonel Corvet, who set about opposing me with the coolness of a military veteran, and the science of a man who was accustomed to, and, if necessary, prepared for any disappointment.

"I hardly knew, however, what disappointment was, and making light of the colonel's opposition, because he professed comparatively nothing, I, with the natural reliance in the all-sufficiency of money, put myself to no trouble in trying to defeat what I considered an attempted impossibility, and merely gave orders to my agents to take care that I was returned as usual, and that no expense should be spared in showing the colonel the folly of his efforts.

"On the first day of the election, and part of the second, my voters were so numerous, compared to those of my opponent, that I only laughed at the impotent ambition of poor men; but what was my astonishment, after having gone home to my house, considering the election finished, when intelligence was brought me that I had lost my seat by a single vote! I started up in amazement and rage, for the purpose of trying if another vote or two could be found, when I was told that the whole number had been already polled, and that the colonel, amid loud cheers, had already been declared duly elected.

"The effect this defeat had upon my feelings at the time, and the wound it gave to my pride, I cannot adequately describe, though I now look back upon the irrational inroad upon my tranquillity, caused by the event, with the contempt it deserves. I did not then perceive that, by means of this evil, the wise planner of my destiny was training my mind for the enjoyment of mere rational happiness, and, against my will, making me a wiser and a better man.

"Although the loss of the contest helped, in the first instance, to reduce my fortune, it, upon the whole, turned out a happy occurrence; for in the event of success, I should have lived in town in my former style after I had become unable to afford it, and so have hastened my ruin. Still I had much property in the funds, and also in West India possessions; although I found that my distaste to any thing troublesome had been well taken advantage of by several intermediate persons, who contrived to secure a tolerable profit from my losses by arts of which I was then ignorant.

"Thus, although I lived chiefly with my family in the country, in comparative moderation and economy, events occurred year after year in my affairs, which, in spite of my prudent regulations, were gradually, as I saw with alarm, reducing me to the dreaded situation of an impoverished gentleman. If ever it was true, that riches, in some cases, by the particular guidance of Providence, make to themselves wings and flee away, that an overruling fate destined one man to be poor and another to be rich, it was exemplified in my history. For, until the age of thirty, every species of property belonging to me became enhanced in value, and, notwithstanding my extravagance, seemed to accumulate; while, after that period, notwithstanding my utmost economy and best management, every thing deteriorated, or was totally lost to me.

"At one time, by the advice of my banker, I was induced to embark largely in a scheme which totally failed, leaving me and several other capitalists to bear the loss to a large amount, while its original projector contrived to pocket the wreck of the assets; at another in order to pay off the engagements in which this speculation involved me, I was forced to sell a beautiful estate in Sussex, and took bills for it upon a mercantile house in London, which became bankrupt at the same time with the purchaser, before the bills became due, and thus, besides my former loss, I lost my valuable estate, receiving a dividend of about two shillings to the pound only, upon upwards of seventy thousand.

"In short, without troubling you with particulars which would be as tiresome as a sick man's history, his complaints, every thing I attempted for the recovery or security of my remaining property—every exertion which my anxiety for my now-increasing family prompted me to make, only ended in aggravating evils they were intended to avert; and in drawing from me, by piecemeal, a property which once seemed to be inexhaustible.

"I now hasten," continued Mr. Waltham, "to that part of my history which brought me in contact with Mr. Bolton. Alas, there are some men whom we meet in the course of our lives, whose very names come to be pronounced at last with pain, almost with horror!

"The truth began now to be forced upon me, that the anxiety of mind which marked my latter years, was as vain and even blameable as my former wanton thoughtlessness; that there is an overruling providence, or a shaped-out destiny to which it becomes mortals humbly to submit, and which they strive against in vain. I saw plainly that there is an unseen power that taketh down one man and setteth another up, as sure as that cause produces effect; and whether it be the predestination of Saint Paul, or the fate of the philosophers, I agree with the stoic, who holds that there is an invariable succession of things ab eterno, the one involving the other, which, in spite of our ignorant wishes or impotent efforts, shall place each of us while we live exactly in such circumstances as are destined for us.

"At all events, after twenty years, during which I incessantly declined in fortune, although I increased in wisdom, I began to be convinced that tranquillity of mind, under unavoidable events, is a greater acquisition than is generally supposed; and I endeavoured, as much as possible, to prevent my thoughts from dwelling upon coming evils, which I well knew it was impossible to turn aside.

"My property, however, was originally so large, and of such various denominations, that, even after the successive misfortunes of twenty years since my marriage, I still retained what many would have deemed a good fortune. But I did not now live at all in the style I once had done, which my acquaintances perceiving, many of them treated me accordingly. This I expected of course, yet still the realisation of an expectation so unpleasant, pained me and filled me with disgust.

"I set myself down with my family in the pleasant city of Brussels; and now my daughters, who were almost women, began to — Alas, my lord," continued Mr. Waltham, after a pause, "this begins a painful part of my story. I may not talk to you of my daughters, but a father is fond and partial, and the admiration they excited in others confirmed the opinion their mother and myself entertained of them, and enhanced the delight with which we beheld them as they accompanied us, and as we watched every idea they imbibed, and every sentiment they expressed.

"While we lived in Brussels there came a young Englishman, who, in addition to a prepossessing address and a good person, had attained the character of possessing considerable wealth, which, of course, entitled him to an introduction to the principal English families residing in the place,—particularly to those who had unmarried daughters. By this time, although we lived in tolerable privacy, my daughters had begun to attract much attention; and this person, who was no other than Mr. Bolton, contrived after some time to get introduced to my family. Although I seldom saw him, he managed to become a favourite with my wife, and a showy guest to my daughters, whom he constantly pestered with his attentions.

"At this time I meditated some plans with regard to certain portions of my property; and, he having a talent for business, and considerable knowledge of the world, I consulted him something respecting them. He listened with eagerness, from an apparent desire to serve me; and, by artful inquiries and insinuations, drew from me a general statement of the situation of my affairs. By turning my heart and blaming my head in matters of business, with what seemed a manly freedom—smiling at my ignorance, and wondering how I should let myself slip;—showing me in what danger this property was; and how much more productive another might be made—he, in fine, obtained all my confidence, and induced me to grant him powers of attorney to transact business for me in London, and to make various bequests, such as he recommended.

"From a natural abhorrence of business which I did not understand, yet with an ominous misgiving of mind, I suffered myself to be prevailed upon to execute deeds, which gave him powers over my property, with which I was now astonished I could ever have invested any. Shall I get rid of the blame attachable to such conduct as this, by pleading that I was only doing what I seem to have been fated to do? I know not; but as I intended every thing for the best, and was in fact impelled to the imprudence by anxiety for the welfare of my family, perhaps infatuation, in the popular sense of the word, will be the better term of the two.

"However, I saw no reason then for doubting that I had done wisely, nor did I even dream that, whatever Mr. Bolton had previously been, I had, by my unlimited confidence, placed a temptation in his way which few mere men of the world are able to resist.

"After his departure, my wife, who had been declining in health for some time, became so much worse that I grew seriously alarmed, and begged the physicians to say if, by any step that could be taken for her benefit—any possible management, any change of place or difference of air—there was the slightest chance of recovery; for, cost what it would, I was willing to undertake it. They recommended a trial of sea air for a short time, and advised a voyage to the island of Madeira, which we forthwith prepared to undertake.

"My great anxiety was now about my daughters, as I intended to accompany my wife on her voyage, and could neither think of taking them with us to encounter the dangers of the sea, nor was easy at the idea of leaving them behind to incur the perils of unprotected youth and beauty on land. While deliberating on this subject, my thoughts turned to the family of an elderly gentleman of the most retired manners and orderly habits, who, with a single unmarried daughter, lived in a delightfully situated woody lane in the suburbs of the city, and under his roof I proposed placing, until my return, the precious charge of my heart.

"Before I left Brussels, I received letters from Mr. Bolton at London, stating, though in terms extremely brief and vague, that he had executed my orders in most particulars to his wishes, and, as he doubted not, to my satisfaction; adding, that he hoped to see me in Flanders upon my return from the voyage which he understood I was about to undertake. My anxiety about my wife's health, however, was at this period so great, that I thought little of any thing else; and suffering myself to be satisfied with what was stated in this letter, and the arrangements I had made for my daughters, I embarked with my dear dying Angela on our voyage to the island of Madeira.

"But when I at length found myself on ship-board, and my lovely girls weeping at parting from their mother and me, and thought that I was about sailing from the shore where I was obliged to leave them, the grief of a father and a husband quite overcame me; and while I looked in the face of my angelic wife, now hectic and wan with sickness, and then in those of my blooming daughters as they clung to us, my excited feelings became strangely mixed with portentous anticipations of some approaching disaster.

"But I did part from my dear children, and I saw their mother part from them for ever. Alas! I did embrace for the last time my beautiful Eliza. I did receive her affectionate pressure. I did feel her filial kisses upon my cheek. How little did I think then what was to be her fate—that I was never to see her from that hour to the present.—Ah, I am an unhappy man! Excuse me," continued Mr. Waltham, much affected, "this is a sad subject to a father."

"Do not let me distress you," said Arnwood, "I would not hurry you with your story."

"Not to trouble you with the particulars of my voyage, by the time we reached Madeira my dear Angela seemed so much better, that I was induced to contemplate a stay on the island for a considerable period, and we purchased a house and conveniences for that purpose. But the hopes that at first flattered me were, after a residence of some months, totally dissipated, and my wife seemed evidently in an incurable consumption. As she grew worse, an intense anxiety seized upon her to see our children once more, and, fearing the worst, I hastily embarked with her to return to Belgium, from which we had only once heard since our departure nearly a year before. The only vessel I could find was a small one, bound to an obscure port in England, and in this I placed her, knowing the readiness with which we could there obtain conveyance to the asylum where our beloved children were placed.

"We were not more than a few days at sea on our voyage homeward, when a visible alteration took place in my dear wife; and while I watched her in despairing anxiety, I saw death gradually changing those sweet features which had not lost an attraction in twenty years. One night as I sat up with her, the midnight watch having been set, and every thing as silent as death upon the black waters, I saw, by the dim cabin lamp which swung slowly over her with the dull roll of the ship, that life was drawing to a close, and that time to her was to be no longer. I saw her beckon to me, and stooped to receive her last words.

"I only heard a whisper or two at first, which I could not understand; but at length she spoke a few words clearly and distinctly: 'Few—few,' she said, 'have lived as you and I have done for twenty years! I have seen misfortune and loss coming gradually upon us, but I praise heaven that no change has occurred in our affections—alas! I only grieve that I am taken away from sharing with you whatever evil may be to come. Ah! I wish is, that, if possible, I may be buried in England, and that you may be spared to take care of my daughters, whom I am never to see more.'

"She died! she died, repeating the name of our child Eliza, for whom some ominous anxiety seemed to oppress her.

"Think of my feelings," continued Mr. Waltham, much affected, "for six days after this, as I lay in my small cabin, with the corpse of my dear wife lying cold and changed beside me!

"Will it not appear to you strange, that the first English land we saw one morning was that very headland called Hail Hill; and the first prominent object that struck us, as we drew near the shore, this very building, well denominated the Pilot's Mark, which I now occupy by your benevolent condescension? By a bribe to the seaman, I caused them to land me and the remains of my dear wife in this identical bay, called the Pirate's Creek; and by the permission of your honoured mother, during the time your lordship was abroad, my Angela was buried in that romantic old burying-ground, near the cemetery of your own family."

"My God!" exclaimed Arnwood, involuntarily, as he recollected the evening when Mr. Waltham interrupted his duel with Mr. Bolton near the same spot; "and your daughters, where are they? Surely I saw —"

"The eldest I have never beheld since her mother and myself parted from her in Brussels. Alas! how can I think of it; and that villain —"

"But the other?" said Arnwood, impatiently. "You had two; and this lonely building where you live is no place for ladies."

"She is safe as yet," replied Mr. Waltham, waiving the question; and then, after a pause, he continued thus—

"Shortly after my poor Angela was laid in the earth, I set out alone and dejected to meet my daughters at Brussels. My passage across the channel I thought insufferably tedious; and when at length I drew near to the city where my children dwelt, I could not reason myself out of an impression that hung like the nightmare upon my spirits—a dark, formless, anticipation of astonishment and woe."

CHAPTER VII.

"When I arrived at Brussels, and entered the house in which I had left my children, I thought the very servant who opened the door looked strangely in my face, as if he knew something that he dared not tell me; and instead of my daughters coming to meet me on the stairs, only one, the youngest, after some time, crept slowly into the apartment into which I had been shown, as if ashamed to see me. I asked Agatha for her sister; I looked round in dread; I made twenty enquiries in a breath; but my other daughter did not make her appearance; and the poor child at my knees was only able to answer me by sobs and tears.

"It was some time before I learned the extent of my misfortunes. Mr. Bolton, in whom I had so confided, had found the temptation to use, for his own advantage, the powers I had entrusted to him, too strong for whatever virtue he originally possessed. He gave way to that temptation, and by arts which it would be tedious to unfold, not only appropriated the whole of my remaining property to himself, but in order to screen himself from public opprobrium, spread the most infamous reports regarding me in Brussels in my absence, to which city he returned some months after I had left it.

"This man had long loved my eldest daughter, and while I was still rich, and his own possessions considerable, he had paid his court to us both as humbly as if he considered the possession of my child's hand in marriage almost too much for him to hope for. But the moment he was master of my property the state of the case became totally changed. He retained all his love for Eliza, but had lost his respect, because she, by his own villany, was now destitute of fortune. He therefore set about turning the impression he had made upon her by his long continued assiduity, to the gratification of his passions, by the accomplishment of her ruin."

"Heavens!" interrupted Lord Arnwood, "and how, Mr. Waltham, when you knew all this of Bolton's character, could you live on my estate and hear of my entertaining, for a moment, the idea of becoming connected with the villain, without giving me such information as would prove a warning to me against so detestable a union?"

"There was little occasion for warning you," replied Mr. Waltham, "further than the rhyming hints delivered to you by my servant, Murdoch Macara, which you may remember hearing one moonlight night, as he conducted you home from New Hall—or the word I prompted you to speak in the presence of Bolton, which was the cause of your quarrel. No, my lord, I knew your character too well to apprehend any such union."

"In brief, Bolton had made use of all the usual arts of a crafty seducer to get the poor child into his power; to which indeed the formality of life and unsuitable restraint imposed upon my spirited girls in the family of Mr. Toller, instead of being a preventive, were only too favourable. By false reports concerning me and the posture of my affairs, and by a constant assiduity, more I imagine than from any regard inspired by himself, he succeeded, as I have since heard, in making my unfortunate daughter desirous of an union with him; he then persuaded her to consent to its taking place in private; and next, under pretence of having the ceremony immediately performed, he induced her to leave the house of Mr. Toller clandestinely with him, and no doubt completed her ruin—for there he lives in my very neighbourhood, while I have never heard of my unfortunate child since."

After a few minutes' agitated pause, Mr. Waltham thus proceeded:—

"The flight of my daughter with Mr. Bolton came upon me like a clap of thunder; but it was by degrees only, and in the answers to letters which I wrote to London, that I learned that he had robbed me of my property."

"Conceive my situation, as I sat after receiving this intelligence, musing on my singular fate—now a bereft man, deprived of every thing I had possessed in the world—my child fled I knew not whither, and my poor lonely Agatha sitting at my knees, looking in my sorrowful face like a sinless infant, marvelling that any thing should have occurred in this pleasant world, and on that sweet summer evening, to make one human being unhappy."

"But something was to be done without delay, to realise even the means of present support. I first sold off nearly the whole of the valuables in my house; and having still a little property in the island of Madeira, I determined to return thither with my remaining daughter, to turn it into cash, hoping that in the mean time my friend in Brussels, Mr. Toller, might be able to obtain some intelligence respecting my misled and fugitive child."

"Agatha and myself soon left Flanders; and, as if Providence benevolently intended to reconcile me gradually to my fate, our voyage to Madeira, partly from the fineness of the weather, and partly from the society with which we fortunately met, was more than usually pleasant. My poor Agatha was delighted with the novelty of the voyage, and the excitement on her arrival in a new country; and as I found some difficulty in disposing of my house, we were detained in this agreeable spot for a considerable time. At length, having disposed of my estate there, and turned the value into specie, (being determined to avoid all risk, by having the little that remained in solid silver and in my own keeping,) I set sail with my daughter in a ship bound for England."

"On our voyage homewards it happened that there were no passengers in the vessel save myself and my daughter. The weather was at first dull and rainy; light winds tantalised us at one period with hopes of getting forward; and at another, boisterous squalls, with head winds and cross currents, drove us back; and our time was thus spent in alternate struggles and despondency."

"In this situation, covering alone in the chillness and darkness of my half lighted cabin, or tossed by the fury of the gale, I could not help brooding over the events of my past life, and looking gloomily forward towards the future. I was now declined to the very verge of that poverty which my mind had long anticipated, even when, as yet, it was far from my eyes; and as I thought of Bolton, and the deep and double injuries he had done me, strange thoughts took fast hold of my spirit."

"While I was plunged in such musings, the winds gradually increased in force, and began to rush howling along the sea. A great storm arose (as we landmen say), and the billows, mountain high, broke over our heads, while the straining ship danced and dived like a cork amidst the mass of waters. They rose at the summons of the winds like angry monsters on every side of us, and seemed to lash themselves in fury that they could not at once swallow up their prey. Our ship now reeled and groaned in every timber, and the sea cleared our decks and stove in our bulwarks; while the vessel sometimes hung high on the broken wave, and sometimes lay weltering in what mariners call the trough of the sea, like a tired and wounded war horse, after an unsuccessful charge—and the sailors began evidently to be sore afraid."

"It was soon perceived that this state of things could not last long, for our ship was no youngster, and showed every moment more and more the craziness and feebleness of age, when opposed to such a tempest as this. She strained so dreadfully with the roll of the sea, that the very masts seemed ready to work themselves out of their beds, and to tear her asunder by the weight of the rigging; while she laboured over the billows, and trembled, and groaned as they struck her prostrate sides, or passed roaring beneath. In the midst of this scene, the sailors began to look scowling to windward, and then to each other, and I saw some of the hardest of them turn pale as they darted fearful glances into the black hollow of the sea. My daughter and myself, unable to stay below, were lashed to the railing near the poop, and, I need not add, she held by me in a stupor of nervous terror."

"I am thus particular in my description, my lord," continued Mr. Waltham, "because I wish to accompany my narrative with some account of my state of mind throughout. During all this time, then, while evident fear sat upon the countenances of the oldest seamen; while the captain himself had ceased to give orders, except the hoarse and appalling cry of 'look out!' 'lay hold!' as he watched each sea that was likely to dash over us, when every thing but our wet and wearied men had been washed overboard—during all this time, I say, I sat holding my daughter in my arms with an involuntary and unaccountable confidence, that, however the scene might end, it would end safely for me! My poor timid Agatha began to receive the same impression from my calmness and confidence; and while the sailors looked with terror downwards, as we hung upon the ridge of the wave, and spoke in broken whispers as they held on by the weather shrouds—and while the captain and mates looked aghast to windward, and began to whisper of foundering at sea—myself and my dear confiding daughter seemed the only persons in the ship who were not filled with trembling and despairing apprehension."

"The cry of 'water in the hold!' completed the scene of terror and alarm; and the poor seamen now set about trying the pumps with a dogged and ominous silence. A dreadful roll of the ship with a sudden gust of the tempest, next drove our main-top-mast by the board with a crash, while the solitary stay-sail which helped to keep her in trim, was shivered in the uncontrollable fury of the storm. The pumps were now deserted, the vessel laboured more than ever, and the sailors looked with longing eyes along the weltering sea, and round the black and hazy horizon, for any object that might relieve them from the chill sinking of despair."

"What is there in the visible heaven above or in the earth beneath, that can give confidence of deliverance in such circumstances as these? I know not—I cannot see it. It assuredly is not external. It is from on high, and conferred only by the Power who works calmly the consummation of his own purposes, amidst the wildest tempest that ever blew out of the clouds. I, at least, know, that at the most dreadful moment of this crisis I looked on with the excitement of a spectator, gazing on a scene of terror in which he has no other than a sympathetic concern; for I felt assured that I was to escape here, even if reserved for another death of a more terrible description."

"The wind now began to fall, and the sea became less furious; yet the real danger was not in the least abated, for the ship was in no condition to hold out, and the leak was gaining quickly upon the feeble efforts of the men. As the wind calmed, we lay on the waves like a log; we heard the appalling gurgle of the water which was rising in the hold below; and we felt the ship sinking slowly beneath us. We were three hundred miles from any land. Even our boats had been washed overboard; the vessel was filling fast, and we looked around us and up to heaven for relief in vain. Death stared us in the face, and now the seamen, throwing aside all subordination, descended (as is usual in such circumstances) into the store-room, and pierced the spirit casks, swearing that it would be a double death if they were to go down into the deep to meet a sailor's death, sober. For my own part, I never stirred from my place near the poop, and my daughter was astonished—I was even astonished myself—at my perfect calmness, and my indomitable hope of being still rescued out of the jaws of the watery grave."

"My darling Agatha, trembling, sat looking in my face with the serene confidence of an angel; while the racked vessel wick hardly kept us from the sea was sinking beneath our feet. I requested a glass of spirits, (for the men, except my servant Murdoch, who was on his knees praying audibly, were not drinking with the greedy regardlessness of despair,) and, on being handed to me, I prevailed upon my courageous daughter and my servant to taste, for we were now faint from abstinence. She drank a little of what I offered, and smiled sadly; saying although she dared not hope, she was now ready to die with her father. We embraced in silence. God bless my inestimable child! She grasped me with the grasp of death. Yet I had not given up hope. I still preserved my confidence, and I told her so."

"The bow of our ship was already under water, and hoped seemed quite gone. I rose up, after embracing my child, to stretch out my benumbed limbs. I saw no one near me but Agatha, for the men were drinking in that part of the vessel which was still out of the sea, and some were lying in a state of intoxication, waiting for death. I looked towards heaven, and towards the horizon. At that instant the sun, which had been visible all day, but was now setting, shone out brightly through the stormy haze, and cast a yellow beam over the waste of foaming waters. My daughter pointed to his broad disk, and said, 'Father, that is the last sun we are ever to see on earth—look at it!—we are now past hope—we are sinking fast!'

"I shook my head, almost agreeing with her, when, turning round, I beheld to my astonishment something black between us and the dark heavens to windward. It seemed to have risen suddenly out of the sea, for no one had observed it. I could scarcely believe my sight. It was a big bearing straight down upon us, and was not more than a few miles off."

"'Sail ho!' I shouted in rapturous surprise, involuntarily imitating the sailors' cry upon this interesting sight at sea."

"'Sail ho!' echoed every voice on board, from the influence of habit, but in a tone of drunken apathy."

"The captain, however, looked up, roused from his stupor by the cry, and stood staring for some moments upon the approaching vessel, before he was able to speak."

"The word, however, was now caught, and every one jumped up to gaze upon the stranger ship in ecstatic amazement."

"But our vessel was sinking so fast, that life and death seemed suspended upon a moment. The ship neared us—our own deepened into the sea—my daughter stretched out her arms for help—in five awful minutes after, my child and I were safe!—and—"

Mr. Waltham here burst into tears.

"Excuse me, my lord," said the old gentleman, revering his composure. "The recollection of that awful moment, and my child's providential deliverance, has too much for my feelings, even now."

"The impressions made upon me by what I have related," continued he, "might have passed away in vision, but think, my lord, of this very place where we are sitting—this sweeping coast—and these dark rocks round the castle of your ancestors, near which my enemy Bolton has set himself down, as if hiding himself from my sight—think of this incidental spot which has been the first land made by the ship which saved us. Think also of our provisions having been so run out by the additional number the vessel had now to provide for, that the captain was forced to put us and the crew of the wrecked ship ashore, in a small port, the nearest to this very bay, to preserve to himself the means of enabling him to reach the termination of his voyage!" "It is remarkable," said Lord Arnwood, thoughtfully.

"Think also," Mr. Waltham went on, "that had I taken good bills on London, which were offered me in payment for my property in Madeira, I could have easily kept them on my person, and so retained thus much of what originally belonged to me. But my very anxiety to avoid all risk of loss, was made the instrument of that final deprivation which has brought me to the state at which it seems evident I was fated to arrive. Bills might easily have been saved, but my substantial money, in which I put my trust, I was forced to yield up to the insatiable deep; and I am now, as it seemed inevitable that I should come to be, in the literal sense of the word, a poor man."

"There are strange occurrences in men's lives," said Arnwood; "some call them accidents. I know not what to think."

"But now," continued the narrator, "I had made up my mind to my destiny. I had almost welcomed poverty, solitude, and obscurity. I had resolved to labour with my hands for my subsistence and that of my daughter. It was a consolation for me, in the midst of this, to find that Providence, who mixes all it gives, had thrown me on a spot near where my dear deceased wife lay buried, resting in the quiet grave beside this castle, out of view of the sad events which she could not have prevented; I sought from your lordship that lonely house to dwell in, called the Mark, where I might live, and, with my faithful Scotch servant, seek a subsistence out of the sea in which the last of my wealth was for ever lost."

"While waiting here quietly until I saw how Providence meant to dispose of me, and until I should hear of my child, what was my astonishment to find that the despoiler of my fortune and the seducer of my daughter was set down at my very side, and placed in my very path, for the fulfilment of his destiny and mine!"

"I do think and hope, sir, you are deceiving yourself, and drawing wrong inferences from accidental coincidences," said Lord Arnwood, after a pause. "But you have not told me what is become of your other daughter. Surely it cannot be possible that—that she is all this time in that solitary building the Pilot's Mark?"

"Do not ask me of her. I have told you she is safe."

"But is she really in the Mark?" said Arnwood, eagerly; a light breaking in upon his recollection.

"I may not talk to you of her, my lord; you distress me."

"I know. I see it now. Good heavens, and she so beautiful!"

"What do you say? Have you seen my Agatha?"

"I have, I am sure I have! and the interesting vision has haunted me ever since."

"Beware, my lord, of love," said Mr. Waltham, solemnly. "My unfortunate daughter is now a beggar, and you are not rich. Beware, I say. The real evils of life are sufficient in your circumstances, without superadding to them the intense sufferings often springing out of the deep affections and the imagination."

"I will see her. I will, at least, interest myself for her welfare."

"Do not, my lord; do not. Suppress the wild feelings of youth," he added, waving his hand as he prepared to depart; "and wait patiently for the predestined occurrences of your own fate."

CHAPTER VIII.

Some time after the foregoing events, and towards the end of June, a few hours before sunset, two men, in the garb of mariners, sat by the sea-side upon the soft furzy turf, which formed the surface of the little peninsula we have before noticed, that ran into the sea nearly in front of the Pilot's Mark.

One was the large muscular fisherman, who, some time ago, had been the opponent of Lord Arnwood in their struggle among the rocks; and the other was our old acquaintance, Murdoch Macara, of the Mark—his outward appearance more sailor-like than was usual with him at such periods as he had chosen to make himself visible at the castle of Arnwood.

The present was one of those delicious evenings, which at this season of the year reward the Englishman for his endurance of his long cloudy winter and uncertain spring. It was at the time of day when the sun flings a yellow radiance aslant the undulations of the country, and throws one side of every rising object into deep shadow; and now the rich light, reposing on the western side of the headlands, marked out with picturesque distinctness, the graceful sweep of the shore and bay lying beyond the Pirate's Creek, by the side of which the fishermen pursued their occupation.

The two men were reclining indolently upon the furzy sward, Weathersheet purring to himself contentedly, and mending his net, while Murdoch was employed in coiling the lines and busking the hooks belonging to that department of their amphibious craft of which he took particularly the charge.

"Hech! but simmer is a pleasant time," said Murdoch to his companion, "just when the vera air off the land smells o' roses an' sweet-breers, an' the gowans glow up in ane's face, when a body lies down among the warm grass. An' then, the sea patters sae pleasantly o'er the pebbles at your feet, just as it were fear'd to come near you. It's really a sweet night, only for these midges that buzz about ane's ears. But its nae use of speaking to you, Will Wathersheet. No a word frae you—man, ye're perfect stupid!"

"Hum, haw," grunted the other, "what is it you want, Mr. Macara?"

"Don't maister me, William Weathersheet. Ye're wonderful rife o' maisters in this England, as the pud-dock said to the harrow. But devil a word o' talk o' jocularly out o' your head, mair than ye'll get out of Robin Graith's mare. Noo, William, isn't it a sad thing that the gentry canna stay at hame in their ain bonny woods an' lawns in this fine simmer time? Do ye think Lord Arnwood has left the Ha' there yet?"

"How should I know? I never remark."

"Never remark! Jist like you! Eh, man, Will Wathersheet, but you're a pair sowl! Neither can sing nor say, as auld Ramsay says. God, I'm sae happy this bonny night, I could sing till the morning, if I had only gude company to sing to. But the night's coming round, an' I'll hae a sang yet with Rab Roust, when the lines an' nets are set, if I should gang three miles for't. But here goes for want o' better," and the merry Scotchman struck up this ditty with extraordinary melody.

O merry might we be when the simmer's sun is down,
An' gaily might we dance by the gill o' the moon,
In my boat o' ashore 'twill be all aye to me,
If I hae but my sang, an' gude companie.

O canty on the lea side,
An' chanting by the sea side,
Till the evening bell shall ring us to Gude companie.

O the bonny birds they sing, in a morning in May;
An' the bonny bells they ring when the bride's gien away;
So gie me a laze wi' nuff pawkies ee,
To tryte to meet at een, for her companie.

O canty on the lea side,
An' chanting by the sea side,
Till the evening star shall light us to Gude companie.

O the peer he is proud, an' the priest he is sly;
An' the lawyer's aye loud, and the drinker's aye dry;
But I am a man that likes to live free,
Wi' a drap o' gude drink, an' gude companie.

O canty on the lea side,
An' chanting by the sea side,
Till the evening hearth shall brighten to Gude companie.

"Well done, Murdoch. But I say, who may that be coming yonder?"

"Where?"

"Don't you see some one hauling round on his lar-board tack, by the weather-side of Hail-hill? There he luffs jist astern of our old hulk the Pilot's Mark."

"Faith, I see him, an' a gentleman too. Black coat, an' a white breacan round his neck."

"What does he stand gazing about the Mark for? Who can he be?"

"Faith I dinna ken. It's no for naething that a gentleman comes wandering about this lonesome place his lane. There's surely something in the wind, William; have ye stowed awa the wee drap brandy?"

"To be sure, man. But what o' that?"

"I'm no sic an auld smuggler as you, Will Wathersheet, an' ye see my conscience is a wee tender about the brandy whenever I think o' the gauger."

"Who do you mean? the exciseman?"

"Ou, ay, but that canna be him, for gaugers dinna wear sic braw black coats; but he's coming up to us, faith."

"So he is. Now stand by your weather helm, Murdoch, and be prepared to answer his hail."

"I se do that. But dinna you be putting in your jaw." The stranger soon drew near at an easy pace, seeming to reconnoitre, as he came, every object in the neighbourhood, and, after a few moments, he addressed the men with—

"Pleasant employment, friends, of a summer's evening."

"I canna say but it's pleasant enough, sir," answered the ready Scotchman, "if it were for any use."

"You seem to be preparing your fishing tackle, friends. Surely, you don't call that a useless employment."

"Lord, sir, I wish you had a trial o't," said Murdoch, with his instinctive propensity to complain; "the vera fishes hae gotten sic notions in their heads in these enlightened days, that they'll no come near a net. Faith they seem to ken the use o't as well as I do."

"But the hooks and the bait, my friend," said the stranger, entering into the Scotchman's humour.

"Huiks! odd, sir, I wonder what the times will come to, for ye might as weel put down a bairn's gum-stick as huik or bait either. The vera fishes hae grown sae cunning, that they ken a huik just as weel as I would ken a shilling in the fingers o' a recruiting sergeant. An' so they'll no bite—devil a bit."

"But surely you'll allow this is a pleasant evening for your employment."

"It may be pleasant enough to a gentleman like you, sir, walking about with your cane in your hand. But it's little pleasure to pair fellows like us, labouring here in the sun, an' the midges like to pike our vera een out."

"Pray whose house is that tall building beside us?"

"It's my maister's, sir."

"That is a Scotchman's answer, my friend. It is the name of the owner that I desire to know."

"Hadn't ye better speer at the door, sir?" answered Murdoch, looking suspiciously up into the stranger's face.

"Have you any objection to answer my question yourself," said the other, "as I have chanced to make the enquiry of you?"

"Ou, surely no, sir. Ye'll be frae New Hall, I dare say."

"You're asking me a question, friend, instead of answering mine."

"I ken brawly what I'm saying, sir. I like a giff for a gaff, baith in word an' deed, for, in troth, I never got ought for nought frae the world's mysel."

"But I think you ought to answer me my civil question, honest man," said Mr. Johnston; for it was the quondam tutor of Lord Arnwood who manifested this anxiety to learn something of the possessor of the Pilot's Mark. "I did not expect to be catechised by you when I made so simple an inquiry."

"Ou, I dare say," said Murdoch, who had been taking a sharp view of the countenance of the enquirer. "I canna say but ye look like that sort o' fouk, that think they should claut a' the cream to their ain side of the plate;—but an eye for an eye, an' a tooth for a tooth, as the gospel says, an' a kick for a cuff, all over the world. So, sir, if there be nae penny there shall be nae pater-noster; an' ye may jist gang as ye came."

"You're a very strange sort of man for a fisherman," said Mr. Johnston, evidently chagrined.

"I'm rather rough an' round in my way, ye sec, but I ken a gude fellow when I meet him, an' I can be civil too when I ken my man—just as weel as cany ither body that has nae favour to seek, but what his ain ten fingers can grant him."

"Perhaps you will tell me who lives in that house, which I believe is called the Pilot's Mark, friend?" said Mr. Johnston, addressing Weathersheet the sailor.

"I'm rather a stranger, sir, you see," said Weathersheet drily, and scratching his head, "and Murdoch there is the only man that takes an observation on this coast, if you can only get the soundings of him."

"You're a pair of obstinate scoundrels," muttered Johnstone, as he turned and walked back towards the Mark.

"There he goes grumbling like a bear wi' a sair head," said Murdoch, laughing.

As Mr. Johnston passed the old building, he lingered near, and seemed to take the closest observation of every thing he could see, frequently turning round and looking stealthily at the two fishermen.

"I don't like that fellow," said the Scot, as he watched Johnston until he turned by the back of the old building. "I'll wager he's fand the smell o' that drap o' brandy ye got frae the smuggler, an' that has cost me sae mickle care. I wish, Will Wathersheet, that that confounded brandy was down your throat."

"He's going up to the Hall there, sure enough," said the sailor.

"Do ye think sae? Faith, I'll jist step up an' watch him. He has a sneaking look; and, Will, ye'll jist put the bit keg in the hole o' the cliff, for fear ony thing should happen."

Having said this, Murdoch, gathering together his fishing tackle, set forward to dodge Mr. Johnston, having much jealous suspicion of all inquisitive manoeuvring emanating from New Hall.

The wary Scot took a low road among the plantations that skirted the great park of Arnwood Castle, and was quite close to the square mansion of New Hall, when he observed Mr. Johnston deviate from the road and enter it. Murdoch was about to return by another path which skirted the heathy sweep of Hail Hill, muttering to himself his suspicions regarding this manoeuvre of Johnston; when, in passing through a narrow gap in the fence, he observed a young woman meanly dressed, sitting in a nook of the bank opposite to him, and caressing an infant, while she seemed full of grief and despondency, and sobbed and wept in sorrowful bitterness.

Murdoch stood for a moment and watched the girl, who, thinking herself unobserved, indulged her grief and fondled her infant, in a manner which absolutely, as he afterwards expressed himself, took the Scot by the heart to witness it.

"What is the matter wi' you, my bonny woman?" said Murdoch, coming forward and addressing her.

The girl only shook her head, and then tried to conceal her grief by somewhat brightening up her looks.

"Na troth, it's nae business o' mine, my lass. But your greeting time's no come yet. Ye're o'er young to be sitting there sorrowing to yoursel under a hedge, purr thing. But eh, woman, that's a braw bairn i' your lap."

This compliment to the infant overcame the young woman's reserve, and looking up in Murdoch's face for a moment, she said,

"Good man, will you do an unfortunate young woman a favour?"

"Hoot ay, my pretty lass! I never could refuse any thing to a bonny face, a' my life."

"Well, sir, if you could just manage to get this letter delivered to Mr. Bolton of the Hall there;" said the young woman, taking a letter out of her bosom and offering it to Murdoch.

"Troth, I'll do that in a trice. But it's but a sma' favour that, my lass, an' the squire's hoose is sae near—it seems scarcely worth asking me to do 't."

"It will be a very great favour, sir, if you could get it given to Mr. Bolton, and particularly if you could see him yourself, and bring me some sort of answer."

"As to that, ye see, my lass, it's now the evening, an' the squire will be at his wine, an' winna be disturbed, nae doubt. Ye ken, purr folk should watch the great folks' time."

"Ah, sir, I have been here the whole of the day, and yesterday too, but Mr. Bolton will not see me, and has given directions to his servants not to take any letter to him from any poor person, upon pain of losing their places. So I have been driven from the door with my baby, and have had no sustenance all day;"—and having given this account of herself, the young woman again relapsed into weeping.

"Dinna greet, my purr thing," said the Scotchman beginning to melt: "noo just gie me the letter, an' I'll try to get a word o' him. But it'll be a sair job to fight my way through his powder'd flunkies."

"I shall be most grateful, and pray blessings on you, my friend, if you will try," said the girl earnestly.

"But ye see, my bonny woman," said Murdoch, turning the letter, and looking on all sides of it; "I dinna ken, after a', what sort o' bizness this may be, an' the squire's a man that I'm no the least anxious to see, if it warms to do a gude turn to you, my dow."

"Well, sir," said the girl, weeping afresh, "indeed I cannot expect but that you wish to know something about me before you undertake to do me a service, but if you'll take my word for it, sir, I am a very unfortunate young woman."

"Troth, my dear, I dinna misdoubt that in the smallest," said Murdoch; "poverty an' a bonny face at the mercy o' the world! Lord, I could greet for you mysel' this vera minute."

"And sadly were they taken advantage of to my sorrow," continued the girl, encouraged to tell her story by the spontaneous sympathy of the warm-hearted Scot.

"By Mr. Bolton?" exclaimed Murdoch, throwing up his clenched hand.

"Yes, sir, indeed, to my shame I tell it. But he made acquaintance with me in another part of the country, by disguising himself in a dress like those of my own condition, and calling himself a young tradesman, and by promises of marriage, he —"

"O the confounded scoundrel! But that's one of his old tricks; and he now refuses you a small maintenance, I dare say; while the very steam of what he wastes in gross extravagance would support a whole family. O the scoundrel!"

"Just so, sir. And he will not now hear me, or receive a letter from me, although he prevailed upon me to conceal his name from the parish; and now I cannot look my father in the face, for his heart is broken about me, and Mr. Bolton at last refuses me the smallest relief."

"God help you, purr lass. But how do you think his seeing this letter will avail you? Woman, he treats the purr like the vera dirt among his feet."

"O dear sir, I don't know; but I wrote it by the advice of a friend, and I think if he read it, he would save me from exposing him and, alas, myself!"

"Well, my purr lassie, just hae patience, an' I'll try to see him," said the Scotchman, going; "noo just be quiet till I come back. Od! I'll look him straight in the face if I can set eyes on him—straight in the face!"

Muttering in this manner, Murdoch turned into the grounds of New Hall, summoning up all his characteristic impudence, or rather bold bluntness of speech, to his assistance, while he tried to make his way into the presence of Mr. Bolton.

"This is a bonny job I've ta'en in hand," said he to himself, as he went, while he looked at the letter, "to carry despatches between a blackguard gentleman and his hizzy. Weel, I am surely a doit to meddle wi' love affairs that are no my ain. An auld fule—to be ta'en aff my road wi' a bonny face, an' laud the silly woman's greeting get me into a scrape wi' this purse-proud squire! I would rather see the deevil than I would see that Squire Bolton. But, purr thing," he continued, thinking of the girl, "a bonny creature! odd, I hadna' the heart to refuse her, sittin' greetin' to hersel' on a brae side, an' a baby at her breast. Lord help us! this is a sad worl'!"

Having strengthened his resolution by these reflections, he proceeded boldly up to New Hall.

"By my faith, I think it's my best way to gang straight up to the grand door at once," thought Murdoch to himself. "It's a case o' needcessity, an' what for should I be 'feard to face the deevil? The purr lass canna starve, so here goes," and he rung the bell at the entrance.

"What do you want?" said a powdered porter, who opened the door. "Who the devil taught you to ring at a gentleman's door, airrah? Go round to the back of the house, if you have any business here."

"Na, deevil a bit," said the Scotchman, doggedly. "I want to see your maister, friend, if you please."

"If you want to see master, come to-morrow at twelve, and go to the back entrance," said the servant, thrusting the half-open door rudely against Macara.

"Will ye drive the door in my face, ye pimple-faced puppy?" cried the Scotchman, pushing it back and edging himself in. "By my faith, I'll haul the yellow strapples frae your flunkie coat, if ye daur to gie me ony o' your valle-de-sham insolence! I'll just wait till I see your maister;" and Murdoch determinedly planted himself on a seat in the hall.

"Faith, you shall wait then," said the servant, astonished at finding his authority disputed by one of Macara's appearance. "You're a pretty sort of a clown indeed, to suppose that master is going to leave his wine to speak to you. It's a moral impossibility at this time of night."

"I'll let you ken, friend, that it's neither moral nor impossible for your maister to speak to me, upon most particular business," said Murdoch, threateningly.

"What particular business can you have with him?" said the man.

"That's no' for your lugs to hear, I'm sure."

"If you have particular business, have you no letter or card that may be taken up to the squire?"

"Whatever I hae I shall deliver mysel', when I see him," said Murdoch, determined not to be shaken either by master or man.

"Then, friend, if you persist in disturbing my master, you must take the consequences."

"I'll take my chance."

"And so you see, friend, if you have a hard head, he has a good stick in the corner there."

"If that be the way o't," said Murdoch boldly, "there'll be a pair o' us at the work, as the hen said to her legs."

"Would you offer to lift your hand to a squire?" said the porter, in increased astonishment.

"Ye had better gie nae mair jaw, my friend, but just gang up an' tell your maister that there's a gentleman wants to see him instantly, upon particular business."

"A gentleman! you're a pretty devil of a gentleman, to be sure."

"Ne'er flash yoursel' what I am. Hoot, man, what's the use o' simmering an' wintering a' day. If ye dinna say it's a gentleman, ye see, your maister 'll no' stir for the like o' me, an' if there's any skaith, I'll take the blame. Come, friend, gang up and tell him. It's really a great business."

The servant seeing the determination of the Scot, and chuckling at the idea of the squire getting into a passion and breaking the intruder's head, went up stairs and whispering to one of his fellows, the latter went in to announce this strange visit to his master.

The squire had no company, (except Mr. Johnston, of whom more anon,) he having been somewhat confined and interdicted by the surgeon who attended him, until his recovery was complete from the effects of the slight wound he had received in his skirmish with Lord Arnwood. He was, therefore, more sober than usual at this hour in the evening, when the servant entered, and was, moreover, engaged in a discussion with Mr. Johnston concerning the result of his enquiries about the occupant of the Pilot's Mark, and other matters of apparently little concern to him, about which notwithstanding he evinced an anxiety that not a little puzzled and astonished his friend.

When the servant delivered his message, and in answer to Mr. Bolton's enquiries, described the man who insisted upon seeing the squire, a thought instantly struck the latter, and he said to the servant—

"Tell him to walk up."

"Into this room, sir?" said the astonished attendant.

"Do as I bid you. Bring the man into this room."

When the servant left the apartment, and in terms of civility proportionate to the respect paid to the stranger by the fact of his master's calling him up to the dining-room, delivered his message, it was not in human nature to resist a twinge of cowardice and dread, when Murdoch thought of going up "before the laird." This unwonted sinking of spirit rather increased than otherwise, as he mounted the richly carpeted stairs, and surveyed the magnificence by which the man was surrounded, whom he was going to face with a message that amounted to a threat. Had he been treated with contempt and opposition, as he expected, he felt that he could have acted his part courageously for the young woman; but this appearance of respect and condescension quite disarmed him, and the natural impression of Mr. Bolton's grandeur filled him with dread. When he had reached the landing-place on the stairs, however, and was just entering the room where sat Mr. Bolton and his friend, a single thought crossing his mind, served to bring back all his courage, and to restore him to a just view of his undertaking. This was the strong contrast of the poor young woman, a victim to the vicious passions of the owner of all this grandeur, sitting weeping on the bare earth without, refused even the crumbs that fell from this Diva's table, although absolutely famishing, with his infant at her breast.

"Come forward, sir," said Mr. Bolton, as the Scot entered with humility. "You live with some one in that high old building by the sea side, called the Pilot's Mark."

"Yes, sir."

"Here, John, hand me that glass," he said, addressing the servant.

"Now, sir, you can drink wine when you get it, I dare say," continued Mr. Bolton, filling up the glass and winking to Mr. Johnston, as if he would say, "leave the fellow to me."

"I am nae great wine-bibber, sir," said Murdoch, rallying his thoughts from their surprise at all this.

"No, I suppose not, friend," answered the squire. "The Pilot's Mark is a place where wine is not so plentiful as sea-water, I well believe. But come! drink my health, honest friend. Your master and I are neighbours, and I don't even know his name. Pray what part of the country is he from?"

"I came to you on another business than to talk of my master, sir," said Murdoch, setting down the wine which the servant had handed to him.

"Oh, very true, I forgot that," said Mr. Bolton. "but won't you drink? Are you a Scotchman, and can't drink?"

"Deevil a fears, sir, as we used to say when we were bairns:

"Yes indeed an' that I can, Just as weel as ony man."

"Very well," continued the squire, again winking to Mr. Johnston; "I see you're a fine fellow, and can make rhymes too. Now off with your glass, and then I'll hear your business."

"Bizness first, and drink after," said the Scotchman stiffly.

"What! won't you drink your wine when I ask you?"

"Na—devill a bit."

"No? Why, you idiot—"

"I thought, sir, ye wad'na keep up your civility long, if ye were the least cross'd," said Murdoch coolly.

"Why what sort of a man are you, and what is your business, sirrah?"

"Ye'll find it there, sir, if ye please"—said Murdoch, handing the letter with a stern civility.

"Confound it, how came you by this?" exclaimed Mr. Bolton, tearing open the letter.

"I just fand it, sir, where rich folk dinna gang for pleasure, nor puir folk from choice. I saw it whar the Levite couldna see the wounded man, just by the way side, sir, in sair distress."

"How do you mean?"

"I mean, sir, that it's neither amang pleasures nor palaces," said Murdoch looking round the room, "nor play-houses either, that ye'll get the like of that. But I would like an answer, sir."

"This is some cursed conspiracy against me," muttered Mr. Bolton; "how came you to know this person, sirrah?"

"It's vera easy for the puir to ken the puir, an' the rich, ye see, ken naeboddy but the rich, an' that's the way o' the worl'."

"Answer my question directly, where is this person now? do you think I am to listen to your Scotch preaching?"

"The puir lass, wi' her baby, sir, is just outside on the cauld lea, where there's neither grand carpets nor red wine to comfort her."

"How can I help that? and how dare she come plaguing me?"

"Och sir! och sir!" said Murdoch with solemn earnestness, "is that your feeling for a puir lass that has trusted to you in the hour of woman's weakness? is na that very letter blotted wi' her tears an' warm wi' the heat o' the bosom, which ye has deceiv'd an' seduced? an' disna your ain bairn look up in her face, an' smile, as ye yoursel' did once, to increase a mother's grief an' a sinfu' woman's repentance? Oh sir," he exclaimed, drawing near, "how can ye sit there easy an' happy drinking rich wine, an' gorged to the throat, an' your puir leman lass, an' bonnie bairn, starving under a hedge?"

"Confound the fellow! am I to be worried in this way about an intrigue with a country wench? I say," continued the squire, striving to take off the seriousness of the affair with a joke, "were you born yesterday? is there any thing more common than —"

"I ken it's o'er common, sir, for gentlemen to practise upon the feelings of innocent thoughtless women, who think men's words are as certain to come true, as that the corn will grow ripe and yellow in har'st, and who fancy that they will get justice when their sorrow comes, as sure as the green braird sprouts up after the spring showers, or the bonny white blossoms cover the thorn bushes, when simmer comes dancing on the south wind; but it's no common, sir—I say, it's no common," continued Murdoch with strong animation, "for gentlemen wha has plenty, to refuse the sma' consolation o' bit and drap to the puir lass wham they has deceived an' driven to ruin."

"Oh, I see, it's money she wants," said Mr. Bolton with scornful coolness, scarcely having glanced at the letter; "that is the way of them all. There, sir," he added, throwing down a single gold piece, "there is the substantial part of your answer, and harkee, as you are so zealous a friend of this young woman, inform her from me, that I am not to be visited in this way again; if she dares to intrude upon me another time, I will have —"

"But your child, sir?" said Murdoch, looking horrified, as Mr. Bolton paused.

"How dare you say another word, sir? It may be your child instead of mine, for aught I know. Am I to have all the poor of the parish and all their brats saddled upon me?"

"Did you ever read of Corah, Dathan, and Abneram, sir," said the Scotchman, looking unutterable things.

"Corah—what?"

"Corah, Dathan, and Abneram—but ye'll na be a reader o' scripture—the vera earth opened under their feet, an' swallowed them up for their wickedness!"

"Ha, ha! rhyming first and sermonising after, well you're a proper Scotchman—only cursedly impudent; take care how you talk in this manner to me, sir."

Murdoch said nothing more, but looking a moment at the guinea, walked sullenly towards the door.

"Here, sir," said the squire, calling him back, "your business is finished, now drink your wine goodnaturedly, for I want to speak to you."

"I'll neither eat your bread, sir, nor drink your wine," said Murdoch solemnly.

"No! I will not bear this insolence longer," cried the squire, starting up, "your presumption is insufferable, sir."

"I dinna mean ony disrespect to my superiors, sir," said Murdoch calmly, "for I'm but a puir man, an' no regarded in the worl'; but dry bread is sweet, an' clear water is refreshing wi' peace an' a gude conscience, for ye see the blessing o' the Lord maketh rich an' addeth no sorrow—but the wealth of the wicked, the fat sacrifices of Moloch in the valley of Tophat, and the spiced wines of Ahab on the mount of Gherizim, are but as the stink in the nostrils of gude men, an' bring wrath an' heaviness in the hour of death."

"I wish you a gude e'en, sir," added the Scotchman, and he opened the door and walked thoughtfully down stairs.

CHAPTER IX.

It was not without reason that an ominous misgiving had taken possession of Lord Arnwood's breast, when he found, as related in the earlier part of our history, that Mr. Johnston had contrived to make so intimate an acquaintance with Mr. Bolton.

Yet his suspicious apprehensions (if the feelings with which he was actuated when again obliged, as in a manner he was, to sit at the same table with his quondam tutor, could be called such) assumed no definite shape, and settled upon no particular circumstance. For this reason he thought himself actuated merely by that instinctive dislike with which persons of a warm and generous disposition naturally regard those who are gifted with, or who have acquired extensively, that worldly prudence and calculating craft, so repugnant to their own feelings.

Arnwood even felt a strange dread of coming in contact with such a man; not from any moral cowardice, or repugnance to combat in a fair quarrel on a fair field, but from a vague feeling of alarm that the other was possessed of weapons which he was willing and ready to exert to his prejudice, such, indeed, as he was himself not aware of, and would have disdained to wield, if he had known them, even in his own defence.

He never could have dreamed, however, nor in truth did Bolton himself suspect, the ambitious project by which the prudent Johnston was smitten, nor the means he had taken to bring that project to maturity. It never even occurred to Arnwood, that it was Johnston who was at the bottom of the unfortunate quarrel between Bolton and himself, by which his views in that quarter were frustrated, and that it was Johnston who had, by gradual insinuations, and insidious hints, and flattering at the same time the squire's pecuniary prejudices, deepened and rendered more intense that person's vulgar contempt for those who were not so fortunate as himself; and finally caused him to treat the young lord with such excessive violence as to bring on the duel and its consequences.

This was the grand event, nevertheless, which Johnston had aimed at; for, besides that it gratified the natural hatred to Arnwood, which mean and base minds usually bear to the noble and the disinterested, it, at the same time, removed the only obstacle in the way of an arrangement which he and his conscience had for some time past been maturing in concert; that arrangement assuming the agreeable form of a design upon Miss Bolton herself, or rather upon that lady's portion—Miss Bolton being, indeed, rather a necessary adjunct than a principal ingredient in the felicity which Mr. Johnston had chalked out for himself in bold and prominent outline.

It was in indirect prosecution of the same object that he had undertaken for the squire, (with whom he had by this time contrived to get into most convenient intimacy,) to reconnoitre the Pilot's Mark, and to ascertain, if possible, who lived there, and whether its inhabitant was the person who had caused Mr. Bolton such extraordinary agitation on the night of the duel with Lord Arnwood. We have already seen how unsuccessful they both were in their endeavours to extract information out of the shrewd and wary Scotchman; and we now proceed to record a conversation that ensued between these "Arcades ambo," or very pretty rascals, as they sat at their wine, on the evening of the day on which Murdoch had departed from his unsuccessful suit in favour of Mary Reynolds.

"What do you think of all this, Johnston?" said the squire, when the Scotchman had been a few minutes gone, taking a gulp of wine to help him to recover his equanimity.

"Oh! not much," answered Johnston, looking sneak-ingly, and afraid lest he might let slip a word of disapprobation.

"These are rather unpleasant affairs, these intrigues, sometimes."

"No doubt, sir; yet, after all, what is it?" said Johnston, his natural reverence for wealth serving to reinforce his spirits and confidence after the surprise, and restoring his blindness to any vice in his patron. "Not much do I think of it, Mr. Bolton, I assure you," he continued; "not that I would be thought to speak slightly or with reprehensible lightness of morality, but, my dear sir, these are every-day occurrences; and, unfortunately, the structure of society presses heavily, but necessarily and inevitably, on the lower orders. This is a mere little country intrigue, as you say, with a discontented wench prominent in the picture. There is no suppressing the discontent arising from the ignorant and obstinate pertinacity of such people."

"And, you see, we can make nothing out about that mysterious inhabitant of the tall house by the sea side. Something must be done, Johnston. I tell you what, I wish I had not been so hasty in quarrelling with that proud young man with the word lord tacked to his proper name."

"Then you have changed your mind, Mr. Bolton?"

"No; it has only reverted to its original state, before you changed it, Mr. Johnston."

"I don't understand you, sir."

"Your understanding seems very convenient, Johnston. You must be perfectly conscious of the representations you made to me—false representations I now incline to believe—of the lack of sense and the want of prudence of this young man, of neither of which, I must say, have I received, as yet, any proof. The fellow is, to be sure, as proud as if he were worth half a million. Egad, sir, this is a most unfortunate business," added Bolton, as he paused, a sudden memory darting through his brain, of the knowledge that Arnwood had so strangely acquired of his real character, as evidenced by the word he had whispered in his ear on the night of the duel; "and I have you to thank for it, Mr. Johnston, and only you."

"I cannot, for my part, see," said the other, "how it can be called unfortunate to quarrel with a poor nobleman like Lord Arnwood."

"It is very likely that you cannot see, Mr. Johnston. But I wish you had brains to comprehend or eyes to see how I am to persuade him to dislodge this tenant of his, whom I have my private reasons for wishing somewhere else, out of the Pilot's Mark."

"Why, Lord bless my soul! dear sir," replied Johnston, "there cannot be much difficulty in that. Let me reflect how the thing is to be arranged;" and the tutor fell into a profound cogitation, which lasted several minutes, while the squire sipped his wine in silent impatience.

"I have it at last," said Johnston, striking the table with his hand triumphantly; "although I must confess the scheme is hazardous, and not altogether justifiable on moral grounds—but we'll let that pass. You say you want these people out of the Pilot's Mark, and you would, if possible, induce or compel Arnwood to eject them?"

"I do; you know it," said Bolton, peevishly; "what are you driving at?"

"And you doubt your power of being able to effect this?"

"Well, well; I do."

"Now, sir," said Johnston, importantly, drawing his chair close to Bolton's, and laying the fore-finger of one hand on the thumb of the other, "we arrange the matter thus. Every body knows that the peerage list does not contain so poor a devil within its red cover as Lord Arnwood. That's perfectly well known. Well, while young poverty-stricken Hopeful was yet in Paris, you had taken possession of New Hall. During your short stay there, before your departure for London, you had cultivated an intimacy with the Lady Arnwood, which, considering the shortness of your acquaintance, was, I must say, surprising."

"Cut the matter short, Johnston. What the devil do you mean?"

"I mean this, Mr. Bolton," resumed Johnston, with a glance of solemn superiority at the obtuse squire. "Lady Arnwood might have borrowed—might have borrowed, I say—I do not assert that she did, but she might have borrowed a considerable sum of money of you; now, do you understand, eh?"

"Might have borrowed, most sapient Johnston," cried Bolton with a laugh; "and would, no doubt, if she had thought me willing to lend. Might—yes, might is better than right, ha, ha, ha, there's a pun, my boy,—but she never did, wise Johnston; she never did, sagacious Johnston."

"Pardon me, sir, but she did," and he gave an emphatic leer: "that is—if we please."

"What do you mean, sir? what do you mean?"

"Tut, tut, tut," responded the other, with a familiarity he had never hitherto ventured to indulge, "I didn't think, Bolton, that you were so confoundedly dull. Cannot we prepare a document for a given sum—say five thousand pounds—a note of hand given by Lady Arnwood at the time, payable on demand by herself, her executors, administrators or assigns, as the lawyers say—"

"Stop—stop! my friend, that won't do," cried Bolton, alarmed; "besides, how can it be managed? It can't be done."

"Leave that to me," said Johnston; "I'll manage it well enough. I know the turn of the old woman's signature as well as I do my own; the thing can be easily done, if that's all."

"Why, it's no better than forgery!"

"Pretty much the same thing, indeed," said Johnston, coolly; "but my good sir, how is it ever to be discovered? Get the document presented to Arnwood, under pretence of a sudden want of money, if you think proper to state any reasons at all; there will be no power of taking it up in that quarter, depend on it; and then you can make what terms you please, and include those mysterious tenants in your conditions. Now, you perceive, the course is plain enough."

"Plain enough with a vengeance," exclaimed Bolton, shrugging his shoulders; "but what the deuce, Johnston, can be your motive in suggesting this? My own I can understand, and, in some degree, palliate; but yours!—Johnston, you're a deuced rascal, and that's the truth."

"My motives, sir," replied Johnston, not heeding the concluding compliment to his honesty with which Bolton had presented him, "is justifiable on a religious, nay, on Christian principles. 'An eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth,' Mr. Bolton, is a rule of conduct included in the Christian code; and I was by no means well treated by that young man. Besides, I do and shall ever entertain a deep sense of your kindness to me, my dear sir, and if any efforts of mine—"

"Oh! your humble servant, Johnston," cried Bolton, mimicking, and bowing profoundly; "well, you can manage it, you say. But suppose he were to raise the money—there's a precious hobble we should get our cunning selves into."

"The money, sir! he could no more raise the money than he could raise the devil; to whom, therefore, on the precedent of Mahomet and the mountain, let us cause him to descend. The fellow's too poor to have any friends, and the very mention of money makes him as nervous as an octogenarian with the palsy, ha, ha, ha!"

"Egad, Johnston, then it must be done, though it's rather too bad—if it could be avoided. You have an excellent head, Johnston, for a rascally plan."

"Call it what you please, sir. But won't you then have him in your power?"

"No doubt. But whom shall I get to negotiate this business, for I'm sure I shan't meet him. There is no one could have done it better than you, Johnston, if you had not also quarrelled with him, or rather, he with you."

"He quarrelled with me, certainly, Mr. Bolton, and therefore—"

"You will make this demand as my agent, eh, Johnston?"

"Well, sir, any thing to oblige you."

"Ha! ha! ha!—well, you're very good, upon my soul. You're not averse to being kicked down stairs, as you were before in Paris. Wasn't that the case, old boy? Positively, Johnston, you're a cursed scoundrel. Come, tell me how it was. You know the poet sings,

Some have been kick'd till they know whether
The shoe was calf's-skin or neat's-leather.

What was the material wherewith thou wast kicked, good Johnston?"

"Sir, if you had not taken a glass too much, this is language that I should not endure—and—"

"Ha! very true, a glass of wine does make the tongue wag a little too fast; ha! ha! ha!"

"You speak with much freedom, sir, but I'm sure you mean nothing, Mr. Bolton, ha! ha!" and he forced an abject laugh.

"Oh! not in the least, Johnston, I assure you. Well, we must about this business very soon."

CHAPTER X.

We must now transfer our scene to the interior of a small chamber, in the loftiest angle of the lone yet diastantly-seen building, called the Pilot's Mark. The little apartment we speak of was to be approached only by a narrow inconvenient stair from the more commodious and common part of the building, and might have served for a sheltered watch-tower in former times, or it might have been the cell of a monk, or the hiding-place of an outlaw, from its favourable position as a look-out to sea, its narrow-arched form, and its almost inaccessible situation.

A small window in the thick wall at once commanded a prospect to an immense distance seaward, as well as over, and far beyond, the irregular woodland round Arnwood Castle, which the whole building of the Mark seemed to overlook with a naked and stalwart solemnity. But while from its aspect towards the west and north, this little chamber, in a stormy weather, rocked to the blast of the west winds—which swept with deafening noise round its exposed and weather-beaten angles—in summer evenings, when the sky was clear and the clouds gathered in calm masses over the distant sea, it afforded a prospect of the setting sun, such as might have drawn poetry out of the duldest natures, and gone far to compensate an imaginative artist for a lifetime of common-place scenery.

The furniture of this chamber was as simple and monastic as its shape and architectural decorations. A small French bedstead, bearing a mattress, stood at the further end; a few antique prints of the Roman school, decorated the lighter part of the walls; some old books of divinity and chivalrous romance, were shelved in a little recess opposite, and a black crucifix standing on the single ebony table, denoted the faith of the occupant of the chamber.

At the narrow window sat the fair inmate of the chamber alone, on the same evening that the foregoing occurrences were in progress, looking out as usual upon the setting sun, and occasionally turning her large dark eyes languidly towards Arnwood Castle, as if watching the appearance of a human figure among its broad and deserted avenues. At length the sound of a footstep climbing the stair to the chamber seemed to rouse her from her musing; and soon Mr. Waltham came up, stooping through the low doorway, and entering, took the remaining chair opposite to his daughter.

"You seem tired, father," said she, as he wiped his forehead, and leant back on his seat.

"Slightly, my love," he answered. "It is not to be expected but that time and worldly trial should have produced their usual effects on me at my period of life. A little exercise now fatigues me."

"Exercise, alas! Forgive me, father; I almost envy you your free exercise in the open fields abroad, or as you sweep round the margin of the sea. At least, I confess I envy the lambs that I see skipping in the meadows, and the deer that I watch as they gambol through the park and woods of Arnwood, while I sit here caged and solitary."

"You have the luxury at least of telling your complaints to one to whom you can speak without danger, Agatha," said the old man, solemnly; "and for the substance of what you complain of, want of exercise, repine not. The condition of all humanity is, that every one has to complain of having too little or too much of something, that in its proper mean is desirable."

"It was surely unfortunate for me that we should have come to live in this very secluded spot," said the young lady, mournfully.

"We call events unfortunate, Agatha, of which we do not see the end, and which gives us leisure to call up the distorted phantoms of our natural discontent. But unfortunate or not, be patient and contented. It is your fate."

"But without talking of fate, father, could we not have gone to live in that pretty village on the face of the hill which I so much admired as we came along, or even in the sea-port where we landed, or any where in which one could have enjoyed a little society?"

"Society is very good, my love, in proper circumstances. But the babble and scandal of village gossip, the contracted notions of ignorance, and the natural detraction of envy and meanness, so general in small communities, would have brought evils upon you and myself, for which the enjoyment of such society would by no means have compensated."

"Are you sure there are no letters to day, my father?" said Agatha, after a pause.

"I told you before that there were none, my child."

"Alas! and how long are we to linger in this solitude? The sweet summer is now warm and blooming around us, but winter, dreary winter, will come on; and how are we to brood over its dark days and dismal nights in this solitary sea mark? I dread to think of it!"

"I trust events will come round before winter, to remove you to some more agreeable spot. Alas! my child, you have need of fortitude."

"Have I, father? You often alarm me by these strange hints as to the future. Alas! I have no fortitude!"

"Heaven will give it to you in the hour of trial, Agatha. For me," continued Mr. Waltham, covering his face with his hands, "I could meet my fate with composure; but for you, my poor unfortunate child!"

"Why are you ever hinting about your fate, my dear father? You distress me exceedingly. Your fate, methinks, cannot be much worse than it is. You have lost every thing—my poor mother, also, is long gone, and lies buried in yonder quiet nook near the sea, beyond Arnwood Castle. What can be your future fate, dear father, after all your misfortunes, but to be better than now, and happier if any change is to be?"

"Alas! Agatha—I can only for the present answer you in the complaining lines of a poet of Scotland, composed to divert his thoughts at sea, while he was blind and comfortless;—poor Hector Macneil.

"Who knew the life he's doomed to see This side the grave!"

"Then you do not yourself know, father, what you dread or imagine?" said his daughter; "and therefore you may be deceived—for fear is a deceiver as well as hope. And, surely, it is not wise in you to imbue my mind so early with these melancholy views of life."

"Perhaps not, my love; but my excuse is, if I need one, that it is not easy to suppress the thoughts that are uppermost, for, as holy writ saith, 'out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.'"

"But you seem to have something on your mind, dear sir, which you have not told me?"

"You have already given me a reason why I should not speak further in this strain, my child, and it is time enough to be explicit when the events take place. My only reason for talking to you, as I have done, of life is, to save you the cutting pains of disappointment. Disappointment of which so much complaint is made, would hardly exist or be called an evil, were it not for the vain expectations of ignorance, the delusions of youthful fancy, and the wilful absurdities of dreaming hope."

"I am no philosopher, sir, and in truth, I am very lonely and sad in this blank solitude."

"You are an orphan—at least you are motherless, and sisterless, my poor child."

"Alas, father!" and she let fall some tears—"But will you take me out this evening, sir?"

"I suppose I may, my dear. Lord Arnwood has not stirred from the castle for some days, that I have heard of."

"No, sir; indeed he has not."

"How do you know, Agatha?"

"I should have seen him from this window, sir, you know."

"So you would, if you had been watching."

"Dear sir," said Agatha, blushing, "you never told me what you and his lordship had that long conversation about, on the sands below there?"

"How do you know it was Lord Arnwood that I was talking to, my love?"

"Did I not see him that night, when there was the frightful fight with swords, between him and Mr. Boken?"

"But that was considerably after our conversation on the sands, Agatha."

"So it was. But I have often seen him at a distance, walking solitary like myself through the wood, or riding like the wind along the shore; and I have observed—"

"Agatha, my dear, this is very strange. What sort of man is he?"

"A man, sir? He is quite a youth, that is, a young man. And his really such—a noble bearing, so fiery and so—"

"Agatha!" said the old man, with a look of alarm—"have you ever spoken to him? tell me truly."

"No, sir, indeed I never did."

"Then how came you to describe him so minutely?"

"I have seen him, certainly. Alas! it is but little that I can either see or hear in this seclusion. And surely I may be permitted to look out upon the few objects that are to be seen at all."

"I mean not to circumscribe you farther than is absolutely necessary, my dear Agatha; but love is a dangerous passion to young women who are poor, and who not know the world. And you have no mother, Agatha, to watch over you. Oh God! how strangely I am circumstanced! Why have you that face? I dare not tell—I dare not look forward—Oh, heaven!" and the man started up and paced the small chamber in great agitation.

"Ah, father," said the young lady imploringly, "do not be angry with me. I cannot bear to see you in this agitation."

"I am not angry with you, my poor unfortunate child," said he, standing still and contemplating her. "It is my anxious love for you, my Agatha," he added, stooping down and kissing her forehead, "that drives me distracted, when I think what is to become of you after I am gone."

"When you are gone, father? Why always talk so? Why distress me by the idea of my losing my sole remaining parent, and my only friend on earth?"

"I cannot help referring to my unhappy fate, my child. I cannot help brooding on the fearful future, though I know it to be as irresistible as it is terrible."

"I know not what you mean, father, by this dark and awful language. Ah! de keep up your spirits and your calmness. I have seen you look with a strange and almost sublime tranquillity over a threatening and raging sea, when every one but yourself was shrieking in despair, at that awful time when we expected every wave to swallow us up in the green gulf of the deep. Now, you are moved and agitated at the mention of a name, the name of an amiable and gentle youth of a noble house, who I am sure would not harm either you or me, and to whom I never spoke."

"Hark! was not that a tap at the chamber door?"

"It was, sir," said Agatha, rising and opening it.

"Mum, I'm no vera blate, I suppose," said the Scottish tongue of Murdoch Macara, as the door was opened, while he smoothed the lock of hair above his forehead in lieu of a bow, as he stood in the dark of the passage.

"Come in, Murdoch," said Mr. Waltham kindly; "you say right; you are not remarkably blate, or modest, as I suppose you mean. Well, Murdoch, you look as if you had something to say."

"Ay, sir, it's just a word or twa about a lass."

"About a girl? What mean you? Where is she?"

"I've brought her into the house, sir."

"Brought her into my house, Murdoch? How is this?"

"And a baby, sir."

"A girl and her baby into this house! Really, Murdoch, this is a freedom that——"

"As bonny a bairn, sir, as ever lay at a woman's breast. Eh, Miss Agatha, if ye but saw it. Puir wee thing."

"Murdoch, really this is a freedom which I could not have expected of you," said Mr. Waltham. "I did not think you were such a simpleton."

"Deevil a simpleton, neither, sir," said the Scot, drawing up and looking aghast; "ye see, sir, the puir lass has just committed a bit of a fore paw, an' only wants to——"

"And an illegitimate child, too?" exclaimed Mr. Waltham quite in a passion. "Really, Murdoch, if I did not know your character, I should not allow this sort of extraordinary proceeding even to be spoken of."

"Vera weel, sir," said Murdoch, going; "I'll just drive the lass out an' her bit bairn, to sleep on the lee side of Hail Hill, puir unfortunate creatures."

"O father," said Agatha, "hear all that Murdoch has to say before you refuse a lodging to any houseless wanderer. Alas! you know we were almost houseless ourselves."

"I wad na hae spoken to you about the puir lass, sir," said Murdoch, returning, "if she had been any thing like a misleit limmer. But she has neither a brazen face nor a slut's ee, nor she's nae gomeril gawky; but she has been sadly abused an' deceived, silly thing, an' I fand her greeting beneath a hedge, rather than return to the house she has disgraced, or expose the scoundrel who first deceived and afterwards used her cruelly."

"She can stay till to-morrow, if you can accommodate her below, Murdoch," said Mr. Waltham calmly.

"May be, sir, ye might do waur than keep her to attend my young mistress there," said Murdoch. "It's a puir house without a woman body, butt an' ben. It wad be as pleasant to see her bonny young face, coming to the door at meal time to cry the lads into their dinners; and then at night when we were a' at hame, to hear our tales by the fireside, when the sca bizzes among the rocks in the Pirate's Creek, an' the wind whistles o'er the lum-head. Lord, sir, I hav'na a creature except muckle Will Weatherhead to sing a sang to in this back-o-beyond place. It's a mecesserable house without a woman!"

"Very true, Murdoch," said Mr. Waltham, smiling at the natural poetry that broke in upon the Scot; "but my house now is not like any other house," he added mournfully.

"Ah, father," said Agatha, "permit the poor young woman to remain, at least for a short time, in my service. Do not thrust her out from protection on account of—— Alas! I dare not mention one who was once——"

"No! do not mention!" said her father sternly. "I have no objection to your having a female servant, but women's tongues are little to be trusted in circumstances like mine; and why should we expose even our poverty to strangers?"

"Let the young woman get whatever accommodation we can offer for to night at least," said Agatha to Murdoch; on hearing which, he bowed, and groped his way down the narrow stairs leading from the chamber.

CHAPTER XI.

The castle of Arnwood was thrown into even a deeper gloom than that which was accustomed to abide there, by the sudden death of the lady Arnwood. The decease of his mother, to whom he had been accustomed to look up as the only friend left to him in the world; and, indeed, the only remaining motive of existence, affected Arnwood sensibly: and now that she was removed from him for ever, he delighted to dwell, with melancholy fondness, upon the oft-repeated advice, exhortations, and prayers, which only maternal fondness can give forth.

But after the first burst of grief, Arnwood relapsed into his former solitary existence—seen by nobody, and seeking none; and the diurnal duties of the castle proceeded as usual, with slight variation, the important Mr. Mollison and the no less precise Mrs. Goodyear, forming the twin stars round which the meaner planetary domestics were accustomed to revolve.

There was a difference, however, in Lord Arnwood, which was somewhat apprehensively observed by his favourite servant, but even more keenly known to himself. His love of solitude seemed to have returned with tenfold power, and was now growing upon him into a shrinking and haughty jealousy of society, which overcame even his lurking wish to meet and communicate once more with the mysterious occupant of the Pilot's Mark. His abstraction was at times so perfect, that he seemed to forget to supply the ordinary wants of nature, and gave himself up to general and deep contemplation on the condition of humanity.

His bitterness of feeling amounted, on some occasions, to rage and almost madness; and his scorn of common things and of the world caused him to neglect his person, and to wander abroad in all seasons, particularly on the shore or through the woods, where he could find perfect privacy; and sometimes he would stray, amid storm and rain, from midnight until the dawning of the new day. Sometimes he even gloried in his solitude, and stood on the highest point of land he could find, or on some rock jutting into the sea, and let the rain beat upon his face in an enthusiastic communion with nature. At those times he drew in the pure breath of Heaven in the pride of his own thoughts, and his mind working itself into a fever of excitement and proud enjoyment of his being, he felt, as he said, in nearer fellowship with God. But, at other times, a yearning sadness and intolerable weariness would come over him, and he felt that bursting oppression of thought only to be relieved by allowing the wells of the heart to gush forth in the sweet communion of friendship.

At these moments, dreams of some embodied excellence in woman, and recollections of early visions, associated with imaginings connected with the Pilot's Mark, were still the resources which soothed his sad spirit, and at times determined him to rouse himself and once more to go abroad into the world, and at least to ascertain whether he was not acting irrationally and deceiving himself with misanthropic fancies and vague forebodings.

Yet still, the ardent wishes of youth, and an eagerness to retrieve the fallen state of his family, although they often filled his mind with plans and his heart with aspirations, usually ended, when he turned his thoughts that way, in little else but regret and perplexity. To every plan, his pride and his sensitive dignity of mind made objections which he had not yet decision to overcome; and although indeed the general nature of his enquiries endeared him to his species, yet it also deepened his contempt for whatever was base or mean, and widened the separation between himself and the mass of the world, while it inflamed his imagination, and increased his love for meditative solitude.

The only plan his mind suffered itself now to entertain, was the old one of some advantageous marriage, whereby the honours of his birth and title might in some measure be exchanged for wealth, by an union with a house of lower rank. But here again his previous objection to venture again into society, and to seek for such an object, and his proud reluctance to the pursuit, were now increased into absolute repugnance, by still intruding fancies regarding the beautiful vision of the Mark, which mingled with his cherished recollections, and now more than ever haunted his thoughts, and unsettled his resolutions for the future.

These thoughts occupied him so entirely one mild and still autumnal day, that by the time evening came on, he wandered almost unconsciously along the cliffs above the shore, towards the Mark, with a vague hope, as he drew near the old edifice, that he might meet his mysterious tenant—or that in some way, through the agency of the Scotchman, Murdoch, or by any other lucky chance, he might see or hear something of the lady, who he was convinced was within. He descended to the level sands that swept round the small bay known by the name of the Pirate's Creek, as the early quarter moon appeared high over head, shedding a faint and flickering light upon the waves, and throwing into dark relief the lofty length of the comfortless building in front. He walked on to the very door, but scarcely a light, or the sign of living inhabitant, appeared from any of the small windows distinguishable along its black walls or among its naked angles; and it was only as he passed near a low window, that he heard a soft whispering, and then the voice of Murdoch Macara seeming to answer some one within, in the words of an old song, eked out with his own fancies:—

"I hae a wee whittle the best o' gude steel,
And wad that wee whittle I make my trout croel.
I'll gie't to thee, lassie, an' mickle beside,
Gin thou w'lt come, lassie, an' sit in my plaids,
Sling whailshaw whailshaw,
Ballilaw, ballilaw!"

"as the fisher lad sang to the milkmaid,"

"But the lady, think of the baby," answered a female voice in a kind love whisper.

"Ou, ay, the bairn, that's true. But hoot! never heed about the bairn, puir wee thing. We'll feed it wi' brose an' parritch, till it grows big, an' we'll send it out to rin on the sands in the warm simmer days. An' then, my bonny lass, we'll grow sober."

Arnwood, as he stood listening at the window, was getting interested in this scene, when he heard the conversation suddenly interrupted by a quick step and another female voice speaking in hurried accents, as if in distress, while she hastily gave some order to the Scotchman. He passed hastily on, wondering what he had heard might mean, and walked round, proceeding at the rear of the Mark by the sheltered path at the foot of Hail Hill, before noticed, leading towards New Hall.

He was pacing slowly on in his contemplative manner, when he thought he heard footsteps pattering rapidly behind him, and stopping to listen, the night being very still, and looking down the path, he perceived a female figure, her head uncovered, and in the simplest dress, coming hastily forward. Arnwood felt his heart beat quick, as the figure approached. The female seemed so occupied that she did not perceive him until she was quite near him, when she gave a half shriek and started a few steps back.

"Be not afraid, madam," said Arnwood, advancing with feelings strongly excited, for he perceived by the stream of light which passed between the birch trees, the features of the lovely unknown who had so long dwelt upon his imagination.

"My Lord Arnwood," said the sweet girl, with perfect self-possession, but much apparent anxiety, "have you seen my father, Mr. Waltham, to-night? Excuse my presumption, but I am obliged to waive ceremony at the present moment."

"I have not," said Arnwood; "but say, what has happened to him? You seem agitated."

"Ah, my lord," said the young lady imploringly, "do not detain me. I must endeavour to find my father."

"But why this agitation? your father will doubtless return."

"I know not the precise meaning of my own apprehensions, but my poor father is in a strange state of mind."

"Let me assist you in seeking him," said Arnwood, while they proceeded silently together; "but what reason have you for going in this direction? this road leads towards New Hall."

"I cannot well account for my fears, but my father has been some time gone, and I dread his meeting with the owner of yonder mansion, Mr. Bolton."

"Why, lady? there is something mysterious in this."

"I cannot tell you now, my lord. I do not fully know myself; perhaps my fears may deceive me. Alas! he is nowhere to be seen, and the night is cold, and——"

The lady looked round her and then in Arnwood's face while she spoke, as if feeling the impropriety of her situation; but the look was so touchingly imploring, that he seized her extended hand as if transfixed to the spot, and was for some moments unable to speak.

"I think there is much of my own weakness in all this anxiety," she said, at length, laying one hand on her heart, as she still suffered him to retain the other, "forgive me, my lord, but my poor heart-broken father is the only friend I have left in the world."

"I pledge myself to find your father," said Arnwood, warmly. "But on this condition—that you will suffer me to speak to you for another moment by the light of this moon, and on the sands before the door of the Pilot's Mark?"

"I ought not, my lord; and yet if you find my father, surely I may—I will;" and with these words she turned away, and, as Arnwood gazed, slowly withdrew down the path and was soon lost among the shadows of the hill.

As soon as Agatha disappeared, Arnwood proceeded along the bushy sheltered path with some haste towards New Hall, and looked round every where as he went, without meeting the object of his search. As he passed in front of the mansion, although the moon was nearly obscured, he distinctly perceived a person enter it by a door in the wing, but of course this could not be Mr. Waltham, and seemed rather to be Mr. Bolton himself. Arnwood was beginning to return slowly towards the Mark, when he came unexpectedly upon a figure pacing hastily backwards and forwards on the turf, in a nook of the shrubbery.

"Who are you?" said a voice accosting him, in a hoarse and broken tone.

"A friend, sir," said Arnwood, drawing near.

"This is very strange, my lord, that you should be here at this moment."

"Why, sir? Why strange?" said Arnwood, in surprise. "Good God! what is that in your hand?"

"Ha! see you the weapon? 'tis a good blade."

"A dagger! what mean you, Mr. Waltham?"

"It is very strange," still repeated the old man, looking in Arnwood's face, "that you should be here at this moment. The will of heaven seems dark to me."

"Come along, my dear sir," said Arnwood, taking him by the arm. "Your daughter seeks you distractingly."

"My daughter! My Agatha! So—oh God, that my destiny were fulfilled!" and he struck his forehead in agony.

"Put up that fearful weapon, sir, or throw it from you—come—"

"Throw it from me! ha, ha!" and Mr. Waltham held out the dagger and laughed wildly, as the moon shone in his face. "I tell you, my lord," he resumed, "were I to bury this piece of fatal steel in the depths of the earth, or throw it into the fathomless sea, the monsters of the deep would cast it up and bring it to me, until, by its means, I had fulfilled my destiny."

"You amaze me by this language," said Arnwood, surveying the pale features of the old man. "Where found you, sir, this dagger, and why do you wear it thus?"

"That little blade," resumed he, looking at the weapon as they walked along, "belonged to my family from time immemorial, and strange traditions have been handed down with it; I know not distinctly their import, I forget even the tales themselves—but this I know, that I cannot lose or get rid of it until I fulfil my fate."

"You are in a delusion, Mr. Waltham. This is mere infatuation."

"How confident in their ignorance are the young!" he replied, calmly. "Pardon me, my lord;" and as he spoke he took hold of Arnwood's arm, with strong emotion. "Have I not lost every thing that was mine or my father's to lose? Are not my lands and mansions in the possession of strangers? Were not the precious relics of my father's house sold by the hammer of the auctioneer? Has not the last of my once great wealth been swallowed up by the yawning deep? All, all gone—all but this accursed dagger. No! I never could lose that."

"It is strange," said Arnwood, thoughtfully; "but let us hasten to the Mark."

"Yes, we may go to-night," added Waltham, musing, "for although the fated man who was my ruin came out and passed before me—though he stood within reach of my very dagger, my arm was restrained. The time destined by heaven was not come to accomplish my just revenge."

"Your misfortunes have affected your mind," said Arnwood, earnestly, "and I fear you are deceiving yourself, even to crime."

"How can I help seeing the manifest indications of fate in the events of my own history? Why did my angelic wife die upon this coast, while I was proceeding to a destination almost contrary? Why was she buried even in that burying ground behind Arnwood castle, by the permission of your own lady mother, when you were absent on your travels? Why was my favourite daughter the victim of a villain who now glories in prosperity, and rolls in wealth? And why was I, with my remaining child, afterwards wrecked upon this very shore, while on our way to Holland, and planted by Providence beside the very man who had sought this retirement, thinking never to come in contact with us on earth?"

"Gracious Providence!" exclaimed Arnwood, half mentally.

"Oh heaven and earth! what decrees are thine!" continued the old man; and he threw up his arms like Lear, in the agony of his spirit.

"But fortune will yet turn round her unsteady wheel," said Arnwood, scarcely knowing what he said.

"Look abroad in the world," Mr. Waltham continued, with a calmness that was affecting, "and you will see the very contrary of your unsatisfactory assurance. Do you not see that fortune, as we term it, pours favours into the lap of some, as if in spite of themselves, and often follows worthlessness with rewards, as if with a zealous and determined profusion? Do you not see that there are others, yea, whole families, who, in spite of the most anxious endeavours and the best laid plans, are pursued by the same fortune (call it what you will) until they and their calamities are at length swallowed up in the great gulf of destiny?"

"It may be so—"

"Nay, it is so."

"Sometimes. What you contend for, however, is the existence of a mysterious and inevitable law; and this you cannot establish by a few insulated instances." Waltham did not reply aloud, although his white lips moved as if in speech, and his companion concluded that the unsettled mind of the old man had wandered from the subject.

When they arrived at the Pilot's Mark, however, he turned round, and gazing upon the young lord with a solemn earnestness, "The unfortunate," said he, "have a strange and sympathetic attraction to each other. Methinks your fate is to be in some measure linked with mine. Remember this, my proud youth, there are some men whose whole existence is a demand upon one virtue—fortitude. Now, good night, my lord, good night."

Arnwood stood in a sort of stupor for some time after Mr. Waltham had left him, and was still pacing backwards and forwards on the sands before the Mark, when he saw the door open, and the figure of Agatha Waltham come gliding towards him. As she came forward, she presented her hand with the frank ease of true modesty, and uttered a few words of thanks for his attention to her father. Arnwood absolutely trembled with a new and delicious emotion. He muttered his reply like one in a dream. He altogether forgot that it was by his own request she was there; and when, in another instant, she vanished like a spirit from his eyes, he rushed suddenly from the spot, as if afraid of venting aloud the extravagance of his strange intoxication.

CHAPTER XII.

We must now take a peep into the small dining parlour in Mr. Bolton's house, which, together with its neighbouring and more magnificent apartment appropriated to the same purpose, had, from the squire's first taking possession of New Hall, been the scene of such incessant devastation and extravagant consumption of viands and wine, as few fortunes could long support. Of late, however, the company entertained had been comparatively very limited in number—and indeed was chiefly confined to two persons; one of whom was Lord Arnwood's old tutor, Mr. Johnston, who found it expedient to stick close to the squire, and even to join him in his Bacchanalian habits, to an extent which the economy of his own constitution by no means warranted, and which only seemed justified by the greatness of the stake for which he was playing; and the other was Mr. Hulson, not altogether a saint, as the judicious reader may have surmised, yet still, perhaps, deserving a few words of fair description.

Joshua Hulson, as he appeared at present at the squire's table, was rather a well looking little man, with a knowing black eye, a good shrewd eyebrow, and the central and prominent feature of his countenance, which his companions elegantly called the handle of his face, of a consistence and colour, which, if not absolutely resembling Master Bardolph's, at least showed that youth, and youth's soundness, had been left considerably behind by the wearer; and that his virtues, whatever their nature or extent, were, at all events, not those of an abominable anchorite.

Hulson's late years had been passed chiefly, as we may in common phraseology say—in the society of gentlemen—that is, of gentlemen who are every where to be met with by similar gentlemen—who go every where, and are up to every thing, and see every thing, and ridicule every thing that makes the least pretensions to elevation of sentiment—and who vie with each other in the coarseness and heartlessness of bachelor sentiments and society. With respect to the place where such gentlemen meet, we need not be particular, for they are known to every body, from the parties and clubs in town, to the race grounds and watering places. But Hulson had been of late (for it is needless to mince the matter) a good deal of rogue—but then there are degrees in roguery as well as in other accomplishments; and among a crowd of men who have each a share of this quality, or at least, among whom integrity and worth are very scarce, he was "by no means without virtue;" and in fact, taking into account that he possessed very little, he shone forth occasionally as almost a saint, compared with his associates. He had even, hackneyed as he was in the ways of the world, a secret love of virtue and honesty, and an ambition to practise them when circumstances would allow him;—but from a long intimacy with the worst side of human nature, he thought these a visionary kind of good for which a man need not ruin and make a fool of himself by adhering to them in a general way. As for high sentiments and fine feelings, he acknowledged that he had felt a twinge of them when he was young and raw, but he thought that, like religion, they were only useful for the poor and the simple, who did not understand how to live in the world.

Johnston, who sat at his elbow, was by no means so praiseworthy a character as our friend Hulson, although he talked like an angel about every thing that was excellent. The two worthies, however, were seated lovingly together over their wine; while the squire—in whom they had of late observed an occasional change of manner for which they could not account—had stolen out and taken a solitary turn in the shrubbery by the moonlight, where he unexpectedly encountered Mr. Waltham, as mentioned in the last chapter.

"What freakish fancy is this, friend Bolton?" said Hulson, peeping through between the candles, behind which he and Johnston sat, as the squire entered the room after his walk. "By the little finger of Bacchus, which has a tendency upwards, here are Johnston and I drinking ourselves into the best of humour in bumpers to the health of our worthy host, and other absent friends (hiccup!);—while you, our said host, are abroad playing will-o'-the-wisp over the moors and fens towards the sea, or walking the ghost under shadow of the black turrets of that frightful old castle beyond the wood. Here, let me fill for you—shall it be Madeira? claret is too cold for a man who has been riding the bogs."

"I return your compliment, gentlemen," was all the squire could force himself to say, gulping down a bumper of the liquor recommended.

"Hey—hah—what!" exclaimed Hulson, shading his eyes with his hand, as he fixed them as strongly as the muddled state of his faculties would allow him, upon the squire's countenance. "Bolton—what the devil is the matter? Have you seen a witch? By the foulest imp that ever grinned over a rag, your face is as pale as a sheet or a shirt (it's all the same), and your teeth chatter like castanets. Here, man, another toothful—now, sir, as the mayor of Norwich said to the king, 'Hold up your head and look like a man!'"

"Do I look pale, Hulson?" said Bolton, recovering himself, and striving to laugh it off; "nonsense! I only felt a little chill from the night air. Come, Johnston, you look as sober as a sexton, and stare at me as if you did not know me. There—fill up like a brave fellow, and take a pattern by Hulson, my excellent 'drouthy cronie.' Hulson, you're a jewel of a drinker."

"I know I am, I know I am—that's right, Bolton," cried Hulson, in drunken triumph at the compliment. "But you shan't laugh us out of a tangible reason for these night rambles. We must know where you have been riding astride your broomstick—for you are not the same man of late. You were as white in the gills when you entered, as though Lady Arnwood's ghost had risen up among the cliffs below, and brought you solens solena to Hail Hill, and tossed you over that ugly long dark lighthouse looking what do you call it, the Pilot's Mark."

"Johnston, have you nothing to say?" said the squire, turning off the 'free enquiries' of the merrier of his guests; "let us have a fair division of the talk as well as of the wine. Come, gentlemen, let me hear what your conversation was during my absence."

"We've just had a beautiful dispute about virtue—ha, ha, ha," shouted Hulson. "It is quite refreshing, as the canters say, to get into company with a saint. But the worst of it is, I've seen rather too much to be done, even by so good a spokesman as our friend Johnston here, so it is thrown away upon me."

"I am glad to hear that you had a lecture read to you in my absence, friend Hulson," said Mr. Bolton; "and I think you would do well to be a little more guided by the doctrines and precepts of Mr. Johnston."

"I would not willingly say an uncivil thing to you, Mr. Hulson," said Johnston, "for you are a friend of our worthy host, for whom I have the highest respect; but I am sorry to observe that you almost despise the very name of virtue and morality, and seem to treat the most beautiful precepts with perfect contempt."

"Perfect contempt!—you're very right!—perfect contempt—ha, ha," said Hulson. "Now that was a very well turned period. I'll tell you what it is, I am much about as great a rogue as my neighbours, and I don't wish to say anything particularly uncivil; but I do at least despise cant and humbug, and preaching about morals, when there is nothing for it but talk—and I shan't have my wine soured on the passage by a lecture on what no one present, in my belief, has any fair right to pretend to."

"Mr. Hulson, that is a very irreverent way of speaking," said Johnston. "If you were a man of sense, you would always defend and stand up for virtue and benevolence, whether you practised them or not."

"Should I? ha, ha—well, so I would, to schoolboys and pretty maidens, if the latter did not sometimes make me swerve a bit; but I am sure I would not trouble myself talking much about it to such reprobates as you, unless it were in jest. No, no—the lawyer's seals and signatures, the world's opinion at hand, and the hangman's halter in straight perspective, are the only things for us gentlemen who are going the broad way. So, Johnston, don't think to gammon me. I've heard enough of the world's talk in my time."

"For heaven's sake, Hulson," said Mr. Bolton, "'assume a virtue,' at least, as Shakspeare advises, for decency's sake."

"Confound your decency," exclaimed Hulson; "it is all decency together, and assumption too, and nothing else, and that is what I complain of; and are men of experience and knowledge, like you and myself, Bolton, to sit here and listen daily to the preaching, about excellence and virtue, of a man who thinks to bamboozle me into an admiration of him on the score of a love of morality, merely by talking prettily about it—when I could swear from that very thing, a priori, that he is the greatest rogue of the three of us!"

"What do you mean, sir?" said Johnston, endeavouring to appear indignant. "What have I said to offend you, Mr. Hulson, or to deserve such names? You did not use to be quarrelsome in your cups."

"No more I am, sir methodist, but I'd quarrel with the devil if he'd offer to humbug me to my face, and try to make me believe him an angel of light, when I know better; but as for you, sir, you have not the spirit to quarrel for the sake of an odd word of truth, even for decency's sake, as you say, and yet you are the worst of the three, sir, you know you are."

"Hulson, what is that you say about the three," said Mr. Bolton; "this is nothing but calling names; you have drank your wine, but you had better not go too far with this sort of language."

"Mr. Bolton," said Hulson, thrusting his two hands down to the bottom of his breeches pockets, his black eyes glancing towards the squire with drunken energy, "I know I am sitting here with my legs under your mahogany, drinking your wine, and I know that I am pretty considerably drunk—but are you about to forfeit the little good opinion I have of you, by assuming the cant of those who have not the spirit to call things by their right names, and upholding this new acquaintance of yours in his abominable whine? Will you pretend to tell me that we are not three very tolerable rogues, and will it mend the matter, if, by canting about virtue, we attempt to hide that fact from ourselves or even from the world? Nay, don't interrupt me, nor turn white in the face about it, as you were to-night when you came in, for a man must speak the truth sometimes, and if you cannot stand it any longer, and have something like a conscience, why cut the connection at once, shake hands with Satan manfully, and turn a new leaf."

"My dear Hulson," said Mr. Bolton, somewhat disconcerted, "I am not used to see you in this vein. I know we are not saints—but come, don't be so inquisitorial, and let us have a glass of wine and a change of subject."

"With all my heart—come, Mr. Excellence," said Hulson, resuming his good humour and turning to Johnston, "join us at least in swallowing what stands before us. Upon my honour I should not have the least malice against you, if you would only, for common sense and decency's sake, confess yourself to be a rascal."

"We are none of us what we ought to be, Mr. Hulson," said Johnston with a penitent look, and at the same time holding his glass to be filled; "men are but men."

"So they are, that is a very profound saying, friend," replied Hulson, leering at the other with contempt. "But there is a deal of difference between men for all that."

"Well now, sir, drink your wine, and don't be too severe upon poor human nature," said Johnston fawningly. "You know you are not backward in confessing that you are a little of a rogue yourself."

"Yes, but you have a love for rogery, and a taste for crooked ways, and I have not, and that makes all the difference. I am bad enough, God knows," added Hulson, bitterly, "and I know it; but, by heavens, it goes to the bottom of my stomach to be called rogue, and be at the same time lectured on morality by you."

"My dear fellow," said Mr. Bolton, interfering, "will you remember that this is my house, and that Mr. Johnston is my guest; and although you have taken your wine freely, do let us enjoy ourselves and be good friends."

"I'll be friends to no man, sir," said Hulson, getting sober in his anger, "who offers to speak of religion and virtue in my presence, with no better pretence to the practice of them than any one of us here. I am sober enough still not to suffer my understanding to be insulted by cant. If we are men of the world, and have made our money as we could, and got on in our own way, in the name of reason let us at least talk fairly to each other."

A dead pause here occurred for some minutes, while the squire, who was on the fidgets to talk to Johnston apart about something that lay heavy on his mind, looked across to him with a disconcerted and even wild look; while Hulson, with his brows drawn down and his mouth drawn up, sat watching them both with an expression of piercing enquiry shooting from his black eyes.

"Why don't you speak?" he at length said, in a tone that made the others start—"I will be at the bottom of this look-language, Mr. Johnston: and since I have got on this subject at last, I must tell you that as clever a fellow as I think myself, I positively do not understand your motive for causing the quarrel between our friend Bolton, and Lord Arnwood over the way. Now, sir, as Mr. Bolton and I are older acquaintances than you, and he are,—and as I have a strong notion, by these looks between you, and these night wanderings, that you are striving to help my friend to some job that he is not yet bad enough to undertake—I shall take the liberty of insisting upon your saying this very instant what made you take such pains to cause the quarrel with the young lord—in which I myself was not free from blame. This do I for the sake of all parties."

"I cause the quarrel with Lord Arnwood, sir?" said Johnston quailing—"I deny any such thing, and I appeal to Mr. —"

"Appeal to me, sir," said Hulson, thumping the table, "and to no one else, until I am satisfied. I choose to be the judge myself, for you abused my opinion also of the noble youth. Not only did you dwell upon the young baron's poverty—which was bad enough, after you had eaten his bread for years—but poison our thoughts as to his qualities, insinuating that he was every thing that was contemptible, so as to make Bolton, and even myself, treat him cursedly ill, that is the truth; and you thus disappointed Bolton of forming a connection, which would have been a credit and a salvation to him. Now, sir, I say that Lord Arnwood behaved like a gentleman, as he has shown himself, and a man of honour and spirit—and that you were the cause of this quarrel."

"I am sorry you think so, sir," said Johnston coolly—"but I can only say I had no motive in speaking what I thought the truth, but friendship to Mr. Bolton."

"Friendship! pish—there now, Bolton," added Hulson, turning to his host—"By heaven! this man would cant the hangman from his purpose with the rope round his neck; and still you are silent! Well, give me another glass of wine to drown care, for this house will soon be too bad for me to set my foot in, after all I have seen!"—and so saying, he filled a flowing glass, and drinking it off, flounced indignantly out of the room towards his sleeping apartment.

"There must be something rotten in the state of Denmark after all," said Mr. Bolton thoughtfully, a few moments after the exit of that gentleman—"when my old friend Hulson has taken the alarm. In truth, I don't feel well, Mr. Johnston, and what I was going to say to you has all gone out of my head. You will excuse me, but I must retire."

"If you are ill, sir," said the other, now taking courage, "you were best to retire of course. But if the drunken impertinence of a man who is only jealous because he is not consulted, while another is preferred, be sufficient to tie your tongue or make you waver in your purpose—you have less decision, or, to speak plainly, more weakness of character than I imagined."

"Leave me, sir," said Bolton, in strong agitation; "decision must be built upon thought—to-night I am confused and unwell—we shall talk further—to bed—to bed!"

CHAPTER XIII.

Meanwhile, although the spirits of Lord Arnwood and Agatha Waltham were considerably raised, since their short interview of the previous night, the situation of the latter in the Pilot's Mark, to which we now return, was by no means to be envied. Among other evils that pressed of late upon her heart and extinguished the hopes of youth, poverty with its iron gripe and chilling calculations was fast circumscribing the narrow means to which she looked for some relief from her present strange and irksome situation. The household cares of her little frugal establishment, she, though so young, had taken entirely upon herself, from tenderness to her father, upon whose mind his misfortunes had made such impression that he was becoming every hour more incapable of entering into the most common affairs, either of his family, or of a world from which he thought himself destined soon to be withdrawn.

A single purse of specie, which had been saved to him, when all else was lost, by the shrewd foresight of the honest Scot, had been so much drawn upon on their settling themselves in the Mark, that she almost entirely depended for their subsistence upon the produce of the sea; which the faithful Macara and his companion ransacked for their support, selling the produce at the nearest market town, whence they usually returned with the small stock of provisions necessary for the economical establishment. Of late, however, since the accession of Mary Reynolds and her infant to their number in the Mark—and from the accidents of the sea and the weather, which make the simple occupation of the fisherman as uncertain as the speculations of those who cast their nets for the favours of fortune, on a much more artificial surface and by a much more complex mode—the purse of the old gentleman had been reluctantly applied to more than once, and Agatha dreaded having recourse to it again, afraid to enquire into the actual state of their finances.

She sat this morning, therefore, in her little window in the turret, watching the arrival of Murdoch and his boat, eager to know what was his morning's success. She observed at length the boat approach the shore, but it did not come in towards the Pirate's Creek as usual, the men appearing to wish to land on the contrary side of the little point, and further down in the bay.

Agatha was so anxious that, contrary to the wish of her father, she set off alone to meet Murdoch, and learn what he had caught. The morning was not sunny, but the air was still and sultry; and though she was glad of an excuse to go abroad in the daylight, she neither felt the odorous smell of the country, nor the usual fresh breeze from the sea, and the whole sky, as she tripped along the sands towards the boat, seemed dull and portentous.

"There now, Will Watersheet," said Murdoch to his companion, as they drew in shore, "just starboard a wee, an' steer for that black stane wi' the towrie on the tap o't like a miller's bonnet—an' so we'll slip up to the Mark by the back way, for Miss Agatha watches us like pussey when we come in by the creek, an' I'm perfect black ashamed to be coming hame at this time o' day, wi' nicol naething in the boat, like a fule."

"Who can help it man," said Watersheet, "such a morning as this?" It is easily seen that you are no regular-bred fisherman, or you would not keep grumbling at a summer calm or a cross-current. But, hillo! who comes yonder? By the beard of old Neptune, Murdoch, there is the wench that you're singing of in your very sleep, coming down on the sands towards us like a king-fisher."

"That Mary Reynolds? na; faith. Eh, man, Will Wathersheet, but ye're a poor judge o' a woman. Ye're a deevlish deal better judge o' could fish sooming in the sea than ye are o' warm bits o' bodies like the women, fair fa' them. Starboard your helm, Will."

"Starboard it is; but I don't know what I'm doing for listening to you—you're always singing, or rhyming, or raving about something."

"Eh but, Will, they're warm sonsie creatures, the lassies—puir things—an' a great comfort to a man, especially when he's down in the mouth, an' like to take the drunts at the warl'. It just does me gude to think about them in my affliction, and as for singing or rhyming, man, if I was na sae ill-humour'd this morning for my bad luck, I'd sing you a lilt to the tune o' 'Ranting roaring Willie.' Here goes on a chance:—

O dinna ye like the lassies, they're welcome aye to me;
O dinna ye like the lassies, they're welcome aye to me,
They're welcome aye to me, though ever sae dowie and sad,
For mony a ranting day the lassies an' I hae had!
O dinna ye like the lassies, when poorth tries you sair,
O dinna ye think a sweet lassie would drive away dogged despair.
When she mingles a smile wi' a tear
And points to good fortune at hand,
For the smile o' her mouth, an' the tear o' her ee,
My heart could na'er withstand—

"Now that's no sae bad aff hand. Hard a-port, Will—"

"Hard a-port—Fend off there, Murdoch, and give over your chanting. It's not lucky to be singing in this ugly calm over our empty boat."

"Od!" exclaimed Murdoch, jumping ashore. "I'll be whuppet if that's not Miss Agatha herself coming down to question us, when we have na a john-dory in the boat. Will! faith you must speak up this time."

"I'm no orator, Mr. Murdoch, particularly when the world's tide is ebbing—so just give it to the lady yourself, either in prose or rhyme."

"Well, lads," said Agatha, coming forward, "what luck to-day?"

"Miserable, mem! meeserable!" said Murdoch.

"That is unfortunate."

"We might as weel fish in Mary Reynolds's potatoe tub as try it this tide, mem," continued the Scot. "The swell is a' frae the sather, and the sea is as white as meal gruel, an' ye'll as soon bring up the glistening pearls or the red coral as any sort o' fish off this shore the day."

"And do you think it will not be better by the night's tide?" said Agatha.

"Will Wathersheet says that there's the swell o' a blast aff the eastert; an' if that be true our bit cobble will no do muckle gude next tide, I'm thinking."

"Is that the case, William?" said she, addressing the sailor.

"It's moral certain, ma'am," said Wathersheet, proud of being spoken to. "It's sure to blow fresh and cast up a sea before midnight; and yet there was Mr. Macara here singing about the lassies as we came in, just like a mermaid before a storm—and that promised no good luck, as I told him."

"Hoot, mem, never heed Will Wathersheet," said Macara; "he has no sense; an' as for my rhyming an' singing, faith it's a' the comfort I hae whyles when the worl' gins against me."

Agatha returned home to the Mark with feelings of great concern and anxiety. It was no longer a question of retrenchment and economy, for actual want now stared them in the face; and, in spite of the buoyancy of youth, and the brightness of youthful hope, she shrank in terror at the prospect. She saw she could not defer for an hour longer applying to her father to dole out to her from the remains of his little store, the means of obtaining a supply of provisions, from the nearest market, which was immediately needed. But how to set about that, and effect it without again rousing the old man's feelings, to an extent which she feared to contemplate, baffled all her ingenuity.

Her meditations on the most delicate mode of informing her father of her necessities were mingled with sad apprehensions of the future as she sat musing at the window; and then vague thoughts of Lord Arnwood, and scarcely suppressed wishes for another opportunity of meeting him, induced her to look involuntarily towards the castle, but in vain, for a sight of him until the day was far advanced. She was surprised to find that her father did not walk out as usual to-day, nor indeed had she met him at all, as he partook of his slight dinner in his own chamber, in which, however, it was nothing unusual for him to confine himself for days together. At length, taking courage, she went and tapped at the door, and entering, found him, as usual, sitting occupied with his few books and papers, which were his chief consolation.

"Agatha, my love, is it you?" he said, as he admitted her; "come in and sit beside me. In truth I blame myself for not enquiring for you, and I am glad you have come of yourself. Sit down, my child, and let me look at you."

"I am delighted to see you so well, and so happy, father," said Agatha, "yet, indeed, I think my disturbing you will be nothing the worse for either of us, for I longed to see you."

"Did you, my dear child? heaven make you happy! How like you are to your heavenly mother this moment, my sweet Agatha! I had just been meditating upon her and her virtues, and that future world where she is now dwelling with spirits of light and glory; and where I am soon to follow her. And yet, the meditation was at an end, and thou hast relieved my solitude again like an earthly angel. God be gracious to thee, my child;—and the old man melted into tears as he gazed upon her."

"Father," she said, shedding tears with him: "I am happy to find you so calm even while you are affected so deeply. And now, tell me how you have spent your day in this chamber. Surely you are too solitary."

"Solitude is good and becoming in my circumstances, Agatha, for I have had my time of pleasure and joy, such as the world has to give, and now it is time to consider my past life. I have rioted with the rich in my day, and laughed loud with the wanton and the high fed, and gloried in my possessions with the thoughtless and the extravagant. I was in my time one of the 'Gay, licentious, proud,

Whom pleasure, power, and affluence surround.'

—yes, amidst a world where there is much of sadness and suffering, poverty and privation, and where the bitter tear of the afflicted, shed in private and on the sleepless pillow, is seen only by Him who turns not away from misfortune and sorrow—and where the groans of those who have no helper on earth enter only into the ears of the Almighty. I was too ignorant of human suffering, and too thoughtless, to be good. I was too confident in wealth, to feel a sympathy founded on personal apprehension. But heaven laughs at the ignorance of wretched mortals, whose trust is in the spider's web; for, as Job saith, 'we are but of yesterday, and know nothing, because our days upon the earth are a shadow.'"

"But you were once happy with us, dear father, when we were in Brussels, and when we had no wretched cares for subsistence, and my mother was so amiable, and Eliza was so—alas!"

"Yes—true. Like the same Job, 'when the Almighty was yet with me, when my children were about me, my roof was spread out by the waters, and the dew lay all night upon my branch,'—but well may I say now, 'I was not in safety, neither had I rest, neither was I quiet, yet trouble came,'—and now I have the satisfaction of knowing what is the portion of my cup, and I am resigned and ready."

"Father, do not talk thus mysteriously—surely something may yet be done for us, to restore you to happiness."

"Nothing can be done, Agatha, until my fate is fulfilled; but I have prayed earnestly to heaven for strength to bear all. From the silence and solitude of this chamber I have bent my knees with tears to the Most High, imploring him to forgive me the sin that I seem impelled to commit, and to bear the frightful consequences like a man, until my struggling spirit is, perhaps, on the scaffold of the criminal, forced from its frail tenement, and carried to a future and an unknown world."

"Gracious heavens, father! what talk you of criminals and scaffolds! Oh! what horrible delusion is this? Think of your virtuous life, and your good name; think of my mother who is in heaven, and of me and my poor sister. Think of the God above us, and the world through which we are to struggle; and do not harbour the thought of crime. Oh, father, your poor Agatha would break her heart at the bare idea."

"Be peaceful and resigned, my child," said Mr. Waltham, striving to affect calmness. "The time at least is yet somewhat distant, although last night it seemed near. But I have prayed, and have obtained some assurance that the period has not yet arrived. But tell me, Agatha, did not I see you outside on the sands to-day?"

"Yes, sir. But it was only for a moment. I went out to know what fish had been caught, for I was so anxious—"

"And why so anxious, my love? I have often told you that anxiety about human events is gross folly, for we have no power over them. The measure of good and evil is meted out to us, and in respect of our little traffic in the produce of the sea, were you not already aware of its uncertainty?"

"But, sir, our provisions are all consumed, and Murdoch has caught nothing these two days, and I shall require a little of the gold you have left to send to market immediately. That is the cause of my troubling you."

"Certainly, my love. Agatha, are you aware that—My God!" he exclaimed, as he brought out the purse from a little trunk, "there is but one piece left. The other was given for repairs to the boat. My child! my child!"

"Oh, I see it all—I see it all," continued Mr. Waltham, rising and pacing the room in much agitation. "Go, my darling! go and buy provisions. There—it is the last piece, and the consummation of all things is at hand!"

"I cannot leave you in this spirit, father.—I will not!"

"Go, my child, and do not try either to tempt or to resist me. What saith Job, 'Shall we receive good at the hand of God and shall we not also receive evil?' No! the draught that heaven affords to man has always been, and always will be, a mixed draught; and the cup that is appointed for us we must drink. Away, my child. What a flash of lightning was that! The very storm that is gathering in the sky is a further evidence.—Away, Agatha—let me reflect, let me prepare, for the hour is come!"

CHAPTER XIV.

The feeling with which Lord Arnwood had seen Agatha on the level sand in the moonlight, as mentioned before, and beheld her vanish from his eyes, as she flitted across the little space between the gate of his plantation where they met, and the Pilot's Mark, which she entered, was of a kind to which he had been altogether unused of late years. Even the few words she had spoken sunk deeply into his heart; and the unreserved opportunity he had enjoyed of contemplating that countenance, and reciprocating glances with those eyes on which he had dwelt so long in imagination as on a delightful vision, filled him with sensations that resembled intoxication. A reality seemed to be disclosed to him in female perfection, and a felicity made apparent in female society, which, before, he had only contemplated in his dreams. Even now, however, there mingled somewhat of the visionary and fantastic with his impressions. Agatha—the Agatha whom he loved—was a being of his own creation, enchanted by the strong magic of fancy into the form of Miss Waltham. Still it was delightful to dwell upon the pleasing idea that—alone as he had thought himself in the world, and vague or dark as were his prospects—there might be one being who seemed, as he flattered himself, capable of reciprocating his feelings, and to whom his future fate would not be uninteresting.

"What can there be in the sound of woman's voice?" he said to himself, as with spirits of unusual lightness he strode along the moonlight cliffs towards home—"which has the power thus to relieve men's desponding thoughts, to melt their natures, and lighten their hearts into tenderness and joy. What witchery is there in her more presence! what music in her soothing speech! what charm in her glance of interest and sentiment! what raptures in her smile!—which in all ages has been celebrated for its effects upon man in his moments of the deepest sadness, or the most intolerable oppression." And from these generalising reflections he turned as he paced along—sometimes glancing towards the sea on his right, on which the moon shone dimly far towards the horizon, and sometimes through the vistas of the trees in his own grounds on the left—to a more intense consideration of the face and form of her from whom he had just parted: until the warmth of his fancy, as he looked upwards and around, led him to think with the poet, that the very forms and features of nature sympathised in his admiration.

The feelings of Agatha Waltham were as deeply engaged upon her return to the Mark, as those of Arnwood, and this short interview with a youth on whom her fancy had so much dwelt since the night when he was brought to her wounded and incenseable, was a gratification to her cherished feelings, and a relief to her spirits, as precious as Arnwood could have wished in his warmest moments of intoxication. Her father had retired to bed, and she mounted to her little chamber in the turret, and seating herself at the narrow window watched the young man's progress homeward as far as she could see him by the uncertain light of the moon, with feelings of pure maidenly interest, yet real though unsuspected passion. The pleasing fancies of the moment were so delicious, that, like Arnwood himself, she took no thought either of the difference of circumstances in life that parted them, or of the worldly folly of the dream she was indulging; but after watching at her window until she could no longer trace the receding form of him, whose respectful manner, yet ardent looks, were so flattering to her in her present low estate, she soon after retired to rest, with her heart lighter than usual, and her thoughts busy with the lofty and beautiful imaginings of youth.

When Arnwood awoke next morning, he thought the sun shone more cheerfully in at the chamber window than it had done for months past; that the woods waved around with a calmer beauty, and that he himself enjoyed a purer sense of delight than he had ever experienced since he left the home of his boyhood. Even the sea rolled placid and glorious in its morning beauty in the distance; and the stalwart and antique shape of the Pilot's Mark shot up between his view and the barrah lines of Hail Hill with a picturesque effect which he had never observed before. Undignified as it was compared with the stately castle in which he dwelt, it seemed to him at that moment to contain the pure and simple spirit of all earthly felicity.

His mind was now roused and stimulated, as if by some magical influence, and became again occupied with plans and prospect for the future; and having received an invitation to dine with his mother's venerated friend, Mr. Stone, the rector, he determined at once, with a spirit and decision for which he could not then account, to consult with him regarding a measure which he already proposed immediately undertaking. He did not meet Mr. Waltham on the shore, as he wished, although he had looked for him all the morning; and towards the afternoon, dressing himself with a care now unusual to him, he set off on horseback towards the classical retirement of the clergyman, which Arnwood loved and respected because it was as ancient and gloomy as his own old castle.

As he proceeded thither, and was already nearly three miles from Arnwood, he perceived on the road before him the figure of Mr. Bolton coming towards him, also on horseback—this being the first time he had seen him since their quarrel. There was something of embarrassment in his meeting alone on the road with a man, between whom and himself there had occurred so many circumstances of reluctant intimacy, proposed connection, subsequent insult, and angry midnight strife; and Arnwood was just reflecting, with a feeling of self-contempt, upon the escape he had had from a connection with a man whom he had now learnt to look upon with horror. The object of his meditations, however, drew near, and eyed him, as Arnwood supposed, as if he meant to speak. He was correct, for when they met, the squire turned his horse's head, and, raising his hat, stood still in apparent embarrassment. All Arnwood's aristocratic pride and moral indignation mounted into his eyes as he observed this, and instead of evincing any inclination to return in the most distant manner Bolton's salute, or to listen to what he meant to say, he merely gazed at him with a look of contemptuous astonishment, amounting to something more than the out direct of fashion, and passed on.

Arnwood would have thought no more about this incident, merely considering it one of the evidences of the radical degradation of mind, and heartless forwardness of bad men, had he not met on the road, as he proceeded, several gentlemen on horseback, some of whom he had formerly seen at Bolton's, as also carriages and other vehicles containing company, evidently proceeding to New Hall. This caused him to reflect upon several past occurrences which it gave him little pleasure to recall, and also upon several circumstances in which he could not help feeling that his own fortune, as well as that of his interesting friends of the Pilot's Mark, was at present too liable to be affected by this worthless man.

When Mr. Bolton arrived at home after passing Lord Arnwood on the road, he found letters from London and several notes, which had been received by the servants in his absence, the perusal of which seemed to give him serious concern, and to change the feelings with which he expected to have celebrated this his birth-day into the anxiety of disappointment and apprehension. A letter from his law agent in London, giving him private information of a considerable pecuniary loss, scarcely wounded his feelings so deeply as the contents of the notes, which brought refusals, in the shape of cold apologies, from several individuals and families of respectability with whom he had a slight acquaintance, and whom he had invited to visit him, and partake of the entertainment provided to celebrate this day.

The loss of his money was to Bolton a heavy enough blow, but the mean ambition of which he partook with others of his class, received a still more painful check, by those whose acquaintance he was desirous of making declining his invitation in the decided manner which their refusals intimated. Added to this, the insulting contempt with which Arnwood had just treated his attempted address, when he meant to have tried the effect of an apology for his former conduct, stung him to the quick, and, as he dwelt upon them, made him almost furious from deep-felt mortification.

"Becky," he said to his sister, as she came whisking past him through the parlour, in which he was walking from side to side in solitary agitation, his feelings also regarding Mr. Waltham of the Mark mixing with and rendering his reflections almost intolerable—"Becky, whither art thou hurrying? How is it that you are so constantly busy that you are never to be spoken to?"

"You know what I have to do this morning, Robert," she said; "how can I have time to talk when there is the whole house to look after? And such a dinner as must be on the table by six—and here it is nearly four o'clock already!"

"Curse the dinner! Haven't you servants?"

"But there are twenty things that I must be attending to myself, and when such people are coming as you have asked, one must take some pains to entertain them; or we shan't have a decent acquaintance except that everlasting Hulson, and that eternal Johnston. You know you went and picked a quarrel with the handsome lord of the old castle below, at the very time when I thought—"

"It was very bad of you, brother, and very unfortunate, and—"

"Are you going to reproach me too?"

"No, Robert, but one can never get speech of you for those men who are always with you. I have not even time to reproach you, if I were willing. But now, as there are ladies coming, I wish to be particular, and one so seldom sees a female face in the country that—"

"Don't harass yourself about the ladies, Becky," said Bolton with a bitter expression, "they are not coming."

"Not coming! Robert, not coming, do you say, after all?" exclaimed Miss Bolton, letting fall her bunch of keys and her cookery book with astonished disappointment.

"There, convince yourself," said he, thrusting the open apologies into her hand, and pacing the room rapidly.

"The only people whom I cared about," said the sister, "and to send apologies on the very day—what can this mean, Robert?"

"I'll tell you what it is, Becky," said the squire, standing at the opposite end of the room, with his back against the wall, his hands as far down into his lower pockets as he could thrust them, and his feet protruding on the floor considerably in advance of his body, "it is rather a hard thing for me to say, on my own birth-day (and I am now six and thirty,) but I have a strong notion that I am a confounded villain, and, what is worse, that people begin to find it out."

"Good Heavens, Robert, what language is this?"

"It is time for me to say something of the kind myself, when my guests begin to call me so in great candour and good humour at my own table."

"Who dares to talk so in this house?"—said Miss Becky; "and I toiling myself morning and night to see after the cooking for them—and the wine that they drink would drown a nation."

"Mr. Hulson told me so only last night," said the squire; "good naturedly including himself and Johnston—calling us all respectable rogues, and plainly insinuating that he thought himself the best of the three. But what was much harder to bear, after I had made up my mind, principally on your account, to apologise to Lord Arnwood, and try to bring him round again, he stared in my face this afternoon as I addressed him on the road, and passed on as contemptuously, as I should do to any one asking me for an alms."

"Heavens! and is there no hope then?—And Sir James is not coming, nor Lady Rooke—nor any of the Lenies—nor—"

At this moment the housekeeper entered in a bustle, with a string of enquiries relating to the dinner, and interrupted this interesting conversation.

CHAPTER XV.

As the evening advanced, and the gathering storm broke forth, although it was but little beyond the middle of summer, such a darkness enveloped the sky, as, together with its yellow hue overhead, and its shifting contrasts round the horizon, gave it something unusually awful. At least so thought Mr. Waltham, who sat contemplating the scene from his high window, in one of the turrets of the Mark; and every roll of the thunder, echoing away among the hills, and every flash of lightning across his eyes, as it clove the dull welkin, increased the agitation of his thoughts, and strung up his nerves into horrid resolution. So deeply impressed was his mind with the one consideration of the fulfilment of his destiny, that he thought the very heavens conspired to urge him on to it; and as the sea began to roar fearfully in the distance, under the dark clouds, in obedience to the sweeping gusts of wind that whitened the tops of its great rolling masses—and as the lightning broke clear behind the black form of Arnwood castle, the towers of which shot up gloomily through the drifting rain—he imagined that the very war of the elements was meant to point out to him the crisis when, as he said, all was to be fulfilled.

It was not, however, until late at night, when the storm had subsided, and only occasional flashes of lightning glimmered in the gloom, and the thunder growled faintly at a distance over the sea, that Mr. Waltham sallied forth to seek the accomplishment of his fate. Although he considered that his poverty was now conclusive evidence, the last piece of gold having been changed, and the very sea refusing to furnish from its womb any further subsistence until he should work out the decrees of heaven—yet he said to himself, as, wrapped in his cloak, he proceeded along the pathway towards New Hall—

"I will have a token, as I have had hitherto, that I may know of a surety whether it is really this very night that I am to do the deed. Bolton, my enemy, is now, like Belshazzar of Babylon, feasting in his house and drinking wine out of golden goblets; perhaps calling upon the gods to witness his voluptuousness, and swearing in the face of heaven, by the great golden idol whom the world has set up and worships, that he will never be moved; but that his root shall strike deep in the earth, and his branches shoot forth like Lebanon. And if his hour be really arrived, and I be appointed to come upon him to-night in the midst of his glory, to execute vengeance upon him as Darius the Mede executed the prophesied purpose of Jehovah upon the Babylonish king—thus will I know it—this shall be the token—he shall come out and stand before me! Yea, if his hour be come, he will come out to meet me, even though the storm should unroof the churches, and although his table should be thronged with guests who wait upon his presence, he will leave his house, his warm rooms and his riotous friends, and encounter the heaviest blast that ever blew out of heaven, to obey the unseen bidding of the shadowy ministers of fate."

In the meantime, Mr. Bolton sat drinking with his guests, and the noise of the storm raging without was drowned in the coarse laughter and loud talking within, as the wine circulated and sparkled, and Bacchanalian excitement reigned in the mansion. But he, at whose bidding had arisen the scene of revelry, was wasting his treasures, as it often happens, for the enjoyment of his guests, and his own misery. At least, in spite of all his efforts, he was abstracted, restless, and unhappy; swallowed bumper after bumper in vain, endeavouring to drown mortification, and striving, by the excitement of drinking, to banish thought and enjoy the company of such friends as had condescended to come, and to eat and drink what he had provided.

There was no adjourning to the drawing room, for there was no lady present but his sister, and an obtruded cup of coffee, therefore, was the only interruption of the debauch. But as the night advanced the squire's unaccountable restlessness became every moment more intolerable to himself; a strange impulse was upon him, as had been the case for several nights past, to seek the open air; and from at first rising up and changing his place, and complaining of the heat of the room and mixing among his guests, he at length took advantage of the confusion of an argument, and the grouping of the more zealous or the more inebriated, to slip out of the room; and descending the stairs and seizing his hat in the hall, he rushed out into the night.

He stood for a moment inhaling the fresh breeze as he leaned against a pillar in the portico. The night was stormy, and yet it was now dry overhead; for the rainy clouds had passed off to the westward, and the half-moon, looking out at intervals through the dim and drifting vapours, showed the white foam of the distant sea curling up to the hurricane winds—and its roar came over Bolton's guilty ear like the appalling but sublime menaces of the Eternal Spirit of the universe. Even the thunder that rolled at intervals, and the lightning that exhibited the dark form of the Pilot's Mark below, and began to flicker in quick summer flashes towards the horizon, seemed to smite him to the heart; and, as he walked unconsciously down the avenue, he looked round with a vague dread, and thought in every bush he saw the vengeful figure and pale countenance of the accusing spirit of the Pilot's Mark, who still haunted his path, and whose way he yet unaccountably felt himself impelled to cross.

He had proceeded down the avenue until he came to a little pass, separating his own grounds from those of Arnwood, and was about to turn an angle, his eyes fixed upon the earth, when looking up he saw an unaccustomed object. Was it any living thing? for it moved not. Was it a man? He was afraid to draw near yet ashamed to return; and he resolved to pass it. He gave a hasty glance, not without terror, over his shoulder at the object, as he passed without seeming to notice it; and the pale countenance of Mr. Waltham, the features convulsed, as it seemed by agitation, stared like a basilisk upon him.

Bolton was unable to move or to speak, and shook with terror as he stood watching the object, which he could hardly think real. Waltham slowly dropt his cloak from his shoulders on the grass, and taking two strides forward stood directly before him.

"Who are you?" said Bolton, his voice quivering with a superstitious dread.

"Thou knowest me once, when I was thy victim," said Mr. Waltham in low deep accents, his figure elevated by the excitement of his feelings. "I will make thee know me now; for I am here as thy evil angel to tell thee that thy hour is come."

"God have mercy on me, then!" said Bolton, as if uncertain whether he spoke to a human being or to an evil spirit, "for I am a sinful man."

"Ha! then thou tremblest at length," said Waltham, smiling ghastly in the moon-light; "and fearest to meet the natural recompense of guilt, and quailst under the heavy stroke of deserved fate—miserable coward!"

"I have wronged you, sir—I know I have wronged you—but do not menace me thus. It is not yet too late to—but why do you haunt me thus in darkness and solitude? why am I to meet you in the dead of the night, and even now, when this fearful storm rocks tower and tree, and scares into their holes every living thing—why do you, an old man stalk abroad, and seem to start up out of the very earth before me, crossing my path like a spirit?"

"True—thou son of Mammon—true!" said Waltham. "Like Lear, I wander forth in such a night as this, baring my bald head to the raging tempest, for indeed I am 'a poor, infirm, weak, and despised old man'; but who rendered me houseless? who drove me forth to abide the stormy blast, and, what is worse, the contumely of a world that ever shuns and contemns beseeching, hollow-eyed necessity? Was it not thou? thou representative of throat-cutting avarice; thou worthless personification of modern wealth-worship; thou cowardly hanger on upon bad men's praise; that has bartered thy soul for a little of the world's gold, and ruined me! Ha! thou feel'st now! but, wretch, it is only for thyself. Yet why," he continued, in solemn scorn, after a pause—"what induced thee to leave thy voluptuous mansion and thy wine to wander forth to meet me here under the dripping branches? Did I seek thee? Did I invite thee forth, where no eye sees us but the All-seeing Spirit that searcheth the hearts of the children of men? Why, I say, desertedst thou the house of riot at midnight?"

"I know not—I cannot answer you—I am distracted."

"Ha, ha!" and he laughed wildly in the face of the trembling wretch, who now supported himself against a tree. "I know—I know. Fear walketh in darkness like the pestilence; and horror seeketh to hide itself in the thick darkness of midnight; and conscience strives to drown the haunting cry that rings in her ears in the roar of the bacchanal, or even in the rage of the storm—but in vain. Heaven has planted in thy guilty bosom a presentiment of thine own fate."

"Mr. Waltham," said Bolton, collecting himself, "what seek you in this strange hour? and yet, here I am. I do not shun you—I cannot shun you if I would. Even yet I am ready to—"

"Villain! where is my daughter?"

"I know not; on my soul I know not."

"What have you done with her? Where did you leave her when your guilty passion was glutted? To whom did you turn her over? On what dung-hill did you leave my Eliza to perish? Oh God! Oh God!"

"By heavens, sir! this wrong at least I have not done

"What! What say you? Say that again."

"Your daughter is innocent for me."

"Did you not then seduce my child? Is she not guilty? Shall I believe you? or do you sport with a broken-hearted man? Swear!"

"By the eternal heaven, that gazes on us both this dreadful moment, I injured her not."

"God is merciful to me still! God be praised! I shall now meet my fate with composure."

"What fate, sir? I have heard you speak thus before. How do you receive this supernatural intelligence? What power dropped you down at my very side, when I believed that you dwelt in an island abroad, or were drowned in the sea? What agency hath traced me throughout the continent of Europe, and discovered to you my residence in this sequestered spot?"

"The same power," said Waltham, "that shapes out the fate of the whole world's feverish millions; the same agency that hath woven the web of your destiny on earth, which is now spun to its last thread; for brief, after all, is the space wherein guilt is permitted to flourish; and your hour—your fated hour is come!" And the crazed speaker, though himself trembling at what he was about to do, seized Bolton by the throat.

"How mean you?" cried Bolton, struggling with terror.

"What is that gleaming in your hand?"

"Seest thou not? Hah!"

"A naked dagger!"

"And the instrument of thy fate. Come!—"

"It is easy done; a stab and a groan, and then—life is but a brittle thing. I would not torture you, as you have not defiled my daughter."

"God in heaven, how your eyes glare! I am a guilty man, but you!—Have I lived to see you turn a midnight assassin—a murderer!"

"Assassin—hah, wretch!"

"I am an unarmed man, let go my throat. Have mercy, and to-morrow—to-morrow I will—"

"To-morrow thou wilt repent of to-night's repentance. Do not mock my arm, it is the appointment of heaven."

"To-morrow I will give you back all I have, to the uttermost farthing. I will, sir! I will—though I should beg through the world. Believe me, I am wretched in the possession of this wealth; and though I know the misery, the wide spread contumely that poverty brings—to-morrow I will—"

"To-morrow thou shalt never see! Suppose I were so weak as to consent to delay thy doom—some bolt would shoot from heaven to destroy thee. I tell thee thy hour is come. There now! stand up, tremble not at thy just punishment, but say one prayer for mercy—for before this short gleam of moonlight throws us again into obscurity, thy soul shall be on its way to its final account."

"Will you not allow me either time to make restitution, or space to repent? Are you mad? Nay, then, stand off. There is my bosom. Strike! Do not stand idly brandishing your weapon. Strike! I say—I deserve it; strike, and be a murderer!"

"Nay, stand not so; good heavens!"

"Are you afraid then? your lips quiver! you look at me more in pity than in wrath. Unhappy old man!"

"My arm refuses its office—I am sick—the gleam of moonlight has passed away! and I cannot—I cannot—" and Waltham, staggering backwards, dropped the dagger, and fell at full length upon the grass.

Bolton involuntarily lifted the dagger, and as he stood over his prostrate accuser, whose agitated excitement had been more than nature could bear, a fiendish thought crossed his mind—for the man he feared was now in his power, and a slight thrust of the dagger he held would silence his threats for ever. "God forbid! God forbid!" he exclaimed aloud as he thrust the dagger into the earth, and proceeded to raise his enemy to a sitting posture. As the moon again shone forth he perceived the deadly paleness of the old man's features, down which large drops of cold perspiration rained. Bolton stooped down and chafed his cold temples with water gathered from the grass, and assisted him to his feet.

"Then, you are still alive—and I have not fulfilled my fate?" he said with a stony gaze at Bolton.

"No, sir, you are not yet a murderer—but here—" and he lifted the dagger and put it again into his hand.

Mr. Waltham looked sad and disappointed as they stood for a moment in silence.

"You are a curse to me; as I have been to you, old man," muttered Bolton bitterly; then turning round, he walked away, hardly in a state of consciousness, to his own mansion.

CHAPTER XVI.

In the meanwhile Lord Arnwood met at the table of Mr. Stone the rector, where he dined, several gentlemen, in conversation with whom and his excellent host he spent the night agreeably to his own notions of rational enjoyment. There was present an old retired officer, a Colonel Joyce, with whom Arnwood entered into chat upon military matters and the prospects of young men in the army. In the course of the evening his mind teemed with plans and projects for the future which had for some time occupied him; and to which he was now strongly stimulated by involuntarily recurring to the image of one at present in depression like himself, and lingering over her youthful days in the Pilot's Mark.

Neither the quiet conversation of the company, however, nor their cheerful yet temperate enjoyment of the wine, prevented them from observing the progress of the storm, and contemplating its grandeur, as they sat overlooking a romantic park, under the thick copes of which, where it joined the remains of an ancient forest, they observed the cattle cowering fearfully as they snuffed up the rising gale. The sublimity of the sight called forth the piety of the clergymen, and the serious acquiescence of the other gentlemen; and discussions on the interesting phenomena of "vapours, and clouds, and storms," illustrated by many an anecdote of sudden destruction, and many a comparison drawn from foreign lands, with the knowledge of which travelling had furnished several of Mr. Stone's guests, whiled away the evening much to the gratification of all present.

When the hour of departure came, the storm was still so loud, that their reverend host pressed every one to stay for the night, particularly Arnwood, who had sent away his servant early by another road, with a message to the market town: and as his home lay above seven miles off, this invitation was backed by Colonel Joyce, who meant to take longer advantage of the good clergyman's hospitality. But Arnwood would by no means consent to remain, and the more he was pressed, the more determined he became; for an unaccountable anxiety came over him to be near the inmates of the Pilot's Mark as early as possible; and a kind of presentiment haunted him, that, as he had not seen Mr. Waltham in the morning, nor, in consequence, was able to do what Agatha enjoined, something might have occurred between him and Mr. Bolton. But agreeable society within, and the raging of the storm without, induced him to remain at his kind host's table considerably later than he intended, and it was past midnight before he set out to ride home a distance of seven miles.

The moon waded dimly through the thick thunder clouds as he rode homewards, along a road which was but little frequented; while the wind blew so fiercely that he was sometimes scarcely able to keep his seat upon the saddle. He did not meet, nor did he expect to see any one at this hour, but when he had proceeded considerably onwards, as the road turned off to his left he was somewhat startled to observe four men walking together in a field. After he had passed them, curiosity induced him to turn round once or twice to watch their movements, and he observed them to leap the hedge, and, crossing the road, they darted down a by-path among the meadows.

Arnwood could make nothing of this, although the appearance of so many men on so lonely a road after midnight struck him as somewhat suspicious; but, thinking no more of the matter, he again put spurs to his horse, and set off at a brisk trot. He had got within two miles of the castle, when, just as he emerged from a plantation through which the road passed, a flash of lightning, unusually vivid, darted through the trees beside him. The horse started back with fright, unseating its rider with the sudden motion, and the animal attempting to recover himself, plunged and fell, bursting his saddle girth, and bruising Arnwood's leg in the fall.

Recovering himself quickly, and his horse again on its legs, he found that it was in vain to remount, for, besides the saddle girth being useless, the animal had received a sprain, or other injury, so that it walked haltingly; and he had therefore no other alternative but to proceed the remainder of the road on foot—and, what was worse, to lead his unlucky companion by the bridle the whole way to the castle. This mode of journeying he, after some trial, found exceedingly fatiguing and disagreeable; and as he drew near to a small public house on his right, he began to wish heartily that it were possible to get his horse stabled somewhere for the night.

Without at all expecting such a fortunate accommodation at this hour in the morning, he looked anxiously towards the house as he passed, and to his joy perceived that, although the door was shut, a light was gleaming through a hole in the shutter of one of the side windows; and, going up to the door, he without hesitation knocked for admittance.

He heard a whispering of voices within, as if the people were consulting whether to answer, and, at length, a female voice enquired who the person was that expected admittance at that hour.

Arnwood, without giving his name, briefly told what had happened to him, and begged accommodation for his horse for the night. After some further whispering the bolts were at length withdrawn, and a middle-aged coarse looking female, with black heavy eyebrows, like a man—a soiled cap half off her uncombed head, and her cotton gown and other parts of her dress hung upon her so as to give her the masculine yet drabish appearance of a woman whom the Irish would call a street—put out her head by the half-opened door, and thrusting the dirty swaling candle, which she held aside from the wind, into Arnwood's face, scrutinised his features with her large black eyes, without speaking.

"Your honour don't want a lodging here, I wot," said the woman at length, with more suavity than could have been expected from her appearance.

Lord Arnwood confirmed her surmise, and again said he only wanted his horse taken care of, and leave to rest a few moments after his fall, before continuing his journey homewards.

"Your honour is bruised, I warrant me—ye look whitish!" said the woman.

"Nothing of consequence, good woman," said Arnwood; "and if I rested a moment, and you would let me have a little brandy and water, I should be soon well."

"It's past one in the morning; but to be sure there is some stranger-folk in the back room, and they 'll not go, plague o' them: I warrant me I mon let your honour in a bit; but the horse mon just go in beside the donkey, if it can get through the door-way, for Thomas is long a-bed, an' Sammy wanna stir the stable the night, I know. Here, Sammy."

Sammy, a dogged looking, bush-headed fellow with a knowing leer mixed up with his clownish simplicity, who had been watching behind the door, here came forward, and taking the bridle of Arnwood's horse by the directions of his sluttish mistress, proceeded to pull the animal by the head towards the rear of the house. But the boy did this so reluctantly, and cast towards Arnwood such a look under his brows, that the latter, taking the hint, threw him a piece of money, which the youth pocketed with a grin of satisfaction; and soon, as Arnwood followed him, he saw the horse tolerably well housed for the night.

"Now, your honour," said Sammy, as he opened a back-door into the house; "just get in a bit, an' please ye, and I shall rub him down and manage him just all the same as your honour stood by; and if your lordship's honour wants any thing drinkable, just be as quick as possible at this hour, because you mon know —"

"Must know what?" said Arnwood, sharply, surprised to find himself known by the young clown.

"Aw nothing, your lordship, but don't speak so loud, for there's strange men within, an' they might be quarrelsome, you know; an' so Mrs. Crow will give you a tiff o' brandy or sick like, but don't go in further than the door," added the lad, whispering, "and your lordship will just leave the horse to me, an' ye can send for him in the morning; an' take my advice, don't stay long here."

Saying this, the youth shut the door, as he again went out to attend to the horse, and Arnwood stepped forward into the place where he saw the light, which was the kitchen.

The woman rose, as he entered, from her seat in the chimney corner, and handing him the great chair, apologised for placing him there; but intimated that some time on a journey had established themselves in the inner room, so that she had no where else to put him where he would be more comfortable. But she hoped it was no matter, as it was so late, and asked what his honour would please to drink after his fall, offering various mixtures, as she said, to revive him.

Arnwood accepted a little spirits and water, and notwithstanding the caution of Sammy, he sat sipping the beverage at his leisure, from an increasing curiosity to know the meaning of what seemed to be going on, and to ascertain who they could be who kept the house open, at this unreasonable hour,—for so far from there being any appearance of quarrelling, the voices he heard within were suppressed almost to a whisper.

He waited until the persons within called for attendance, and when the door was opened, observed several common-looking men; although from the glimpse he obtained he thought one or two of them had an appearance of black-leg, or ruffian gentility.

"Who the devil is that?" he heard one of them say to the woman, thrusting out his head to look; and after she had shut the door, the whole seemed to examine her as to who it was that had just arrived.

Soon after, Sammy came slipping in, and seeming surprised to see Arnwood still in the house, he made an errand into the room where the men were, and having continued a short time talking in a half whisper, returned and said something to the woman. Arnwood plainly perceived by their looks that the woman and boy wanted to get rid of him, and yet did not know how to urge it with decency, while they allowed the men inside still to remain; and it immediately struck him that these might be the same persons who had attracted his notice on the road—that they had some strange or guilty design—and that although desirous of moving, they were afraid of attracting his observation, as they passed through the kitchen where he sat. As soon as he had formed this conclusion, although he still found himself stiff from the fall, he started up, and paying the woman both in money and thanks for her civility, left the house.

A conviction, however, that there was some mystery in this affair, induced him to watch for a few minutes; when he saw four men issue out by the back door and descend into a sort of hollow which lay at its rear. He stepped through an open gate into the meadow, and while watching the retreating figures began to consider whether it would be worth his while to follow, when he perceived the boy Sammy come cautiously out from the same door. After proceeding to the front as if to ascertain whether Arnwood was yet gone, the lad returned to the rear of the house, and darting down towards the hollow in the track of the men, was soon out of sight among the trees that straggled in the dell.

Arnwood now determined to follow out this night adventure, but by the time he had reached the brushwood where he had seen the boy enter, he lost all trace of his track, and having little light to guide him, wandered on in uncertainty among the bushes. He was so well acquainted with the country, however, that he determined to persevere; for he knew that the little stream near which he found himself, was the same that, after passing through some precipitous hollows considerably in the rear of Mr. Bolton's house, lost itself in the sea beyond Hail Hill and the Mark, and that the strangers' designs pointed in all probability to that quarter.

He walked on a considerable way by the edge of the stream, sometimes imagining that he heard voices before him; until, obstructed by some rock and bushes, he ascended the height which shunt in the glen—and again descending, perceived on a sudden in an open spot by the edge of the stream, five persons talking together, and all apparently employed upon some mutual undertaking. Arnwood, drawing cautiously near, placed himself behind a tree, and, though perfectly unarmed, resolved to obtain some clue to their purpose.

"How do your flints give out, lads?" said a tall man to the others, who seemed to be trying some short pistols, "for if it be as this son of an imp says, we may have to depend more upon the barkers than I should like this morning."

"Mine will do handsomely," said a slim figure, in a frock coat, and sealskin cap, putting himself in a position, and snapping his pistol; but to Arnwood he seemed more like a broken down dandy, or cockney shopman, than a man bent upon a robbery or other atrocity, which he began to suspect was the purpose of this midnight cabal.

"I think we had better consider well before we go farther in the business," said a third, "if it be true what this bumpkin lad says; I never likes to set the bull-dogs agait, even though we may have got hold of the stuff—they makes too much noise, does them there; and I've known a good chap obliged to trust pure money in a ditch, from the tell-tale popping o' them lead-crackers."

"Are you sure it was this very night that the squire had company, you devil's baby?" said the tall man, addressing Sammy, who was by this time busy sharpening some instrument upon a stone near the brook. "If you don't give up the very kernel o' the truth, I will pull every long tooth out o' that grinning mouth o' thine. Doest hear, scaramouch?"

"I seed them a going with my eyes, and I seed some o' them a-coming too, didn't I, sir?" and Dame Crow said that was mortal odd, for there was such a storm and thunder and —"

"Then there might but few remain, after all," said another of the men, "and we can't be arguing about it now, when we've come so far; besides, they'll have gone to bed every soul as drunk as owls, for the squire is a rare fellow for stirring up the saw-dust, and sucking the long cork. I heard his fame all the way at Clerkenwell."

"Ay," said the former man, gleefully, "he's got the butler's trot; I know that, Jabers! there's lots o' prime stuff going i' the Hall—it'll be hard but we get a drop o't."

"So we shall, if we behave like men," rejoined the tall fellow, "but you, Sammy, can't you tell who is likely to be met with in this Bolton's house, for I should wish to know what sort of coves we are like to encounter in the dark, before we commit ourselves inside."

"Are you afraid then, master?" said the youth, with a mocking leer shooting under his square brows.

"Afraid, you welp! If thou darest to mention that word to me again, I'll make thy ugly jaws rattle like a dice box. Answer my question this instant, gallows-bird!"

"There's none that I knows of residing with the squire," said Sammy, sulkily, "none but two; an' one on um is a tidy little jontleman wi' a nose like a strawberry, an' t'other is a hard-faced man in black, what used to be the tutor to the young lord o' the black castle down by the sea. He'll be the worst, I'm thinking."

"If that is all, we sha'n't have much difficulty," said the other, "besides, as Robin says, they'll have been all drunk before they went to sleep."

"Aw, ay, if they've gone to bed yet," said Sammy, "but may-be not, or may-be they're playing cards, or summat."

"May be, thou art a cross-grained cur," said the second man who spoke, "we were fools to come here by thy report; I shouldn't wonder if this would end in a hanging business by thy unlucky means."

"I wanna wonder myself," said the youth, grinning with apparent satisfaction at the thought.

"Thou'rt truly a son of Satan," said the tall man; "but hark'ee, airrah, you have not told us who that man was in Dame Crow's kitchen. That was rather odd."

"How should I know?" said Sammy, doggedly.

"Now, by the loop of a halter, Sammy, if I find you shying in the least matter," rejoined the leader, "I'll have you tucked up by the ears, and swung before Dame Crow's alehouse, like a hanging sign, ere daylight this morning."

"I see thinking," said Sammy, "it was no other but the young lord that lives in Arnwood Castle, and keeps poking about the sea-shore by himself, like a hermit. But you need'n mind he—nobody thinks o' um in this part, he's so poor."

"I don't altogether like that neither," again said the tall man, who seemed to be the leader of this covey; "but all I can say is, if there's powder to be burnt, or an odd cut to be given for our own defence, we musn't hang back, and caution must be used particularly in the drawing off; but at any rate there's no time to be lost, boys, for it will soon be day-break, and we may have some delay as well as some play for our money, before we clear the squire's grounds—so quick, and let's trudge."

"I don't much like this business," said a man who seemed older than the others, and sat on the cut stump of a tree, as if ruminating within himself, while the rest were talking. "It 's bad enough to bore one's way into a gentleman's house when good people are asleep, and the booty is somewhat dear even at the best—but to talk of burning powder, and shooting and stabbing in the middle of the night, if the gentlefolks turn restive and resist us, which is very likely—I don't like that. For myself, I'd much rather watch outside."

"I'll tell you what, Mr. Brumton," said the tall man, stepping up to the last speaker, "I'll have none of your dismalising to spoil my brave fellows, when we are just a-going to charge. If you are hen-hearted you might have the sence to keep it to yourself, for I am determined we shall not have all this tramp for nothing, if there should be a broken skull or two—or if even some worthless devil, like yourself, should be despatched to the shades. I told you before that it 's no use for gentlemen who have taken to the manly trade of fair robbery, and gone to war with the world, as the lawyers say, vi et armis, to stick at trifles in the course of their calling. I tell you, we must all live by our profession (as long as we can), and take care of ourselves like other folks. Isn't that philosophy, Robin?" turning to the next man.

"And good sence too," said a gentlemanly looking ruffian, in a drab great coat. "I don't see why we shouldn't have a pluck at this rascally world by straight forward tangible robbery, as well as greater people who go a little more round about; and if any body gets a knock on the head in the scuffle, merely as a hint to keep their tongues within their teeth, why that can't be helped when self-preservation is in the case—it's only the innocent suffering for the guilty, and that has been the way of the world ever since Adam delved, and Eve span."

"But this Bolton has a lot of men servants no doubt," said the man who sat on the stump; "and if they get roused, together with the gentlemen, they'll show fight, and lives will be lost, that's certain."

"Pish!" replied the leader, "these rascals are too high fed and comfortable to look any sort of trouble or danger straight in the face. If there was half a dozen of them in a corner, they'd squeeze the very life out of each other with sheer fright and cowardice. No, no."

"Now, what's the use of all this squeamishness?" said the fellow with the great-coat; coming forward, and showing his face blackened—"why this piece of work about easing the squire of a share of his cash, which he robbed others of himself, as I can tell you?"

"Is that the case?" said Brunton, looking up from where he sat.

"It is, in faith; didn't Tom Horsley, that scamping attorney's clerk, tell me of his tricks, and how he cheated a gentleman in Holland by means of the law, and brought his victim to beggary, besides a hundred other jobs a hundred times worse than ours."

"Nay, then; let me see—" said the man called Brunton, jumping up from the stump and buttoning his coat; "there are four of us; besides that young Sammy, who is after all worth half a dozen men in a play like this, if it were only for his sheer wickedness. It is not the danger that I care for in the least, provided there is no throat cutting, so, boys, are you ready?"

"Give yourself a touch of the ebony, Brunton," said the leader; "it will at least help us to frighten the servant wenches; and there's Sammy has got his face like Othello already—ha, ha!—if the devil himself were only half as ugly as that imp, he wouldn't be such a favourite with the world, I guess."

"Come, gentlemen," said he of the great-coat—"let's tramp; we'll have a glorious adventure of it, if you stand firm and go regularly to the sack, for, trust me, the place is worth a siege, and if there's a drop o' good liquor falls in our way we'll not put it into our eye, I warrant."

"Come then, boys!" said the leader; "and, Sammy, you go forward. You know your post, you hangman's provider, and you know your reconspence either way: eh!" he added catching the boy suspiciously by the neck; "a good handful of hard blunt, and a kick for love—or hark'ee! if thou playest us false—I'll murder thee with my own hands, if I should rise from the gallows foot to do it, an' the crows shall pick the eyes out of thy ugly head."

"Only let me go," said the boy grinning, his white eyes showing vividly through his blackened face by the sudden gleam of the moon—"By jabbers, I haven't had a bit of a night job since we robbed old mother Shude's house, on Bladwell Common. So, captain, never fear me, I likes the work—by jabbers, I likes the work!" he repeated, rubbing his hands, "so here I go."

"Thou art a precious babe, certainly," said the leader, as he watched Sammy spring forward up the side of the hollow. "Come, boys, we'll be in sight of the house in five minutes."

On this, the whole party set forward towards the brow of the hollow, their faces blackened and some carrying pistols—while Arnwood still remained in his concealment, uncertain how to act in circumstances so difficult, and so momentous.

CHAPTER XVII.

The anxiety of the young lord, it may be supposed, was not caused by any deep sympathy with the intended victim. On the contrary he acted, or wished to act, entirely upon public considerations, and from a wish to prevent, if it lay in his power, so audacious a burglary from taking place in his own immediate neighbourhood. Yet, what could he do?—for there was now only one man-servant at Arnwood, and if he lost time in walking there to arouse him, it would be too late to go to the Pilot's Mark, where much more efficient assistance could be obtained than at his own castle. This consideration, together with an anxious wish to know what might have occurred to Mr. Waltham or his daughter in his absence, determined him to push forward into his own grounds on the side near to Mr. Bolton's house, and, crossing the park, to proceed direct to the Pilot's Mark; to which it was not improbable that some of the servants from New Hall might fly to give the alarm.

The storm was now entirely over, and he was already at the boundaries of his own demesne, and within a few hundred yards of the Mark, when, on crossing a corner of the sward he imagined that he heard a voice among the trees close beside him. He stopped a moment, lest any of the reckless tribe he had been watching might have come so far down, when he heard some one from behind the bushes say,—

"Hush—sh—I'll swear it was a foot, did ye no hear?"

"No, not I," said another voice gruffly, "it's nothing but the rain shaken off the leaves by the storm, that's wet me to the skin. Give me another bit of cheese."

"Man, yee're a hungry crature, Will Watersheet!" said the Scotch voice of Murdoch Macara, "ye've eaten a' my cheese an' bread too, an' no left me a bite. Deevil a thing ye're gude for this twa days—but eating. Ye havena even lugs i' your head like i'ther folk, an' can hear nothing. I tell you I heard a foot as sure as ever I heard Mary Reynolds's squeaking wean, greeting at my lug in the night time so that I couldna get a wink o' sleep for't, the brat. Whisht, Will, wi' your crunching."

Arnwood was glad to hear the Scotch accents of the very man he wished to see, and stepped round to the other side of the bushes.

"There, do you hear feet noo, ye timber-head?" said Murdoch to his companion as Arnwood approached: "dinna be frightened, man: Lord, will ye never be done wi' that cheese, standing there choking!"

"Who's there?" said Arnwood aloud.

"It's me, sir," replied Murdoch, briskly coming forth, wiping his lips, "forbye muckle Will Watersheet ye see. There he stands wi' his mouth fu'."

"What are you doing here, Macara?" said Arnwood.

"Weel it's no possible," exclaimed the Scotchman, taking off his hat, "that it's your lordship, walking the faulds at this time o' the morning when the vera birds are sleeping on the wet branches. This is a strange night."

"So it seems, Murdoch, and what brings you here so late?"

"Me, my lord? Faith I dinna ken. It's just as daft like for me an' Will Watersheet to be playing the ghast through the park, as it is for your lordship. Od, I believe, the people's bewitched in this whole place, for besides we're a' up at the Mark as if it were twal in the day, I swear I saw black heads and heard voices and noises also about the squire's mansion aboon. I would think little about that, for I ken there's naething but feasting an' drinking going on at the ha' night an' morn, but the noise was outside, and a' was dark within; an' noo here's your lordship jouking among the bushes at three in the morning. I believe the deevil himself's abroad this night."

"But you have not told me what keeps you up, and brings you here, Murdoch. Is any thing wrong at the Mark?"

"Your lordship 'll ha' seen my maister, nae doubt," said Murdoch, "od, I'm glad I've met you."

"No, I have not. What of him?"

"An' have ye really no seen Mr. Waltham, my lord?" said Murdoch aghast.

"Indeed I have not; but what is the matter, is he not at home?"

"He gaed out, my lord, about the dead o' the night when the storm was near the worst, an' has never been heard o' since. Oh! Miss Agatha will be in such distress, for we surely hoped that he might be with your lordship, an' I darena gang back to the Mark without him."

"Heavens! and have you sought all round for him?" said Arnwood, alarmed.

"Up an' down, my lord, back an' fore, along the cliffs an' up to your ain castle, an' back by New Ha' aboon, till we're wet into the skin wi' the rain off the trees, an' till the hunger came on Will Watersheet in the hamecoming, an' there has been abint the bushes thrapping at the bread an' cheese like a corbie—the beast!—I wonder he could eat a bite when our puir maister is lost an' gane."

"A pokers on your Scotch tongue," said the sailor, coming forward, "to abuse me fore an' aft when I've done my best. We may just as well eat when we have it, and go home to our hammocks, for Mr. Waltham's slipped his cable for good, that's my notion. I beg your lordship's pardon."

As they talked, they were making towards the Mark, Arnwood giving up all thought of the robbers until he should learn something about the fate of Mr. Waltham. As they came near, they perceived approaching, the figures of two females wrapped in cloaks, who proved to be Agatha Waltham and Mary Reynolds. Indeed the whole of the inmates of the Mark were in such a state of alarm on account of the old gentleman, that rest had been out of the question the entire night.

Arnwood stepped forward to meet the young lady, and endeavoured as well as he could, to console her, lamenting much that he should have been absent at a time when so strange an event was taking place; and having learnt every thing the agitated girl could tell, he ventured to offer some words of encouragement, and, at his suggestion, the whole party went forward again on the search, towards New Hall.

The morning was now beginning to break, and they had gone some length by the common path, and passing beside a rustic seat he saw Mr. Waltham extended upon it, his pale features partially seen from under the folds of his large cloak, and a naked dagger gleaming on the grass below.

Agatha shrieked at the sight, and clung to Arnwood, fearing to draw near, or to remove the cloak, lest she should be shocked by a confirmation of her worst fears. Arnwood, however, begging her to be calm, proceeded to examine her father, and found him warm, though haggard and wan, and in a sound sleep. His daughter, raising the old man's head, and putting her cheek to his, he after a short space, sighed deeply, and opened his eyes, then fixing them for a moment upon her, asked faintly where he was.

Agatha explained his situation as briefly as her agitated feelings furnished her with words, when he said, gazing wildly on her,—

"Yes, I know you—you are my Agatha—your voice is just like your mother's. Alas! angels guard you, my love, I was dreaming of you. Who is that beside you?"

"Don't you know me, sir?" said Arnwood.

"Lord Arnwood! yes—I was dreaming of you too. Heavens! and you and Agatha hanging over me on this lonely spot. Oh! my dear happy children—too good for this worthless world—if I could only hope that was to be your fate when mine was fulfilled, I should die happy."

"What fate, sir?" said Arnwood.

"I dare not tell my dream to two young hearts like yours—it might mislead you; but you were together, together and happy. God bless you both!"

When they had helped the old man upon his feet, he looked placidly round and upwards towards the breaking morning, and said, "What thankfulness do I not owe to heaven, which has delayed my fate a little longer, and forgives my mistaking times and seasons; and betokens on me, before I die, the consolation of knowing that my eldest daughter is not the victim of seduction. Give me up that dagger."

"Heavens! my father—what do you mean?"

"Peace, my child, and lead me homewards. Heaven's ordinances will be fulfilled. I lost my daughter, who cost me twenty years' cares; I lost my money, which I thought so secure, even to the last farthing; but I never lost this dagger, which cost me nothing—no, I cannot lose it. It sticks to me, and ever gleams in my sight. It follows me in my adversity, and will follow me—until I have put it to its use. Come."

CHAPTER XVIII.

The company at New Hall had separated, or retired to bed earlier than was intended or expected, chiefly on account of the strange and protracted absence of the squire in the midst of their mirth, and his evident inability, on his return, to enter into their spirit or enjoy their company. And when, at length, he himself got to bed, although he had swallowed a considerable quantity of wine, he was too much distracted and agitated to fall readily asleep. He lay in feverish restlessness, forming twenty plans to satisfy Mr. Waltham, without fully restoring his money, or getting rid of him, all of which were objectionable, and coupled with a thousand fears: when, beginning to fall into a disturbed slumber, the pale features of the man whom he had wronged still seemed to haunt his dreams, and strange noises sounded in his ears. He even imagined he heard unusual sounds at a distance in the silent house, and the noise of withdrawing bolts; and then he dozed, and thought himself in a prison, with Mr. Waltham for his jailer. Anon, he imagined himself swinging in the turrets of the Pilot's Mark, with the storm rocking around him; and he heard feet slipping across the floor of his room, when, opening his eyes, he perceived by the dim-breaking light admitted by his casement, the figure of a man leaning over him.

"Who are you? Are you again come upon me?" said Bolton, in terror.

"Be silent, sir!" said the figure—"I am not come to talk."

"And do you still hold to your frightful purpose?" said the squire, rising on his arm.

"Certainly," said the man. "Do you think I am come here for nothing?"

"Could I have supposed that you would have become a murderer for the sake of the world's goods? And to come into my house at midnight for such a purpose! But I deserve it for what I have done."

"So I believe. Come, no more."

"My God! how you are altered," said Bolton, gazing at the man.

"Altered, what! do you pretend to know me?"

"Yes—you haunt my very dreams; if you commit this crime you will not escape, more than myself."

"What does the man mean? To tell me that he knows me in the dark, and that I shall not escape. Do you want me to cut your throat at once, squire?"

"You were not thus determined a few hours ago," said the squire, still, under the delusion of his terror, mistaking the intruder for Mr. Waltham.

"To be sure not, but if you will talk of knowing me—"

"Why do you haunt me thus, Mr. Waltham?" added Bolton—"with those fearful threatenings? Will nothing but my blood satisfy you?"

"What are you talking about, sir?" said the stranger, amazed; "I don't want your blood, particularly. I want what is nearly as dear to you, though. I want your money. Come! no more talk, for there are my lads just behind. Your keys, squire; instantly." And as the tall man, who was the chief of the thieves, said this, Sammy entered with a light.

"Eh, my keys! what noise is that? who are you? are there really villains in the house?"

"Truly, I believe there are, squire; as great at least as either myself or my companions. There are your clothes, sir—now give me your keys, and if you don't choose to tell me instantly where I may find your cash, this little article with the leaden quid in its mouth will put a stop to your talking and your rascality together." And the fellow held the pistol close to the head of the terrified Bolton.

"Ha, ha!" laughed the fellow, taking the keys. "As to honesty, you see, squire, you and I need not argue about superiority in that—only I am somewhat straightforward in my line; but although my face be black just now, and yours confoundedly white—the kettle and the pot need not quarrel about the purity of their vocations, I'm thinking. But which is the key of your own bureau? Come, don't be alarmed! we're only brother scoundrels, you know."

"Oh my God! are you about to deprive me of my money?" gasped Bolton.

"Not your money, squire, begging your pardon," said the man coolly, "although you have managed to get hold of it: and I must now have shares with you, for, you see, every fellow gets his due some time or other, and if it's my lot to be hanged one day for my way of going to work, why that may be as easy to bear as your troublesome dreams, eh? But come here, you devil's limb," he added, addressing Sammy, who was peeping about the apartment; "keep a sharp look out here, let the door be left open, and if this gentleman offers to stir or speak, except in answer to a question, give him the lead at once, d'ye hear?"

"May be he has a barker himself, under his pillow," said the boy, suspiciously. "I doesn't like to watch um."

"Faith, that may be the case, but here, sirrah, this shall be your bastion," said the man, placing Sammy behind a wardrobe. "Now, squire, don't offer to make a riot. Just be honourable and let me get a share of the metal, or faith I'll be a match for you!" and saying this, he went leisurely and carefully to rifle the house.

By this time the inmates, who slept above, were all awake, except Hulson, who had drunk too deep in the former part of the night to be easily disturbed. They lay trembling with terror, while the burglars watched by their beds with pistol and cutlass, or traversed the rooms, occasionally putting questions mixed with threats, to the terrified and half-awakened, and opening cabinets and drawers where they suspected they might find any thing of value. As to the leader of this adventure, he had no sooner turned his back than it at once occurred to him, that, although the squire might not be renowned for valour, yet it was too much to expect that any man who loved his money, would lie quietly in bed and hear people rifling his house, with no other immediate antagonist than a boy like Sammy; and having also a suspicion that Sammy, whose fingers, he knew, itched to be at this Spartan exercise, might get tired of his inactive service, to the imminent danger of the whole, he despatched one of the most determined of his men to relieve the lad, who he thought might be made to act advantageously as his own aid-de-camp, in case any sudden alarm should arise.

But the greatest difficulty the robbers met with was from Miss Bolton and her woman, who slept in one room near that of the squire; and whose alarm was so great that the involuntary and spasmodic shrieks of both, notwithstanding the reiterated threatenings of the man who watched them, endangered their own lives and the success of the burglars, and fearfully added to the general terrors of the inmates, and the horror and apprehension with which Mr. Bolton lay listening to what was going on. Whenever he offered to stir, the man who watched, turning upon him the glare of his dark lantern, scowled jealously on him with his blackened countenance, muttering a curse or threat between his teeth, and raising his pistol; while the squire groaned with distressing and remorseful thoughts of his own past injustice, and the misfortunes now thickly multiplying upon him.

The burglars had ranged through the house for some time before they came to the room where Hulson slept; and it happened that the man named Brunton, who, as we have seen, had gone about this business somewhat reluctantly, was the one who was appointed to keep a look-out in that part of the mansion. Hulson began at first to dream strangely, and then to tumble about as the noises approached, until, at length, opening his eyes and staring as steadily on the black face of the man who stood over him as the swimming in his head would allow him, he at length shouted—

"Hilloa! friend smutty-face! Who are you?"

"You will soon know, sir," said the man.

"Shall I?" he answered, with a slight feeling of terror, and rather uncertain whether he was awake or not. "I say, honest friend, are you a ghost?"

"Not exactly," and Brunton smiled at the question and the confused look of the little man, whose red nose, as he looked up, strangely contrasted with his white night-cap.

"Then, if you be the devil, you're come at a bad time for me, I can tell you."

"How, sir?"

"Why you see, if you be the devil, I was just about turning me three-times round, and growing good, and if your Beelzebubship would only allow me a little time, I have great hopes of becoming a tolerable saint yet. But it's mighty odd to see you grinning there over my bed."

"You had better be silent."

"Not I—I won't be silent. Tell me honestly, friend, who are you. Are you a robber?"

"Yes."

"Eh—what?" exclaimed the little man, rising on his elbow, and staring up at the fellow. "Are you really a regular, honourable, professed robber?"

"Yes, I confess it."

"Coming here to take what you can lay your hands on, in an honest way before one's face? Eh?"

"Just so."

"Give me your hand, friend," said he, shaking the astonished burglar by the hand. "By heaven! you're a man of a thousand."

"I don't much like it, though," said the man.

"You don't! give me your hand again. Now that's just my way; for I tell you what, I'm no great shakes myself."

"That may be very likely," said the man; more and more in surprise.

"No, indeed, friend; I've done several clever jobs in my time that I should like to forget, if I could; but they were all in a gentlemanly way, you know—rather in the higher walks of the art—but, after all, I did them more from the fashion of the thing, and because I had a way of running short of money, than for any particular love for that sort of talent; and really, friend, it is very bad when one thinks of it; but as for this open, avowed, straight-forward plan of yours, I can tell you it is quite gone out of fashion, and is absolutely dangerous to a man's neck in these times."

"I am quite sensible of that, sir."

"Are you?" said Hulson, again starting up with animation. "Faith! you do look like an honest fellow, if your face was clean."

"You're a very odd person for me to meet at a job of this kind," said the man, affected. "I hope your honour would not witness against me, and I shall take nothing from you, indeed."

"It's devilish little you would get here, friend, even were you willing; and I'm sure I won't know you again, unless you claim acquaintance with me: but, I say, since you are not black at the bone, although your face is sufficiently smutty, how did you come to take to this sort of peep-o'-day trade, disturbing comfortable people in their beds? These may be no honestest than yourself, I allow, but that is no business of yours, my friend, if the hangman gets a hold of you."

"It were tedious to tell you, sir," said the man, whose language bespoke an education not quite of the lowest; "but of late there has been nothing but misfortune and scattering in my father's house, (and I have completely gone to the bad with the rest, God forgive me,) as it something had come over us to lead us all to ruin. If first began with my sister, who was the favourite of us all at home, for she got a sweetheart who she thought was going to make a lady of her, and quite turned her head with dress and presents, until the scoundrel at length seduced her; and although she did not elope, finding him to be quite a high man and far above her rank, yet she was brought to shame by him, and then ran off, leaving us all in grief, until we scattered ourselves here and there; poverty and ruin came upon us, and here am I at last col-leagu-ing with housebreakers, and in the straight road to the gallows."

"Indeed, I think I know something about that affair. Pray what part of the country are you from?"

"Hampshire, sir."

"And your sister's name? Come, you may trust me."

"If I must tell you, sir, her name is Mary Reynolds."

"By Heaven, I know all about," exclaimed Hulson, thumping the pillow. "I told Bolton that was a rascally business, and I hope your companions will gut the house for him."

"And does your honour know where my sister is," said Reynolds, who had changed his name into Brunton when he joined the thieves. "Ah, if I could find her!"

"I don't know just at present," said Hulson; "but I think, friend, I could trace her for you, if you are really determined to be an honest man; at least, if you could find a Scotchman called Macara, that lives in that tall old building down near the sea, I dare say he could tell you something of her."

"Oh, sir," exclaimed the man, falling upon his knees at the bed side, "if you will find out my sister, that comfort may be brought to the mind of my poor broken-hearted father; and if your honour will get me an honest employment, I shall rejoice to quit this dreadful life, and I shall be most faithful in any service."

"Well, I believe you, friend; come get up, and hand me over these black breeches; now, there," he continued, rummaging his pockets and taking out some money—"there is a single guinea for you, for I know that a man cannot even be honest without money to begin with, although I am moderately poor myself; and so, friend, if you mean to do right, meet me exactly at noon of this new day, on the road beyond the lodge of this house, for, you see, it would not do for us to be honest men in private and scoundrels in public—that would be reversing the order of things, you know."

By this time the other thieves had taken all the money and valuables they could find, and were preparing to leave the house; but during the course of their rifling, Johnston, though he had made no attempt to protect the squire's property, had got up, and as soon as his terror would allow him, occupied himself in making such observations on the men who successively watched him, as might hereafter be useful to the ends of vengeance, if the fellows were taken. This they were shrewd enough to observe; and when they found it to be the case, they not only bound him to a chair, but the man who wore the greatcoat, as formerly mentioned, thought fit to propose his being blind-folded, which he himself immediately set about effecting.

While the man was performing this operation, Johnston was praying for mercy, which the other receiving good-humouredly, he ventured to lecture him upon the error of his ways, with broken interjections upon the beauty of virtue, morality, and benevolence, and the danger both here and hereafter of the nefarious course which the robber was pursuing. As the man listened to this, he thought he ought to know both the voice and the style of talk, and removed the bandage for a moment, asking with alarm—

"Do you know me, Mr. Johnston?"

"I have no knowledge of you whatever," said Johnston, staring hard at the other—"and you misname me, that is not my name."

"You are a vile liar, sir," exclaimed the other fiercely.

"You are telling me a double lie; but it's of no use talking to you." And without again blind-folding him, he merely inspected and tightened the chords with which he had bound the trembling man. Having done this he shut the door of the bed-room, and going down to the leader who was busy below, exclaimed as he entered, "Carry, we are dead men!"

"How so?" said the other.

"Here is a fellow called Johnston above, who, together with his father, robbed me of every thing I had, many years ago, by law and so forth, and he knows me as well as I do you. He is one of the vilest scoundrels alive, and he'll hang every one of us merely for the pleasure of it. There must be a light snuff'd out here after all, or we're not safe over to-morrow, and I have good will to the work myself. It is only his due, and I should like to deal with the villain, since it must be done."

"I shouldn't like that. I don't like it. It must not be," said the leader, shaking his head. "We have got a pretty enough haul here, and blood would make a terrible hue and cry in the country. Let me talk to him."

Johnston understood perfectly the nature of their consultation, and was quite prepared, when they came up to the room where he lay bound, for a proposal to screen them and save his own life, which he saw they were ready to take. A thought having just struck him as he sat, he therefore at once addressing the two men said, "that, admitting he knew them, if they would spare him, he would get the scent of pursuit turned off from them, by obtaining a scape-goat for the robbery somewhere in the neighbourhood, if they would in turn be faithful to him, and allow him the service of any one whom they should appoint for an hour."

The two thieves looked at each other in astonishment, as Johnson made this proposal.

"Oh, let him alone for an infernal scheme!" said the man in the great-coat. "I've known him of old. We're nothing to him, bad as we are."

"I don't like it," said the leader again—"it's positively too bad."

"Like it or not—it is perhaps the safest plan for us, if we can trust to the fears of this precious advocate of virtue," said the great-coated man—"it is only making the innocent suffer for the guilty, as I say, and said before, and that is done in one shape or another every day."

This excellent and useful logic becoming at length satisfactory to all parties, Johnston was delivered from his bonds and his fears before the robbers left the house; and the proper arrangements having been made, the plan was ultimately agreed to be carried into effect through the means of Sammy, as we have in due time to narrate.

CHAPTER XX.

In spite of the serious considerations that obtruded themselves upon his mind, of their respective situations, Arnwood continued to indulge his thoughts with the pleasing dream of love, as he still paced before the door of Agatha. He was roused from his reverie by the voice of Murdoch Macara, who, thrusting out his head from one of the small windows beside the door, ejaculated—

"Surely the deevil's bizzzy wi' man an' beast this night. If that's no' his lordship ta'en to the walking, like my maister, at three in the morning, an' the wind tirling the kirks, an' blawen an' blasten the vera mools aff the graves! I saw the speerit o' the storm glaumung along the sea wi' my ain een, an' I heard it sighing and moaning frae 'mang the breakers at the point as plain as a pikestaff. Gude sake, my Lord Arnwood," he continued, elevating his voice from the little window, "gang hame to your bed, an' sleep, if ye please, for if ye gang wandering there, some witch-wife that's fleeing i' the air this bizzzy night 'll whip you aff your feet on the back o' her broomstick, an' whirl you o'er the sea; an' before ever ye get time to speer whar she's gaun, or to say the Lord's prayer, she'll drap you on the coast o' Norwa' like a cockle shell!"

"Murdoch, come out for a moment," said Arnwood; "I want to speak with you."

"What is the matter ava, my lord?" said Murdoch, opening the door. "The wicked one himself is abroad the night, there can be nae doubt, for there's nobody in the hoose can sleep. Poor Mary Reynolds is sighing an' moaning in her dreams—I heard her through the wa'; an' muckle Will Watersheet's ta'en the sulks, an' 'll no gang to his bed. It's perfect awfu'!"

"Murdoch, you had better bring him out too, and any arms you can muster, for there are robbers in the neighbourhood."

"Gude sake! Robbers next? at the castle, my lord?"

"No; at New Hall."

"Poogh, at the squire's? deal nor they haul the vera sheets aff his bed!"

"Come, come, Murdoch; it is for the general good. You do not mean to object, do you?"

"Me objek to onything your lordship bids? Atweel no; an' there's nothing I would like better than to get a grapple wi' the blackguards."

"But there are four or five of them."

"De'el may care. Here's muckle Will Watersheet, an' your lordship, an' myself, an' I'll hae the auld bayonet on the end o' a stick; an' as for the rusty sword an' the pronger, your lordship an' Will can just divide them between you. Faith, there's naething I would like better than a bit bruilzie."

They were soon armed as they best could, and off to seek the fray; but by the time they got up to New Hall every thing seemed to be quiet, and, saving that some of the doors and windows were open, nothing appeared to have happened, as far as could be seen from without. Arnwood wished that some one of the thieves might be detained, and was anxious to give what assistance was in his power in case of a pursuit. Seeing no one, however, he requested Murdoch to tarry near the front door, while himself and Watersheet went round towards the rear, to reconnoitre.

The entrance door was half opened as they came up, but again shut; and as Murdoch paced about, it was opened a second time, and a man armed with a sword came cautiously out, and went up to Macara.

"By George, it is the Scotch fisherman," exclaimed the man to himself, peeping forward in the grey dawn—for it was the same servant of Mr. Bolton who formerly had the dispute with Murdoch in the lobby of the mansion. Concealing, however, the sword that he carried behind him, he said, as he went up, "So it is you, Mr. Scotchman, is it?"

"It's just me, Mr. Flunkey," answered Murdoch. "But if ye war nae saucy, ye might hae the civility to say to a body, 'gude morning,' or 'kiss my foot,' or something."

"Kiss your own foot; but there are more of you?"

"Troth, are there, an' we'll soon let you see that."

"And where are the rest of your companions? since you are so plain."

"Ou, I'm just as plain as I'm pleasant; they're round at the back o' the hoose."

"I did not think you had turned thief, Mr. Scotchfiddle."

"Thief? what do you say, sir? If ye say that word again I'll break your mealy head."

"If you're not one of the thieves, what are you doing here at this time of the morning? I know you, sir," added the man, retreating towards the door. "I know you."

"I'll tell you what, friend," said Murdoch, in a tone between anger and seriousness; "you had better eat in your words, an' no mention thief to me again, or, faith, I'll gar you swallow them wi' as mickle hard steel as 'll gie you the hiccup, I think."

"Pew-hoo?" said the man, mocking and still retreating to the door, "it's no use to try to humbug me, Mr. Sans culotte. You've got nothing to steal in Scotland, and so you come here, and pretend to be a fisherman, the better to rob us. Do you think I'm blind? I know both you and your master, and I'm an excellent evidence against a thief when he's in the dock. So, Mr. Scotchman your time's up, I can tell you;" and thus saying, he thrust the door in the face of poor Murdoch, who stood somewhat agast.

After tarrying for a moment on the steps of the entrance he went round the side of the house, to meet his companions in the rear. It was necessary to this that he should cut through a little plantation; which having done, just as he emerged on the other side, he saw a boy with a blackened face start out at the farther end, take the way through the open park which lay between them and Hail Hill, and brush down among the rocks which lay behind it in the hollow through which the stream passed in the rear of New Hall.

Murdoch could not afford more than one look over his shoulder for his companions, fearing he might lose the track of the boy, whom he was impelled to follow by himself in his eagerness to get "a grab," as he said, at the robbers. He set off like a shot, therefore in pursuit, and got round through a short cut by the hip of the hill, and then slid himself down the ledges and pushed through the bushes with the speed and sagacity of a setter, in order to intercept the flight of the lad, who evidently was aware of and ran from him. He kept his quarry in sight, however, as, with a natural delight in this sort of chase, he continued to jink his way after him through an angular turning of the little stream, until, as Sammy came down behind a jagged crag, at the farther side of which Murdoch had already planted himself, and as the lad turned the point round which the stream brawled in the hollow, the Scotchman met him full in the teeth, and catching hold of him by the jacket lifted him fairly over the stones to the green spot where he himself was standing.

"Ha! have I gotten a grip o' you at last, ye deevil's bucky?" said Murdoch, holding the lad out from him in triumph at arm's length, while they stood panting and gazing, for the morning had now cleared up, and introduced them to each other, revealing the contracted dell in which they were standing.

"What's that in your hand, ye sooty-faced villain?" continued Murdoch, as the boy's white eyes kept gazing on him through his blackened features while he continued to take breath.

"It's a speaking trumpet; should you like to hear it?" said the lad, deliberately elevating and cocking a small pistol which he held in his right hand, and firing it in the face of the unsuspecting Scotchman.

The report of the pistol rattled and echoed through the passes in the dell, but the jerk with which Sammy had accompanied this action, in trying to free himself from the hands of the Scotchman, whom he thought to have shot dead at once, was unsuccessful; for while he stood writhing to get out of Murdoch's clutch, and wondering that the other did not fall dead like a plover—the sturdy northern merely wiped the powder from his cheek, and cleared his eyes from the blinding flash of the pistol, the ball of which, however, had whizzed past and grazed the very tip of his ear as he jerked his head to avoid the well aimed little engine, the very muzzle of which had been almost at his mouth.

"Faith, thou's a clever callan, if thou would wash thy face," said Murdoch, good naturedly, as he cleared his eyes. "But thou had better come wi' me, an' I'll gie thee a night's lodging i' the tapie toorie o' the Pibroch Mark, for the hangman 'll get thee soon enough, my braw bairn;" and saying this, he whipped up the lad on his back, securing his pistol, and away he went with Sammy, kicking and sprawling among the bushes.

"Let go the lad, friend," said a hoarse voice, as a hand grasped Sammy from behind a crag, and in an instant the boy was forcibly dragged down, and a slim man with a seal skin cap, stood before Murdoch, whose report of the pistol had brought to the spot.

"Gang hame an' wash your face, honest man," said Murdoch, "or I'll draw the blude o' you wi' this," he added, shaking the short blade of a sword, that he had exchanged with Watersheet for his old bayonet, in the stranger's face.

"Stop a moment, friend sailor, or whatever you are," said the man, "where did you catch this urchin, and how are you here at this time o' the morning?"

"I caught the little blackguard running off frae the squire's hoose aboon, an' I just followed him here. But I'm thinking that it's no for building o' kirks that ye're here yoursel, wi' your coomy face. But ye see, as for the callan, he's my lawful prisoner taken on the field o' battle, an' he shall go wi' me."

"Did you see no one else but him near the Hall?" said the man anxiously.

"Deevil a one, friend robber," answered Murdoch, "but an ill-tongued flunkey."

"And did you not see any thing of B——?" asked the man addressing Sammy. "I'm afraid he's turned tail."

Sammy answered in the negative, which seemed very much to disconcert the man, while the boy made another plunge to free himself from the handgrip of the Scotchman.

"Let the boy go this instant," said the man, catching hold of him, and drawing a long sort of cut-throat, and say nothing of seeing him or us, on your peril."

"I'll just speak when I'm spoken to, and drink when I'm drunken to," said Murdoch, fiercely; "neither more nor less to save you frae hanging, Mr. Thief."

"Then we'll have a spar for the lad," said the fellow, putting himself in a position.

"That's just what I want, my man," said Murdoch, whirling round the boy behind him with one hand, while he laid on the robber with the other. They had not made more than three or four passes, or rather strokes, when Sammy giving a dive, tried to trip up the Scotchman, just as he was pressing hard upon the other, who began to find that he was unable to defend himself from the quick cuts of his opponent. But the attempt of the boy only served to increase the fury of Murdoch, who still held him fast with one hand while he fought with the other; until he wounded the fellow severely, and made the cut-throat spin out of his hand among the bushes. The robber retreated until he stumbled, and fell into the babbling waters of the stream that ran at the edge of the dell.

Murdoch was running upon him, still dragging Sammy, when on the instant two other men started out from beyond the stream, and both at once grappled with the furious Scot.

"Na then, three to ane, forbye a fashions misleert calant drawing at the tither arm is o'er mony," said Murdoch, taking breath and staring up in the faces of the great-coated men, and the tall leader, who grasped his collar. "But ye'll let me gang wi' the honours o' war, if I surrender like a gentleman."

"Let the boy go first," said the man.
"He may gang to the deevil in his ain time," said Murdoch, throwing Sammy from him; "an' I'll tell thee what, callant," continued he, as the urohm stood grinning and shaking himself at a distance, "thou hadst better keep out o' my way in future, or faith I'll no be sweet to draw thy neck like a poulet."

"I say, Mr. Scotchman," said the tall man, after a moment's consultation with the others, "do you know the value of a throat that you can breathe through?"

"It's no particular valuable to a poor man like me," said Murdoch, wiping the perspiration from his face; "but I ken what you mean perfectly, my friends. And I'll make bairn's bargains wi' ye. If ye let me alone, ye'll ne'er be hanged a day the sooner for me, an' that's a bargain."

Having settled the preliminaries of peace on these equitable terms, Murdoch was suffered to depart; and the burglars, who, finding themselves deserted by Reynolds, had sent Sammy as a scout to seek for him when he was discovered by Macara, went to divide their booty and clean their faces after their night's adventure.

Although Arnwood and the sailor, not having seen any thing nor been able to hear of the robbers, nor yet of Macara after they parted with him at the squire's door, had by this time gone to their several homes—the Scotchman did not get back to the Mark on this eventful morning without another interruption.

It was now fair day light, and he had got out from the irregular ground through which the stream ran, and was proceeding towards the Mark by a narrow path, at the foot of Hail Hill, chuckling to himself as he went, with delighted thoughts at the pleasant skirmish he had just had with the thieves—when all at once he came "plump" upon a man, who lay comfortably asleep almost at his feet under the shelter of the hill. The man started and sat hastily up, awakened by the sound of Murdoch's approach, and the two for an instant stared at each other.

"Ye hae a white face, however, friend," said Murdoch, first breaking silence. "What are ye doing sleeping there, like a meadowwort?"

"I think you must be the Scotchman that lives hereabouts, sir?" said the man getting up.

"Oo ay—it's a gude country to own, friend," answered Murdoch; "Lord, every body kens me!"

"Then perhaps you know one Mary Reynolds?"

"I ken her brawly, friend—the bonniest lass on a' the shore, an' a finer quene never wash'd a trout."

"O then, my good friend—will you just bring me to her?"

"I'll neither bring you nor any man to her," said Murdoch. "Faith, friend, ye hae a stock o' nonsense."

"Ye seem to be under a mistake," rejoined the man. "She's my sister."

"Is! so ye are like her, about the een; yet no sic an ee as Mary's—but come awa, honest man. If you're Mary Reynolds's brither, ye're my friend;" and the Scotchman and the ex-robber were soon reasonably well acquainted.

CHAPTER XX.

Some change had taken place among the different individuals in the neighbourhood of Arnwood Castle, since the eventful night of the burglary lately described. Without referring particularly, at present, to the state of mind of Mr. Waltham and Lord Arnwood respectively, we may merely state that the former had recovered much of his tranquillity by the affectionate nursing of his daughter, and that the latter was gone to the metropolis—occupied with sundry schemes of future prosperity, and full of the hopes of love, which entirely dispelled his habitual melancholy, and the effect of the more solemn reasonings of his friend of the Pilot's Mark.

Another change was, that Mr. Hulson had left New Hall on the very day after the night scene before described; after seeing Mary Reynolds's brother, whom he had taken a liking to, for reasons as odd and characteristic, as they were at bottom benevolent and praiseworthy. He was determined, as he said, to have the fellow's intentions sounded, and, if possible, to bring him up in the fear of the gallows; besides he was minded, as he further averred, to cheat the devil, if he could, after he had thought himself sure of another honest man.

It may be pretty truly said, that on the morning we speak of, Mr. Hulson rose from his bed in better spirits and with a lighter heart than any one else, from the highest to the lowest in the mansion of New Hall; although he acknowledged that his brain still fermented from the effects of the aquire's wine, and like Sir John Brute in the play, "his head ached consumedly." But he went up and down the house with the greatest gloe, as he surveyed the depredations made upon the plate and other portable valuables, swearing that a more cleanly or gentleman-like robbery could not be effected, either legally or professionally, in the most civilised society; and when Bolton looked rueful and perturbed at breakfast, he laughed in his face, and told him he was glad to find that there were other rogues in the world who insisted upon sharing with him the good things he had amassed.

But he did not forget his engagement with the thief, and was, indeed, so much pleased with the candid congruity between his words and actions, that he determined to be at the appointed place punctually at noon.

"What are you?" said he sternly, as he came up to the man whom he found already on the spot.

"I am the person your honour spoke to last night, and am here by your honour's desire. I am completely in your power."

"Oh, you're my friend, the robber, are you? I've had many friends of your stamp—I have a luck that way. But how am I to know that you are the same man who was my sleeping partner in the robbery? you are too white in the face; the man I spoke to last night was as black as Erebus. But come, come, friend, I mustn't stay talking to you here, you are too honest a man for me to be seen consorting with on a public road, come this way."

Saying this he stepped into a field through the plantation that skirted the road, making a sign to the bewildered man to follow him, and questioning him as he went.

"What is your name, friend?"

"Thomas Reynolds, sir."

"Are you really determined on being honest?—"

"Yes, sir."

"Then it is very well that you have obtained my patronage in so hazardous an undertaking. But how shall I know that you are serious?"

"Try me, sir."

"Faith, friend, I must have a trial of myself at the same time; for, in truth, I am only, as I may say, going into training for it in my own person, you see, and may break down if I am hard run. But I say, friend, what are you good for? what can you do, in an honest way?"

"Will your honour name what you want of me?"

"Can you tell the time on a watch without stealing it?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then you are a learned man, friend, and an honest as times go. But tell me, can you curry a horse, or worm a dog, or catch a poacher by speed of foot—or brush a coat, or hand a plate, or tell a lie in a graceful and business-like manner, or—"

"I would rather not do the last, sir."

"Very well, friend, and I would rather not ask you, if the world were not so bad as it is; but you mustn't get too honest upon me, or, you see, in that case you won't suit; and if your conversation is too outrageous, or too sudden, you'll become a greater rogue than ever, I can tell you. But, come, if you are really determined to turn a new leaf, I'll protect you. Will you swear fealty to me?"

"I will, sir."

"Then hold up your right hand, friend."

"Will that do, sir?"

"Yes; now look up, mind, you are on your oath."

The man sighed as he looked up to Heaven, holding up his hand.

"Now wet your thumb—there," he added, touching the man's thumb, "now, Reynolds, you are my servant, and may bid Jack Ketch go hang himself for want of employment, as far as you are concerned; for as long as you behave yourself, and I have a shilling in my pocket, I'll stand between you and the gallows, and we'll walk the earth two honest men together, and shame the world, just for the rarity of the thing."

"I will serve you with my life, sir," exclaimed the man, affected yet diverted by the manner of his new master. "Now, what shall I do first, your honour?"

"March, Reynolds, instantly out of this neighbourhood, and never look for me until you arrive at the Cat and Tongs in Gloucester, to-morrow evening; now go, and go cautiously."

The first few days after the affair of the robbery were passed by the aquire at New Hall in alternations of sulen and perturbed gloom, with paroxysms of agitation. All his visitors had now left him except Johnston, and although, in his better mood, he suspected and almost detested this man, yet, with the weakness of guilt, haunted by the fear of its discovery, and reluctant to make the restitution which in a moment of remorseful anguish he had promised to his wronged victim of the Pilot's Mark, he was glad to unboom himself to one who was always at hand, although the last person in the world in whom he ought to have confided.

Several violent scenes, however, had taken place between him and Johnston, with which it is needless to trouble the reader. The ex-tutor ultimately gained the entire ascendancy over the unhappy man. He persuaded him against giving up Mr. Waltham's property—against leaving New Hall for a time, as he had proposed—against calling in the mediation of Lord Arnwood—and, in short, induced him to change every plan he had formed, till, at length, the result of several days' altercation was the aquire's reluctant consent to a line of conduct totally different from that which he had at first meditated.

It was not long after the robbery before a great hue and cry was raised for thirty miles round the secluded neighbourhood of Arnwood Castle, regarding the extensive depredation committed in the mansion of the "wealthy and worthy" aquire Bolton of New Hall. Country gentlemen began to be greatly alarmed, and justices and magistrates to bestir themselves. Conservators of the peace where every where on the alert; local proclamations were posted; and thief-takers were agog; Mr. Bolton was condoled with on his loss, with warmth in proportion as he was not known—so much so, that he would almost have lost every thing over again to achieve the momentary importance the circumstance gave him in the neighbourhood; and even Mr. Johnston managed to join the cry with credit to himself, holding out well grounded hopes of being more successful than the police itself in ferreting out the robbers.

CHAPTER XXI.

The effect upon Lord Arnwood's mind, produced by the death of his mother and the occurrences of the day on which he came of age, was to give a new impulse to his thoughts, and to make him look with a strange inquisitiveness into the shadowy womb of futurity, for the promises or indications of what fortune might have in store for him. He saw, however, with a mixture of exultation and doubt, that it became him now to "try the world" and all it offered; and accordingly, shutting up the castle, he set off to visit a Sir Holland Bolland, and such other few friends as remained to him in London.

The observers of the upper world of society know that there are always a few new men on town, who are lords of the ascendant for the time; and who, starting successively into view from their native or their comparative obscurity, serve to diversify the monotony of aristocratic life. These enjoy the triumph of feasting hundreds of fashionable persons, and of being talked of, perhaps, by thousands whom they cannot find room to entertain, and are extensively repaid by sneering criticism upon their expensive attempts at greatness, or contemptuous laughter at their abortive presumption.

In this pitiable predicament was now placed Sir Bolland and his family. Lady Bolland, Miss Rachel Bolland, and Thomas Grendall Bolland, Esq., the only son and heir, all stood the campaign amazingly well, being willing to encounter any thing in such a cause. But poor Sir Bolland himself was almost ready to strike and cry for quarter before the season was half ended; for besides the difficulty which a little fat man encounters in striving to support personal greatness and impersonal dignity, Sir Bolland was absolutely "sweated down" into a sort of oily mummy, and lost both his weight, his appetite, and his night's rest, as he said, for no earthly or understandable purpose but to spend money.

It was near the end of the London season, while Sir Bolland's house was invaded by artists of all sorts, connected with the table and the trencher, during the day, and by men and women of many sorts during the night, that Lord Arnwood arrived in town, and with a mixture of diffidence and reserve paid a visit to his old acquaintance. Scarcely had he made his appearance in society when he found himself, greatly to his own astonishment, very much in request; and crowded as were the entertainments of Sir Bolland and of every body else who invited him, and reserved and retiring as his own manners were, he yet discovered that he had involuntarily produced a considerable sensation. His graceful figure arrayed in deep black, and the thoughtful and intellectual look of so young a man, together with his title, brought to the recollection of some of the old families a name carrying in it something to be held almost in reverence, and caused him to be observed and talked of, even when he himself wished to be concealed or forgotten.

Arnwood was partly right in the latter feeling; for he could not offer attentions to any lady, and in particular, to the many unmarried female scions of nobility, with whom he mixed, but himself and the late lord's imprudences became the subject of discussion with all ambitious fathers and wary mothers, and his hereditary misfortunes were dragged forth into babbling notoriety. This was a subject upon which he was jealously and painfully sensitive, and when he looked with moralising astonishment at the profuse luxury indulged in by hundreds whom he thought in every way beneath him, contrasting it with the painful economy practised in his own deserted establishment—there mingled more of bitterness in his feelings, than perhaps, if strictly examined, was reconcilable with true dignity of mind.

Emerging as he had just done out of a literary and reflective solitude, and feeling intensely the difficulty of getting a footing for his own ambition—he looked with amazement on the thoughtless, aimless, and comparatively desolate prosperity of Sir Bolland, and a hundred other new people, who were shining brilliantly in the zenith of city extravagance. The clinging consciousness, too, of real talent, became sometimes a set-off against the disadvantages of his peculiar situation. But this solitary pride soon died away, by the very sympathetic influence of the glaring opinion of the world, and left him, unless when hope was strong, in deeper and more gloomy discontent with the world, and at the mortifying indications of his own fortune.

As for Sir Bolland, he had of late crept under a corner of the imperial purple of government, and was even in the prospect of a peerage; how or wherefore no one, so far as Arnwood knew, could tell; for he thought but little and laboured less, talked merely because he was sure to be listened to, and laughed much and often, either because he was fat, or in order to become so. At all events fat he was, notwithstanding the fatigue of standing up often when he lunged to sit, and bowing to his guests when bowing was neither convenient to his shape nor inclination. But then there was a compensation even in this, (excepting when he was absolutely over-driven,) for standing and walking gave him additional appetite, and bowing and feasting made him additional friends.

Amidst all this, Arnwood felt some surprise in observing the increasing attentions to himself, and even offered residence of Sir Bolland Bolland. This he could not account for, as it seemed unconnected with his daughter, whose manner, unlike what it had been in an earlier acquaintance, had become stately, and bore an air of condescension in addressing him, which made him doubly reserved towards her. And as for Lady Bolland, her head seemed entirely so turned with her lately acquired notoriety, and her husband's importance in the government, that she could only occasionally be sensible that such a person as Lord Arnwood had the privilege of making one at all her parties, and that he was more frequently talked of by the women, titled and untitled, than any other man who was worth talking of, excepting it might be her own son, or Sir Bolland himself.

One morning on Arnwood's paying an early visit, he was taken confidentially aside by Sir Bolland, and conducted into the library with much ceremony, and all the forced dignity and state so laboriously assumed and worn upon the person of a little fat man. Here, after many preliminaries, concerning his own consequence in the present situation of public affairs, and his wish to bring forward every promising young man, he told Arnwood that the opportunity was now come for making his fortune.

Arnwood looked somewhat cold and incredulous at this announcement.

"Nay, my dear Arnwood," said Sir Bolland; "it is in my power without doubt, if you do what I have undertaken to the minister you shall. And all you have to do is to be expeditious, and judicious, and prompt, and secret, and adroit—and above every thing you must be lucky."

Arnwood smiled.

"My dear Arnwood, I see that you consider the business as nothing to a man of your talents, and that you imagine your success certain."

Arnwood smiled again, and said he had no doubt of it.

"Are you incredulous, my young lord, or are you confident? Shall I introduce you to the minister or not?"

"By all means, Sir Bolland. I feel my zeal kindling."

"Tis done, Arnwood, 'tis done. The carriage is ordered at two, and you will consider how much there is at stake, both with regard to your own fortune and for the public good, in what may be proposed to you."

Arnwood could scarcely believe his senses, when the carriage stopped at the door of the minister, and he found himself formally and confidentially introduced, and soon after closeted, and preparations made for a particular and doubtless important disclosure.

"You cannot have much knowledge of mankind, whatever may be your natural talents, my lord," said the minister after some preliminary inquiries; "but your knowledge of history will have taught you that one of the greatest difficulties a statesman has to encounter in the ordering of diplomatic policy, is to get at the real sentiments of foreign potentates, and the true meaning of the proceedings of foreign courts. This will explain the principle of the service which you seem willing to undertake, and upon which you will be required to proceed. It will be a dangerous and uncertain service," the official personage continued, "and even should you be successful, its value will only be such as circumstances will hereafter indicate. But you will have the satisfaction of knowing that you act for a noble and liberal government. And, hark'ee, my young friend, a sprinkling of hypocrisy is indispensable; for, remember, you will have to mix with those whose very thoughts are traitors to each other. In a word, I can give you no better advice than you will find combined in the Spanish maxim, 'A light foot, an open purse, and a quiet tongue;'—what say you, young sir, are you willing to embark in the sea of politics?"

Arnwood made such acknowledgments as the occasion demanded.

"Well, then, we shall see, what is to be done;" and the minister, with a gracious but reserved bow, turned to other business, and left Arnwood to the indulgence of a crowd of new hopes and fancies, which his mind, as he returned home, was busy in creating.

Meantime it was bruited about by Sir Bolland, chiefly to show off the confidence that he himself was in with the government, that through his influence the young Lord Arnwood was about to be employed in an important and confidential mission abroad. The change to Arnwood in his reception by the world, was now as extensive as it was decided. Invitations crowded in to him, and every one began to know and to admire him, as is usual in such cases, until the youth himself gave way to the general opinion, and loved all mankind as heartily as mankind seemed to admire him.

This was the moment of Arnwood's triumph, and almost his revenge upon the world. There is an indescribable charm in the first gush of prosperity, the more delightful because it is not solitary; for man is so benevolent and sympathetic in such a case, that all the world rejoices with, and even magnifies the happiness of the successful. The eyes of the women, in particular, now seemed to beam for Arnwood with universal regard. Their countenances suddenly became lighted up with sentiment; and many were in love with him so deeply, that, in spite of the natural delicacy of that "warm" the bud" which was feeding on their damask cheeks, the feeling was too warm and imperative to be altogether hidden, and in some way or other managed to find its way to his ears.

He now began to forget his Shakespearian maxim about the tide that is in the affairs of men, which, secretly, was now at the flood with him, and which, had it been taken, as it then offered, was leading him (in one way at least) fast on to fortune. Men, as it unfortunately turned out, were in a mistake about his "affairs," else there would not have been all this flood; but that was no affair of his.

In giving these general statements we had almost forgotten to mention the fact, (an unpardonable piece of forgetfulness in the writer of a private history of this sort,) that by this time Arnwood might have been, my way, almost in love. We say almost, because the sentiment was involuntarily qualified in his mind, by certain deep-seated recollections, or rather fanciful dreams of his solitary hours, or mixed up with some painfully pleasing reminiscences of the inmates of the Pilot's Mark, near his own castle. The sentiment, too, however generally powerful, was in Arnwood's case at present so mingled with a feeling of gratitude to the fair one, who condescended to evince no doubtful indications of tenderness for himself, that, if stripped and analysed, it could neither be called quite genuine, nor had its roots struck deeply enough to take the place of more secret and unselfish emotions.

The eldest daughter of the Marquis of Lorton had fascinated many before she fascinated the young Lord Arnwood; but she took a greater pleasure in observing the impression she had made upon his feelings than in all her previous conquests, simply because she perceived he had feeling, which she justly concluded was a quality somewhat rare in her circle; and the single hearted sincerity of his disposition made her attempt at interesting him both a pleasing and a proud experiment. Lady Amelia Lorton was two years older than himself, and the very masculine quality of her understanding, her ready eloquence upon subjects which women generally avoid, or trifle with, together with the soothing tones of her voice, when she chose to address the feelings, were not lost upon a mind like Arnwood's, which was always susceptible to the throbbings of emotion, or the deep-felt influence of passion.

Arnwood was now, in the proper sense of the word, living—enjoying existence—looking at the great world, in its most desirable circle—reasoning upon it, gaining knowledge, hoping, admiring, and almost loving. He had not yet, to be sure, attained to any thing in his own fortune; so much the better; for in gaining good, we gain evil also, and all to him was yet imagination and futurity. "But the future," says Dr. Johnson, "carries in its womb the greatest and the purest of all good, for it is ductile to the fancy, and subservient to every demand of the passions."

Lady Amelia Lorton was a pretty woman, or rather she was noble to look upon, and at times there was something in her countenance that was awful to a man who can feel the power of a woman's eye. She was accomplished too. But the accomplishments of some women tell for something wherever they appear; those of others, from the want of accompanying taste and understanding, are a weariness and a vanity. So were not the elegant learning and the ready intellectual powers of the respectable daughter of the Marquis of Lorton; for never were accomplishments rendered more effective in raising admiration or emotion in minds such as Arnwood's. She and the charmed youth met in all possible places, and talked all possible things, as lords and ladies will talk. It answers not our taste, nor indeed our talent, to give details. Behold! are they not written in fifty cleverish books, that shall never be read fifty days hence?

The fancy can easily follow Arnwood through the drawing rooms and dinner parties of high life, with which every reader, high and low, is of course as familiar as he is with his own bed-chamber. He sits at the most piquant French dishes with the most unintelligible names, and drank wines imported by his fashionable host expressly from the moon.

Like the eunuchs of the Arabian Nights he walked upon nothing but splendid Persian carpets, and reclined only on sofas and couches, which he found as common, of course, as the wooden benches in St. James's park. He dined upon plain fare at three o'clock like a tradesman, under the name of lunch, and supped at night too early for a second appetite; which, however, like a wise man, he took care to provide against, the latter being too laborious and complex an entertainment either for satisfaction or enjoyment. The most interesting faces at the dinner table were lost to him, or concealed behind the splendour of plateaux and lustres; and in the lottery of his place among the company, when he did not happen to get near the lady Amelia or some such intimate, he was forced to talk, or listen to, all manner of nothings, interlarded with bad French and Italian, called, somewhat gratuitously, light conversation. This, however, he bore philosophically for a time, for the sake of his own private observations; for "fashionable conversation" is, after all, seldom as rapid in the hearing as in the reading.

The kind reader will also, to save time, condescend to fancy Lord Arnwood moving incessantly among saloons and boudoirs of the most splendid description, and attending all manner of soirées, routs, concerts, and masquerades; and will also please to imagine what he said and did. Lady Amelia sometimes hung upon his arm through these crowds, or sat with him in a recess, and from her lips he drank for a time the most seductive eloquence, the most touching sentiment, upon what was truly great or desirable on earth; and again the keenest observations and the most cutting satire upon all they heard and saw around them. At other times, and more generally, he moved about like a philosopher or a simpleton, (convertible terms as the world goes,) and talked idly to people who cared nothing about either what he said or thought, so that what was apparent bore the stamp of fashion; and then he went to bed late in the morning, weary and disappointed, wondering at himself for persisting in so unsatisfactory a life.

CHAPTER XXII.

Lord Arnwood moved about for a time in fashionable society as other people do; for high life, however favourable to affection and effeminacy, is not without its philosophers, and its moralists too; nor is there any necessary connection between fastidious elegance and conventional refinement, and rapid coxombry or inanity of mind. The hurry of its engagements, however, and the pleasing gratification to personal vanity, of easy association with men of the highest titles in the country, had its usual effect upon his youthful and sanguine mind; causing him to be insensible to the lapse of time, and to forget that the ordinary occurrences of life were progressing and wearing on, and there were such things as serious or sad events taking place in the lower world.

The first circumstance that awakened him was a sudden turn in our foreign policy, and a report of a change of ministry, with which the newspapers and the country soon rang. In the mean time Arnwood had received neither reward nor service, nor, indeed, any thing but vague assurances and doubtful manifestations of friendship. As the clamour ripened against the proceedings of ministers, he saw with astonishment, that those very measures which had been adopted in consequence of the then popular feelings in favour of them, were the most loudly complained of and reprobated. When he waited upon Lord ———, he found him already an ex-minister, and now in agitation, if not disgust, preparing to set out to recruit his spirits and his nerves in the country.

The minister was, however, gracious and kind to Arnwood, and even somewhat disposed to be sentimental in his discourse, as men will be when the untoward events of life oblige them to console themselves for ill-rewarded good intentions, with a moral reflection. He seemed to consider Arnwood as a brother sufferer by the turn that affairs had taken, but the moral reflections, of which there is no lack, applicable to courts and political change, were all Lord Arnwood's answer, and all his present and probable reward.

This disappointment soon came to be known to Arnwood's friends; and its usual effects were deepened by his own consciousness and his foreboding imagination. He met Lady Amelia Lorton in the evening in her father's drawing room, and he thought he saw, at a glance, that she was aware of all that had occurred to him. Whether it was studied, or whether his own consciousness made him sensitive and irritable, her conversation seemed less serious than usual, while he was disposed to be more so; and even her good sense seemed more than ever rough and masculine, and her allusions, accidentally or wilfully, regardless of his feelings.

Arnwood's observations were more keen than usual, but still he had not altogether deceived himself. Lady Amelia really delighted in his society, was interested in him, was proud of him as a conquest, nay, even loved him. But her love was not (shall we be understood when we say it?) like the love of a woman. And so she could extinguish it, or sacrifice it to pride, or trifle with it (as she could and did with the object of it), with all the caprice and hauteur of a high born and worldly dame. For some time she teased Arnwood, partly by coquetry with other admirers, and, at times, by cruel allusions to things in which he felt keenly all the disadvantages of his situation. A new favourite in the person of a Colonel Vance, now began to call forth her triumphant "flirtation," and jealousy and wounded pride soon completed the alienation of Arnwood's heart. But if there had been any thing wanting to determine him to retire from scenes which were now a punishment to him, it was supplied in the following incident.

At a crowded evening party at the Marquis of Lorton's, Arnwood found that, either on purpose or by accident, he was in an unusual manner left to himself all night, and was in the uncomfortable state of mind of a proud man when he finds himself in a place where he suspects that he is looked upon as little better than an intruder, or imagines his presence merely suffered until a convenient time arrives for his dismissal by a coup-de-grace. He had wandered among the crowd, and answered jealously and slightly the salutations of a dozen common acquaintances, and even exchanged a smile and a remark with Lady Amelia, and had at length betaken himself for solitude to a recess behind a pillar. Here he sat down alone to contemplate an old painting, on which the light from a brilliant chandelier now shone, as he thought, most favourably.

The picture represented a young female, in a costume so peculiar, or rather her figure was so imaginatively revealed, by an extravagant and picturesque drapery, that the contemplative spectator was soon riveted by the original and striking conception of the artist. The female was mad, as appeared by the strangeness of her apparel and manner, and the poetic wildness of her eye; but she was so purely beautiful, and there was given to her such a look of speaking pathos, that Arnwood had almost wrought himself into tears as he continued to gaze, and to feed his imagination with the idea of the unhappy girl.

There were other thoughts, also, insensibly linking themselves with the visual fancy before him, thoughts which, of course, could have no other foundation than the mere association of ideas, but which gradually awakened in his heart its deepest and saddest feelings, and plunged him in a reverie which might have seemed a trance. It was as if Heaven had shown him, at sundry intervals, and in divers manners, in reality or in his dreams, such a vision (one repeated vision) of female perfection, as transported his soul to paradise in thought and aspiration, yet never permitted him, even once, distinctly to behold that face and form which still flitted before his fancy.

His mind had wandered back to Arnwood Castle and the Pilot's Mark, as he gazed on the interesting picture before him, when his ear was startled and his attention attracted by women's voices, talking loud (as ladies of rank may talk) behind him, and just beyond the pillar against which he was leaning. He even thought his own name had been mentioned, and naturally interrupting himself to listen, he heard a few words of conversation of that matter of fact species, which was sufficient to recall his mind to this lower world.

"You astonish me, my lady," said one, "indeed you astonish me; but the loose manners of the present day are perfectly incredible. In my younger days this impudence would no more have been suffered than —"

"But the antiquity of his family!" interrupted another voice.

"That is the only excuse for it; but, my lady, I am told his whole estate would not make a tolerable allowance for pin money. In short, the boy's presumption ought to be chastised, and for a sensible man like the marquis to permit such a glaring flirtation, I am at a loss to account for it."

"It is love, no doubt," said a cracked old voice, in a sneering tone, "the blind god must bear the blame, he, he, he!"

"The youth ought to be sent abroad somewhere," rejoined the first. "I tell you, my lady, the marquis ought to get him an appointment at the Cape, or about the Ionian Islands, or in Australia, or somewhere else, to prevent titles from becoming contemptible at home, and to keep him out of the way of the women!"

"It is time, methinks, that that unfortunate family were extinct," said the toothless possessor of the cracked voice; "I knew the boy's grandfather, Sir Humphrey of Arnwood—a wild and a bold man he was, and the late lord made things much worse, and here is a youth who would marry his slender person and his father's debts to the eldest daughter of Lorton himself—he, he!"

"But the marchioness has too much good sense to permit the affair to proceed further," rejoined the second speaker; "what do you think, my lady?"

"I have long observed the Arnwood family," said the cracked mumbling voice, "and——"

Lord Arnwood's back was still to the group of old ladies, and his eyes yet fixed upon the fascinating picture; but there was something so peculiar in the tone of this latter voice, that he turned round, and putting his head past the pillar, observed the three old women who were talking. The last face absolutely shocked him—it presented such a contrast to the angelic countenance he had been contemplating in the picture—from its absolutely frightful expression; for the dowager's pale face, crowned with a mass of frizzled white hair, presented a combination of the rheumy imbecility of the lowest beldame, with the demoniac malignity of Hecate.

"I have long observed that singular family," mumbled the cracked voice; "I think it is about its last."

"There is little danger, then, of Lady Amelia Lorton, from all the reports," said another.

"Hoe, hee!" sung the cracked voice of the aristocratic Hecate, and the expression on the countenance was horrible. "I tell you, the boy will soon begin to wince at the world like his father—and will end the whole by—nay, I can see it—by pistol and lead—or a cup of laudanum—or he may perhaps give himself a fling from the tallest turret of the old empty castle of Arnwood—hee, hee, hee!"

"Good heavens!" exclaimed Arnwood, rushing from the recess into the crowd, and then into the street. "What a world do I inhabit! The very accursed of the earth, the cruellest of the world's crawling animals—a bad hearted old woman, seems to become prophetic when speaking of me. It is high time that I should leave this motley scene of venomous old cats and aristocratic imbeciles to the gratification of their own peculiar and congenial pleasures. In the retirement of the castle I will wait with leisurely resignation for such fruit as the seeds I have sown during my short stay in the metropolis will possibly yield me; and if none ever springs up, why, 'patience, and shuffle the cards!'"

Full of his newly acquired determination, Arnwood waited upon the Marquis of Lorton on the following morning, and solicited such an exertion of his political influence upon any future occasion, as that nobleman might deem it expedient or friendly to extend; and taking a short leave of his fat friend, Sir Bolland, he made the best of his way back again to Arnwood castle.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The rich perfume of autumn scented the soft air, and twilight was fast sinking into night, when, after a fatiguing ride, Lord Arnwood at length descried the shining sweep of the sea on the horizon beyond his own castle, and soon after imagined he discerned a more interesting object, namely, the Pilot's Mark, just relieved by the light coloured vapours, which still retained the lingering shadow of day spreading seaward behind it. Soon after, he even fancied he could distinguish a light in the window of the little turret where Agatha slept; and as he continued to contemplate this cold and lonely refuge of adversity, and to contrast the gay crowd in London with which he had mixed for the last few days, and the gorgeous scenes of heartlessness and extravagance which he had just witnessed, with this cheerless and secluded abode of woe—and further thought of her who would have adorned a palace, continuing to linger away her youth in dull seclusion and yearning penury—a pang of sympathetic anguish shot through his mind, that would have been still more bitter, had it not been accompanied by an undefined hope that he would yet be the means of restoring her to society and happiness. "That black looking tower which seems to rise out of the cold murmuring sea," he exclaimed to himself, as he continued to direct his gaze towards it, "is yet the domicile of my Agatha; of her who has given an interest to my life, and communicated a fire to my bosom, such as none other could or shall give in this world. Shall it ever be mine to restore her and her father to happiness? May I ever hope to make her my own, unite my fortune to hers, under circumstances in which we might be enabled to enjoy together such supreme felicity? perhaps—yes, it may really be, after all, that this glorious dream will be ultimately realised.”

Entering the castle, affected by such reflections, it may be conceived with what feelings he read the following letter, which he found among others waiting him on his arrival.

“Gloucester, October 18th.”

“MY LORD,

“Though little entitled to communicate with your lordship, from the slight opportunities I have had of the honour of meeting you, yet, for the sake of others, I take the liberty of stating a circumstance to you which may be of importance to a person to whom, as I am informed, you have extended kindness and benevolence, and who, I believe, at present resides in one of your fishing houses, called the Pilot’s Mark.

“Without being myself fully acquainted with all the circumstances, I am given to understand that Mr. Bolton of New Hall, in your neighbourhood, has in his hands and retains, whether justly or not I pretend not to say, considerable property alleged to belong of right to the person in question; which person, as I learn, (through the medium of a man whom I have lately taken into my service,) refrains from suing for it, from some peculiarity of mind or opinion, or from an ill-grounded distrust of the efficiency of the law. Now, the information I wish to give, consists chiefly in this, that I have good reason to know, as well from other sources as from my own observation, that it requires only your judicious interference and influence to induce Mr. Bolton to return to the gentleman to whom you have already been liberal, such property or funds as shall place him quite beyond your humanity, and liberally reward your own benevolent feelings.

“I shall only add, that I am satisfied, that Mr. Bolton is at the present moment quite prepared for your interference, which, I have no doubt, will at once be effectual; and wishing to your efforts every success,

“I have the honour to be, &c.

“H. B. HULSON.”

Nothing could be more gratifying to Arnwood’s feelings, or give a quicker impulse to his dearest hopes, than the intelligence brought him in this short letter. Hulson’s information he saw confirmed by various things that he himself observed, particularly by the offer of Mr. Bolton some time since to address him on the road; and though his pride under ordinary circumstances would have prevented him from ever again communicating with the man who had insulted him so grossly, yet in the cause of Agatha and her father, he rejoiced in the prospect of an immediate negotiation with the squire, which he resolved on undertaking on the succeeding morning.

While Arnwood meditated these plans, his single servant, assisted by crooked Robin the gate-keeper, and his wife, prepared his evening repast, which was soon set before him. But by this time the solitariness of his situation in the old empty castle, struck him so forcibly as he insensibly contrasted it with the delight of Agatha’s society, which now came home to his fancy, with something like anticipated reality, that he was unable to eat; and first starting up and pacing the room in the pleasing indulgence of the hopes with which he was impressed, he at length rushed out, fatigued as he was, into the open air, that he might breathe more freely and indulge with less constraint in the stillness of night, the happy contemplation of the immediate restoration of Agatha, and of his own expected happiness.

He looked wistfully towards the Mark as he walked, but night had completely enveloped every object, and he could only distinguish the misty line of the sea below, by its phosphoric reflection of the stars which now twinkled above him. “Surely,” said he, “I may venture to go down even to night and enquire for Mr. Waltham. The messenger of good tidings is welcome at every door, and in this world few will venture to blame the freedoms or follies of a prosperous man, as I am at length beginning to be;” and saying this, he without more ado set forward to walk, dark as it was, to the Mark.

When he arrived at the door, and looked up at the small closed windows of the house where his Agatha resided, he observed on one side the fire-light gleaming warm from the top of a lower window, and as he listened, he heard at intervals the quaint chant of Murdoch Macara, mixed in chorus occasionally with the clearer voice of a woman; and even the rough tones of Weather-sheet, the sailor, seemed to strike in at times with the others, while a thump on the table, or some such thing, beat time to the more merry bars of the stave—and the whole ended with a burst of cheerful, but not loud, tongues, and the merry noise of laughter.

“Heaven prolong your innocent happiness!” exclaimed Arnwood, half audibly, as he looked up at the window. “What virtuous hearts and pure and peaceful bosoms inhabit this cold dreary-looking pile, to put the gorgeous and the lofty discontented to shame? May blessings rest upon and increase to all within these honoured walls. By Jove, I can refrain no longer! I shall seek admittance forthwith, that I may come in for a share of your homely social pleasure. And I shall have one look, before I sleep, of those eyes, which I still seem to see wherever I go, and which carry love and emotion in every glance;” and so saying, he went up and knocked gently at the door.

It was soon opened by Mary Reynolds, who smiled and curtsied as she held the light when she saw who it was, while his lordship could not help observing her kindly as he entered, for she was neat, and almost gaily dressed; and her buxom youthful face, glowing with health and the heat of the fire which she had just left, was surrounded by a cluster of curls sufficiently tastefully arranged to set off a countenance by no means calculated to make a warm-hearted man forget that there was such a thing as love in the world.

“I am delighted to see you all so happy,” said his lordship, as he entered the comfortable kitchen, scarcely able to see for the light of a blazing fire, before which an old furished sword, on which were strung a couple of good-sized fowls, went round agreeably to the ordering of big Weather-sheet, the sailor; who, seated in the shade of the chimney, with a face as red, and nearly as hot as the fire, was performing the duties of turnspit, with all the patient equanimity of the hardy race, who are trained to wait upon every wind that may happen to blow.

“Weel, I declare, if that’s no his lordship frae the castle!” exclaimed Murdoch Macara, coming forward. “Was there ever ony thing so heartsome and lucky, an’ the bit supper just ready for the dish? Ye’ll excuse me, my lord.”

“What is it, my honest Scotch friend?” said Arnwood, good humouredly. “Mr. Waltham is well, I presume, from what is indicated here, and disposed to enjoy himself.”

“Wonderfu’ weel, my lord, an’ mentioned you to Miss Agatha aboon, this very minute. Oh! if your lordship would just be pleased to be hungry the night; but what need I speak? Great folks are never hungry, like us poor bodies, as Nicol Macdougall, the fisher, used to say.”

“You’re much mistaken, my friend,” said Arnwood, smiling; “and so was Nicol Macdougall—but why this ardent wish to-night?”

“It would just be sic a pleasure for me to see your lordship sitting beside my mistress aboon, if it were the case, and me helping you like your valley de sham to the merry thought o’ ane o’ these burdies that’s fixing afore the fire. Twa bonnier chuckies never picked barley—an’ there’s muckle Will Wathersheet sitting at the helm turning them round, wi’ a face as red as a Dutch cheese, can hardly keep his fingers out o’ the gravy, the creature.”

“Upon my honour, Mr. Murdoch,” said Arnwood, “these burdies, as you call them, would tempt any one, after a long ride; and that being my condition, I have almost a mind, when I go up stairs, to try your cookery.”

“I telled ye sae! I telled ye sae! as the wife said about the mare that eat the mortar stane,” snapping his fingers, and turning round and addressing his companions. “Get up, Will Wathersheet, an’ bring me the dishes—sitting there like a hurcheon, licking your fingers i’ the presence o’ his lordship. Od man, ye hae nae mair manners, for a’ my teaching, than a cadger’s foal! Will ye never learn genteelity, ye sea porpus?”

“Will your lordship be pleased to walk up stairs?” said Mary Reynolds, curtsying, having herself ran up and down again, during the Scotchman’s palaver.

When Arnwood entered the small arched apartment above, which was used by the inmates as a sitting-room, he found a table covered for supper, the candles lighted, and a fire blazing with an air of much comfort. The old gentleman advanced to receive him, which he did with the greatest warmth, his countenance bespeaking not only inward tranquillity, but good humour, and spirits almost amounting to gaiety.

“I am very grateful for the honour of this visit, my lord,” said Mr. Waltham, shaking Arnwood by the hand—and, indeed, your presence is most happily timed. You come, as we are sitting down to supper, with the smiling countenance of youth and hope, and the sun-burnt visage of the traveller, like the welcome messenger of good tidings.”

“What news, I have, sir, is rather of a cheering kind, certainly,” said Arnwood, returning the old gentleman’s affectionate pressure.

“Agatha, my love, you must bid Lord Arnwood welcome,” said Mr. Waltham, as his daughter stood hesitatingly near him.

“You are indeed well-come, my lord,” said Agatha, as she held out her hand, her eyes glistening with emotion as they met his.

They sat down, Arnwood beside Agatha, and Mr. Waltham opposite, as their little supper was placed before them by the neat hands of Mary Reynolds, seconded and directed by the proud officiousness of Murdoch Macara; and never did morsel of Heaven’s bounty taste more sweet than did their homely meal to this little company in the square stone chamber of the lonely Pilot’s Mark; and never was conversation between three persons for the time more intensely interesting and delightful. Mr. Waltham, who had recovered much of his serenity from the constant nursing of his daughter, as well as the success of the fishermen since the storm—by which the evil day he dreaded was put off—and who was particularly disposed to be cheerful this evening, having received intelligence that his eldest daughter was safe, and was in Paris—in comparatively good spirits; and as he sat opposite Arnwood and Agatha seemed to observe with delight their looks of love, and the pleasure they took in each other’s society. “My children,” he said, “do not look with fear and awe of me, as if the fugitive happiness of your time, and the blissful feelings of youth were cruelly to be scared away, or damped and crushed by an old man like myself, who has already had his day in the world. Knowing that you are virtuous, I neither encourage nor forbid you to love and be happy; for the marriages of wavering mortals are made in heaven; and from thence issue the decrees from whose power you cannot escape, and which shall bind you, or separate you for ever.”

“Your career in the world, my lord,” he continued, addressing himself to Arnwood, “has begun with some adversity, but this may only serve to enhance the pleasure of bright days to come. As for me, I would not willingly again indulge the solacing delusions of hope, which would only serve to agitate and unhinge my mind from that calmness and submission with which it becomes me to prepare for my fate. Nothing, my lord, tends more to weaken an already debilitated and irritable mind, than exciting alternations of hope and apprehension; and now, as I am reduced to the condition of poverty which was predestined for me, any new-raised hope would, I am convinced, infallibly end in certain and more depressing disappointment.”

“I am sorry, Mr. Waltham,” said Arnwood, “to be obliged to repeat, that I am convinced your wrongs have caused you to delude yourself in your despair, as much as ever visionary was deluded by hope. But even if I should be unsuccessful, as I well believe I shall not, in inducing Mr. Bolton to restore your property, will you not, for your daughter’s sake, consent to empower me to seek redress for you by public law?”

Mr. Waltham shook his head, but made no reply. “Let us not talk of these sad subjects, father,” said Agatha. “Let us be happy again, as we have had something of my dear sister.”

“Ah! if she were here with us this happy night,” said Mr. Waltham; “how much the pleasure of this little meeting would be enhanced; but she is well, although I am still in the dark as to how she is situated, and Heaven’s mysterious will towards us all be done. Will you drink with me a health to my absent daughter, my lord?”

“Most gladly, sir,” said Arnwood, filling his glass; “and I feel convinced, from this night’s promise, my good sir, that many happy days are yet in store for us all.”

“I do hope so,” said Agatha, with brightening looks; and conversing thus the night wore away, until Mr. Waltham seemed to catch at his revived hopes of life, and almost joined Lord Arnwood in laughing at his late fancies.

A few moments’ conversation with Agatha, as they lingered together before parting for the night, in which they, in hurried and broken whispers, and with looks more expressive, congratulated each other upon their matured hopes and happy days in prospect, completed Arnwood’s bliss; and he left the Mark with all the joyful feelings of his ancestors revived in his heart, and all those warm hopes of youth glowing in his bosom.

He had crossed the open sandy spot immediately in front of the Mark, and entered his own plantation by the wicket towards the sea, when he heard a rustling among the trees to the left, and instantly perceived the figure of a man coming cautiously towards him. “Who goes there?” he shouted, as the figure drew near.

“A friend, sic-like as I am,” said the Scotch tongue off

Macara; "I would ken your lordship's voice as weel as ye were my born brither, though ye were to sing a mile distant through the wood, like a mavis."

"What are you doing, wandering at this time of the night, friend Murdoch?"

"It's a' for the best, my lord, as weel as it was that bonny moonlight night when I met your lordship coming blattering hame sae gude-humoured and tory from—I beg your excuse, my lord, I'm a plain spoken body—) frae that squire's at New Ha' aboon; an' I'm thinking ye'll be the better o' me to gang hame to the castle wi' you the night, for fear o' skaith."

"Pshaw—what should I fear! Go home to your bed, Murdoch."

"Deevil a bit, my lord, 'till I see what's gaun to happen."

"What do you mean?"

"I tell you, my lord, there's some new deevilry agog the night, an' that I'll answer for. I both saw and heard it."

"You saw a ghost, and heard the wind whistle, I dare say. Never trouble yourself with following me, I can go home myself."

"Weel, my lord, if ye just let me tell you what I saw. Ye see, while your lordship an' my canny maister, an' bonny Miss Agatha, were taking your crack aboon in the Mark, after picking the bones o' the bits o' burdies that Will Watersheet had hae burnt to a cinder, only for me, an' I was sitting coosily talking to Mary Reynolds by the light o' the fire—for Watersheet was sound asleep, the heavy-headed nowt—criek-criek, I hears some odd noise. But whether it was within or whether it was without, I couldna say, yet something I still heard, till at last up I gets frae side o' Mary Reynolds, pair thing, an' aff to see what might be stirring."

"Come, Murdoch, be brief."

"Weel, my lord, deevil a thing I could see or hear, but the black waves moaning in shore, but Providence put it into my head to take the bit road up back by the foot o' Hail Hill; when just as I gets near to the squire's muckle house, whither goes a wee fellow past me in the dark, an' off like a shot across the upper corner o' the park. Deevil's in you, said I, but I'll see what ye're after! an' in five minutes I was up to the slap through whilk he had dived into the squire's ground, an' then I saw the little blackguard carcutdancing with a man."

"What man?" said Arnwood, impatient at Murdoch's long story.

"I could amaise swear, my lord, it was that man that used to sneak about and try to pump me about the Mark. They ca' him Johnston."

"But what seemed to pass between them?"

"My legs wor' na just lang enough to hear, my lord, but it could be no good that made a gentleman like him be whispering without wi' sic a deevil's pet at twal at o'cloc. But whatever it was, or whatever is in the wind this precious night, I can swear that is the same blackguard callan that was among the robbers that robbed the squire's house, and an arranter little thief's apprentice is no unheaped. I think they ca' him Sammy."

"Weel, Murdoch, what do you infer from all this?"

"I'm neither prophet nor priest, my lord, to say; but I'm certain it bodes no good to somebody."

"Weel, you had better go home and protect the Pilot's Mark, and I will try to protect the castle against all invaders. Meantime, I shall not be willing to have my good spirits disturbed by any such alarm as you give."

"Awel, my lord," said Murdoch doubtfully, "I've telt'd you my tale, an' so a sound sleep an' a blyth waking, an' mony better wishes than that, if they would do you any gude—an' God defend you frae skaith an' scorn till the new day."

CHAPTER XXIV.

The new day did come in, sunny and cheerful, in spite of the strange alarm of Murdoch on the previous night, and Lord Arnwood rose in the best spirits after a long sleep, which had been mingled only with soothing visions of Agatha, and placid anticipations of future joy. He ordered his breakfast to be served in his favourite room in the Lark's Tower, and as he sat musing on the future, while the cheerful beams of morning gleamed over the extensive prospect, his fancy glowed with pride in the survey of the picturesque possessions of his ancestors, still entrusted to him and his heirs. His spirits danced with delicious imaginings as he thought of his Agatha yet becoming lady of this romantic property, and their happy little ones, giving additional life and lustre to the old halls of the now empty building—or one day roaming at large among the red deer that yet sported in the irregular park beneath.

As he farther dwelt at his solitary meal on those pleasing anticipations, he smiled as he reflected on his former irrational dependency—"As if," said he to himself, "life were not full of promise to the active and the prudent, or as if I—a young man—were, like the ruined Mr. Waltham, to be checked in my career by a false and dismal philosophy, or guided by a fanciful and gloomy infatuation. I need not now recall the ridiculous notion that at one time took such possession of me about my being fated to be the last of my house and title, excepting it may be to laugh at the crude notions of youth, and to contrast early fears and fancies with their present nearly realized falsification." Indulging in these pleasing musings, he dressed, and prepared to ride to New Hall by noon, to endeavour to make as beneficial an arrangement as possible for his interesting friend Mr. Waltham.

He had scarcely completed his morning's toilet, however, and was pulling on his gloves to set forth, when the post brought him the following note—

"London, 18—

"MY DEAR ARNWOOD,

"The disappointment I felt this morning in waiting upon the Right Honourable Mr. Y— was actually as great as yours can be on the perusal of this. In short, after many apologies, and much smooth politeness, he informed me that your lordship not being in parliament, (a strange excuse, for he knew the fact before), it was impossible to complete the appointment he had intended for the noble representative of the ancient house of Arnwood—which, of course, he exceedingly regretted; and it came out in conversation, that the said appointment had been long ago promised to the younger brother of the bishop of Redborough, who, in fact, had already received it!

"I need not say how much this news disconcerted me, after my saying all over town, that the thing was yours; but, in truth, entre nous, if it is worth while making a secret of it, the minister is tottering. That is the general opinion in the select circle who are in the secret of every thing, and wherein I have the honour of bearing a part; and you will see that there will be a change shortly.

"Let us see you at the park shortly, and believe me to be, my very dear Arnwood,

Yours always,

"BOLLAND BOLLAND."

"Heavens and earth! am I the fool of the most foolish!" exclaimed Arnwood, throwing the letter to the other end of the apartment, "to have believed for a moment the word, and swallowed the representations of this frivolous idiot, and his flatterers. Or was the minister in league with him to deceive me—fish!—but why should I put myself in a passion about the deceptions and hollow promises of courts? They have been proverbial in all past time, since Mordecai the Jew sat sullen and unrepentant at the gate of Ahasuerus. Let me see, at least, if my money be safe," he added, opening his escritoire, "yes, six thousand there, and seven hundred odd there, and another and inferior appointment money will make me sure of, and two thousand guineas will do that at once. Let me forget this little disappointment, and proceed at once on my interesting mission to New Hall."

The words were hardly uttered, when he observed two persons pass the window, and immediately after, the servant announced Mr. Simkin and Mr. Johnston, as desiring admittance into the presence of his lordship. Arnwood could scarcely help feeling a sort of qualm come over him at the very name of Johnston, and at the idea of his having the audacity to seek admittance into his presence. But he had scarcely time to wonder within himself what could be the purport of this visit, when the two were ushered into the room.

"Your business, gentlemen?" said Arnwood, as they stood hesitatingly before him.

"You may be surprised, my lord," said Johnston, "at my having ventured to wait upon you, after certain circumstances that—"

"That I do not desire to have recalled, sir," said Arnwood haughtily.

"I do not wish to remind your lordship of any thing unpleasant, and indeed the business I am come about is not at all so unpleasant as it may at first appear. But at any rate, that I undertook it with the greatest reluctance, I can testify—"

"I can attest the same," said his companion, bowing with a professional air.

"Our visit is respecting an offer that my friend Mr. Bolton is disposed to make to your lordship regarding a sum of five thousand pounds, which your lordship owes him as the heir and representative of your late mother the dowager Lady Arnwood, some time deceased, and—"

"Five thousand pounds! borrowed by Lady Arnwood of Mr. Bolton," exclaimed the young lord in astonishment; "surely, this must be a mistake, I never heard of such a loan;" and he took the bond in his hand and gazed at it long and minutely to the infinite trouble and sore concern of Johnston, who fidgeted about strangely. "I certainly never understood—"

"I beg your lordship's pardon," said Mr. Simkin, striking in, "there is no such thing understood or recognised in law, as an understanding between parties, unless it can be shown in writing, which, as I learn, your lordship is unprepared to show, and therefore we are come to discuss the main proposition which we have the honour to make to your lordship."

"You are a lawyer then, sir?" said Arnwood to the solicitor.

"I have the honour to belong to the profession, my lord," and Mr. Simkin bowed as he said this with a consciousness of being honoured by the acknowledgment of his lofty station in this lower world.

"In one word, gentlemen, come you with a hostile purpose from Mr. Bolton," said Arnwood, "for I was just going to pay a visit to him?"

"The law is never to be considered hostile, my lord," said Mr. Simkin complacently, "when every thing is done according to precedent and the practice of the courts, and—"

"Mr. Bolton is not at New Hall to day, my lord," said Johnston, interrupting the man of law; "he is absent, and will be much occupied for a time upon the business of the late audacious robbery. But in short, he is determined upon recovering this five thousand pounds, if your lordship does not think fit to comply with the conditions upon which he consents to waive his claim—which conditions, I must say, are most liberal."

"What are the conditions?" demanded Arnwood with an indignant smile.

"Simply, my lord, that you will give him the immediate use and possession of a certain antique pleasure house and premises appertaining to your lordship, commonly called the Pilot's Mark, to be held by him for seven years from the present date, and particularly that your lordship will undertake not to countenance or harbour a certain individual called Waltham in any house or building belonging to you, but that he, and those with him, be instantly sent forth from this neighbourhood as suspicious characters, and—"

"How dare you bring me such an infamous message, sir?" said Arnwood, indignant at the proposal.

"It is a mere matter of business, my lord," said Simkin, now taking a part, "that we are come upon; upon which we expect your lordship's pleasure or answer, without any unnecessary heat."

"I cannot conceive," replied Arnwood, his anger giving way to astonishment, "why Mr. Bolton should act thus, or that his meaning is really as you say, to give up this sum of five thousand pounds either at present or in prospect, on such unaccountable conditions."

"It is Mr. Bolton's pleasure or his whim, or what you please," said Johnston; "and I don't see why a gentleman should not be gratified when he can pay for it."

"Ha! ha! very true," said Arnwood, smiling scornfully; "but what evidence have I that this is really Mr. Bolton's wish regarding that unfortunate man in the Mark whom I had thought he was weary of persecuting?"

"There are very strange surmises regarding that individual whom your lordship is pleased to harbour, in connection with certain facts which took place at the late robbery; all inquiry respecting which may be quashed by your lordship instantly banishing him and his from this neighbourhood, and giving up possession of the Pilot's Mark; and, in short, I would advise him and your lordship as a friend—"

"Do you presume to speak of yourself as my friend! or the friend of any unfortunate gentleman? I do not believe you, sir, even in your assertions about Mr. Bolton. I do not believe that he is such a villain as your message would imply. I will wait upon him myself in the cause of the distressed and ruined Mr. Waltham."

"As you please, my lord," said Johnston, with a sneer of cold triumph. "Your lordship has, no doubt, your reasons for this condescending interference. But this will serve to indicate the reception you are likely to meet with, while it will verify the truth of my assertion;" and, thus saying, he threw down for Arnwood's perusal the following paper:—

"New Hall, 17th Oct. 18—

"Mr. Johnston is empowered to require Lord Arnwood in my name to obtain for me instant possession of the Pilot's Mark, and the banishment from the neighbourhood of certain persons who now occupy it; upon his failing of payment of five thousand pounds, owing to me, as the representative of the late Lady Arnwood.

(Signed) "ROBERT BOLTON."

"Mr. Simkin," said Arnwood, after two or three turns across the room; "if I mistake not, I am not liable to be compelled to pay my mother's debts unless at my own option or convenience."

"You are quite liable to be compelled, my lord, having acknowledged the debt as your own since your mother's decease, as I am informed by Mr. Bolton, in the presence of this gentleman."

"Is that the case, Johnston?" said Arnwood, with an incredulous smile of astonishment.

"It is, my lord," answered Johnston, with a dark expression of face. "But it will be unnecessary for your lordship to give yourself any uneasiness about the money. You have only to join your creditor in sending these mysterious people about their business, and give him the Pilot's Mark for a time—a most liberal offer!"

"Ha, ha, ha!" laughed Arnwood, as he paced the apartment, "how glorious it is to have the means of defeating the machinations of villains—have you my mother's bond, Mr. Simkin?"

"It is here, my lord."

"Your entire demand against me, sir?"

"Five thousand and seventy-three pounds, covering interest and all expenses."

"Now, sir, there is your money and Mr. Bolton's answer. Five thousand, and the balance in gold. It is right!"—and Arnwood reckoned out the amount, while Johnston stood petrified with astonishment and horror.

"Now, gentlemen, have you any more business with me?" said Arnwood, as he placed the bond carefully in his escritoire with the designedly overheard remark,—"I shall see to the correctness of this most scrupulously, depend upon it."

"Our business is finished, my lord," said the lawyer, with the grace and satisfaction with which a lawyer usually receives and buttons up money.

"Then your lordship is determined to protect and countenance these suspicious characters in the Mark, in despite of the wishes of Mr. Bolton?" said Johnston, recovering his evident mortification and amazement.

"Good morning, Mr. Johnston," said Arnwood, with contemptuous scorn, as he turned away without deigning a reply; and the lawyer and Johnston, with different views of the success of their morning's business, slowly left the apartment.

The reader may well imagine that, weak and unprincipled, as Bolton was, he had not been brought to adopt a line of conduct so unexpected by the ardent and generous Arnwood, and so fatal to himself if discovered, without much internal conflict between his remaining disposition to justice and prudence on the one hand, and his rapacious avarice on the other. Although he at first unquestionably intended to compromise with his conscience, and endeavour to conciliate Mr. Waltham, by giving up to the latter a part of the wealth of which he had unjustly robbed him—yet, having in the perplexity of scarcely resolved good, and the temptation to further criminality, unhappily fled to Johnston for counsel, the latter soon showed him that he had only two lines of conduct to choose from. The one to which the squire was inclined, he treated with ridicule and contempt, as being not only pusillanimous, but dangerous: and, although not without much bitter and reproachful altercation, he at length contrived to induce him to adopt the one which implied an adherence to, and an extension of, the original guilt.

It may appear strange that Mr. Bolton, conscious as he was of being himself one of the most rapacious of wealth-worshippers, should not have penetrated the motives of Johnston in giving the advice he did. But by this time his mind was so wretched, and so disturbed with anxious indecision, that he had lost his natural shrewdness; while Johnston, as is evident, had become the evil angel of the guilty man—not only from a fear of the diminution of the sum he had promised himself with Miss Bolton—but also from a hope that he should, from his increasing influence over him, be able to prevent Bolton himself from marrying, and so ultimately inherit his whole fortune.

Arnwood was still sitting in the seat into which he had thrown himself after Johnston and Simkin had left the room, gazing with the most prying earnestness into the empty grate, without seeing any thing, when he was aroused from his stupor by his servant announcing a gentleman, who waited to see him in the next apartment. Arnwood would have shunned, if it had been possible, the necessity of speaking to any stranger in his present state of mind. Thinking, however, that a moment would suffice, he desired the stranger to be shown in, as we shall duly record in our next chapter.

CHAPTER XXV.

A late event in our history, as well as some others in progress, require us for their further explanation to transfer our scene to a romantically situated, old fashioned mansion, about eight miles distant from that coast in the secluded neighbourhood of Arnwood castle, near which the reader has been so long detained. The mansion we refer to, was called Saltoun Hall, and had been for centuries in the possession of one of those old families, who, accustomed to consider the wealth and local honour which had so long descended from father to son, as a right hereditary and unalienable, by which they were exempted from the common vicissitudes of humanity, never dreamt that it was possible, in the nature of things, that the family of Saltoun should not live at Saltoun Hall, or the scions of so ancient a line be otherwise than persons of property and consequence.

The last inheritor of Saltoun Hall, therefore, (a widower with two children,) was astonished and confounded beyond measure, when the course of events foreign to our story, brought about so impossible a circumstance, as that they should be deprived of the antique home of the family, and sent adrift into the world, to which they were strangers, and which refused to recognise their claims to indulgence, before they finally took their places among the lower orders—from which the family had probably, some generations before, originally sprung. Nor was amazement less, upon seeing that the turning of the wheel of fortune had given the noble and patriarchal mansion of their fathers, into the possession of Mr. Jonathan Wragg, some years before a tradesman in London, who had outbidden every other purchaser—and who, in the course of a year or two, had even exhibited the intolerable presumption of working himself into the magistracy, and assuming the style and title of Squire Wragg, of Saltoun Hall.

Many were the wise reflections and profound aphorisms upon the fickleness of fortune, and the mutability of all earthly good, with which the aged Mr. Saltoun endeavoured to console himself for the loss of his estate, over his poor dinner, and in his obscure lodging in London. The reflections, however, it must be confessed, although deeply fraught with wisdom, had never entered his head until these last days; far less had the former hunting and fighting squires of Saltoun ever troubled their brains with such overlasting truisms and unnecessary philosophy. Very different were the meditations and conclusions of Mr. Jonathan Wragg, the new proprietor, as he walked upon a terrace on his house-top in the cool of the evening like king David of old, and surveyed the picturesque woods and parks of the fine English demesne, of which he was now master. Concluding with the great chancellor Bacon, that man was the architect of his own fortune, he applauded himself for many acts in his past life, of which most men are incapable, or, at least, would be deeply ashamed; and looked with proportionate pity and contempt upon the complaining and the unfortunate; particularly if they had not as hard a check upon the ways of the world as himself.

Mr. Wragg was a pretty good specimen of a prosperous man of the modern school, in this high-minded, commercial country. A couple of bankruptcies in his trade, and various other dirty adventures through which he had passed in his early career, had pretty well hardened whatever feelings he originally possessed, and fairly set him up in the world: till at length, by means of a connection with his brother, a clever solicitor, he was enabled to amaze his compeers by the purchase of a fine estate.

Mr. Wragg having obtained the commission of the peace in this remote neighbourhood, performed its duties with a troublesome and dangerous officiousness. The old gentry round, were either too indolent and fond of pleasure to attend to the duties of the trust, or they chose to live mostly in London, or on the continent; and thus, in the ordinary course of events, by which certain men get up in the world, Wragg made himself known every where, and was in the possession of every means that could serve his interest, or forward his popularity. But something too much, perhaps, of so common and contemptible a character.

The recent robbery at New Hall, naturally made such important personages as Mr. Bolton and Mr. Wragg known to each other, and after some time brought them together. But it was not until repeatedly urged by Johnston, in furtherance of his own views, that the former was brought to decide upon taking a morning's ride to Saltoun, to consult with the worthy magistrate, upon the steps necessary to be adopted in order to bring the delinquents to justice, wherever they might be found—and, more particularly, to impress Mr. Wragg with suspicions of the harmless inhabitants of the Pilot's Mark, and so pave the way for certain steps against them, if such a course should be deemed necessary.

Mr. Wragg was sitting in his summer parlour one morning like Egton, the fat king of Moab, enjoying the pleasure of looking round him, and doing nothing; when his sight was gladdened by observing a vehicle stop at his door, from which Mr. Bolton stepped forth, accompanied by Johnston, evidently on a visit of business. Mr. Wragg instantly arose to receive them, which he did with that kindness and cordiality with which the proverbial fowls of a feather have at all times delighted to flock together, and hail each other's presence; and after many salutations the three worthies commenced their consultation.

"Undoubtedly, sir," said Wragg, after a little conversation, "you are, as you say, somewhat unfortunately situated, in your remote neighbourhood. In respect of that security of our property, which is the very central purpose of all our valuable institutions, and you being the only gentleman of real substance within many miles of you, it is little to be wondered at that you should be exposed to depredation. For as for Lord Arnwood—as the young man who inhabits the black castle near you is styled—between ourselves, I have ascertained pretty well what is the weight of his purse, ha, ha! and lords are all very well where they don't ask for credit; but you and I, Mr. Bolton, you and I could buy this lord and his old tumbling ruin twice over, with his title and his pride into the bargain, ha, ha, ha!"

"I have something that I can call my own, certainly, sir," said Bolton, modestly; "but New Hall is nothing to this noble mansion of yours, Mr. Wragg."

"You are pleased to overrate my bargain, sir, though it was a bargain," answered Wragg with a chuckle, that was ludicrous even to Bolton; "though, to be sure, I ought to have something to look at for the money I gave. But concerning this abominable robbery; if there be any one whom you suspect, sir, of being accessory thereto, or of receiving your property, and so forth, the law puts it in my power as a magistrate to grant a warrant upon proper information, and I shall be most happy to—"

"Your readiness to oblige, sir, is most praiseworthy; in fact, there is only one person whom I suspect, that is to say, not altogether suspect, but—"

"Pray who is he, sir?"

"I do not think it necessary to give his name, nor to trouble you further, than to make an inquiry or two, at least until I learn more; for, in fact, if the person in question will only leave the neighbourhood, which, perhaps, he may yet be required to do by my neighbour, Lord Arnwood, who at present is pleased to protect him—"

"Lord Arnwood protect him! just allow me to make a memorandum of that important fact. I always make memoranda; nothing like regularity in business. Now, sir, the name of the suspected person, if you please."

"I would rather give a general description than name him at present, Mr. Wragg, although—"

"Oh, sir, I fear you will defeat the ends of justice by your leniency. But just favour me with some account in your own way of the man suspected."

"He is a strange, mysterious person, apparently re-dacted, residing near the sea, and pretending to live by occasional fishing, but—"

"Well, sir; proceed."

"My friend Johnston can describe him further," said the squire, turning adroitly round to draw what he aimed at out of his pliable companion.

"In plain words," said Johnston, glad of an opportunity of showing his zeal, "this individual is a great eyesore to my respected friend here, and lives in a large suspicious-looking place, called the Pilot's Mark, having certain men employed ostensibly as fishermen. He has the countenance of a young nobleman, who is as poor, comparatively, as himself, but to whom, for particular reasons of delicacy, I forbear too pointedly to allude."

"I see it clearly," said Wragg; "and though I would not be ready to put such a name as that of Lord Arnwood on paper in an official way—you understand me—yet the reduced state and palpable poverty of the man you talk of is a most suspicious circumstance, connected with other things; so that the temptation to robbery being immense, an example ought to be made for the protection of property. In short, I feel for your situation, Mr. Bolton. Shall I take your information, sir? are you willing to salute the calf-skin on the subject? as we used to say in the city."

"Allow me to decline at present," said Bolton, "and, unless you hear from me again, I wish the matter to drop."

"Permit me to observe," replied Wragg, assuming the consequence of office, "that this leniency to persons so suspicious is not at all to be commended, Mr. Bolton. And, in fact, as the sword of justice is, in a sense, put into my hands for the protection of our lives and fortunes, I myself will volunteer to inspect the suspicious spot—and don't you think if I called upon this Lord Arnwood, just in a friendly way, I might be able to draw something out of him that might be of importance in the affair? Upon my honour, gentlemen, I shall do this very thing. I shall do it, really."

"It is too much, Mr. Wragg—too much, sir," said both, smiling.

"It is only my duty, gentlemen—my bounden duty. Our properties are too sacred to lie thus at the mercy of thieves, or, at best, most suspicious characters. It has always been a maxim with me through life, gentlemen, to suspect needy wretched people—persons without property or consequence."

This doctrine greatly emboldened the squire in his intended proceedings against the unhappy Waltham; and now Mr. Johnston and he bowed and retired, leaving little Mr. Wragg in a short reverie, which he broke abruptly by starting up, seizing his hat, and making the best of his way to Arnwood castle.

We have before advised the reader that an intimation was made to Arnwood by his servant, of the presence of a stranger who requested an interview. Although, in his present state of mind, he could easily have dispensed with company, yet, uncertain whether the business might not be urgent and of consequence to himself, he desired that the stranger should be admitted.

A thin, smart-looking little man, in black, with a short neck and beetle nose, a square powdered head, red frocked face, and globular protruding eyes, was ushered, with many bustling bows, into his lordship's presence.

"My name is Wragg, my lord; your lordship has often heard of me, no doubt," said he, advancing, and smirking familiarly.

"I fear I have not had the pleasure, sir."

"No? can it be possible? But, to be sure, your lordship is rather out of the way of—that is—the weather is very hot, my lord—"

"Your business with me, sir," said Arnwood, impatiently.

"Oh, there has been a most extensive and alarming robbery in your neighbourhood, my lord, and—"

"Well, sir—"

"In short, my lord, I have the honour to be in the examination of the peace, as your lordship may have heard, and in a discussion with a brother magistrate, when I called upon for advice in this important affair, concerning the best means of discovering the perpetrators of the late nefarious robbery, I was advised (indeed it was at my own suggestion) in accordance with the hints of the respectable squire, Mr. Bolton, to wait upon your lordship upon the business. And as I am determined to do my official duty with zeal, for the protection of our properties, and to probe every thing suspicious to the bottom, I came to have a little private conference with your lordship regarding this alarming affair."

"Your conference with me, sir, must be very useless, for, in fact, I can say little on the subject of the robbery, having been from home ever since; and, in plain terms, the conference must be short, for at present I am busy."

"Indeed!" said the little man, chagrined, and incredulously, as he looked round the room and saw no show of papers or business. "Besides, my lord," he continued, "I meant to have taken the trouble of walking with your lordship through the grounds of this castle, that we might inspect in person certain old buildings and ruins, so likely to afford concealment to suspicious persons on the coast; particularly a certain tenement called the Pilot's Mark, and if your lordship had leisure, and would do me the honour to—"

"I cannot now, sir," said Arnwood, more and more annoyed; "besides, I think it quite unnecessary."

"That is very strange, my lord, after so much property has been lost by a gentleman so near you. Are the dwellings and goods of men of property not to be protected?"

"If I am to discuss this matter with you, sir," said Arnwood haughtily, "I answer, that in this free country there is no want of protection for men of property and power. It is the poor and unfortunate that are apt to be the sufferers."

"This is singular language to me, my lord."

"Very likely, sir, but so much the worse for the feelings and properties of those who have little wealth to spare."

"And does your lordship refuse to assist me in my enquiries, and to accompany me through the suspicious parts in your neighbourhood?"

"I shall give every assistance in my power for the ends of justice, when regularly called upon in case of any suspicious person being found; but there are none such that I know of in this immediate neighbourhood; and, in short, I think any such inspection ill-timed, unnecessary, and, perhaps, officious."

These last words were spoken by Arnwood in a brief and determined way, that showed he was resolved not to be betrayed into another word of discussion with the impertinent intruder; and, ringing the bell, Mr. Wragg was prevented from further annoyance by a sternly civil dismissal. The chagrined and chop-fallen little justice, therefore, bustling awkwardly out, with a speech on his tongue, took his departure, and, after wandering about in uncertainty till he tired himself, to no purpose, turned for consolation towards New Hall.

The evening was somewhat advanced when Arnwood proceeded in the direction of the Pilot's Mark, for the express purpose of calling there, urged by a presentiment of evil, which, however the incredulous may doubt its existence, does, nevertheless, sometimes "cast its shadow before" to warn us of approaching calamity.

He was not a little surprised, on entering the house, at the non-appearance of Macara or the sailor; and the gloom and silence that reigned around, seemed to announce the occurrence of some sudden and undefined calamity which Arnwood's fears were not slow to shape out and to magnify.

Proceeding silently, but in haste, up stairs, and receiving no answer to his repeated tapping at the door of the sitting room—which ceremony he performed in lieu of an introduction by the servant—he entered slowly, and discovered Miss Waltham, her head resting in her hands, upon the back of her chair, and her bosom heaving with convulsive sobs.

She started, as a soft pressure on her shoulder recalled her to consciousness, and raising her head, Arnwood perceived not only by the traces of tears, but by the disorder of her hair, and the paleness of her face, that she had been, and was still, under the influence of extraordinary agitation.

"Tell me, Agatha, I implore you," cried he, surprised and concerned, "what is the cause of this excessive grief?"

"Excessive grief! ha, how can you say so, my lord?"

"What mean you, Agatha? how is this?"

"Can any grief be called excessive under this new, this last, this heart-breaking misfortune?"

"What misfortune, Agatha? can any new trouble have happened since I left you, so happy and so full of hope last night?"

"Then you have not heard? Why should you hear?"

"No, Agatha; I have heard nothing. Oh! do not keep me in suspense."

"My father! my poor, unfortunate, heart-broken father!" and she was unable to proceed for tears.

"Good heavens—what are you about to tell me? How is he? Where is he?"

"Gone—gone—dragged from me by ruffians, and the house—oh, I shall go distracted!"

"For mercy's sake, let me know all, Agatha. Who dragged him? whither has he been taken?"

"To a jail; to a common jail—to a dungeon—to be placed at the bar like a common felon; to be judged; to be examined and witnessed against; to be tried for his life; to be accused of theft, of robbery—perhaps to be—oh, God of heaven, keep me in my poor senses!"

"This is dreadful—dreadful!" but be calm, Agatha. What could they possibly allege against your father? It must be some error—some mere mistake—some—"

"Whatever is alleged against the unfortunate, is presumptively true," said Agatha, earnestly, but collectedly, interrupting him; "and the world has not leisure to reason against its own ready surmises. In short, my father is accused of being accessory to the robbery at the house of that dreadful villain, Bolton—and there is proof, my lord—good proof—and he has been hurried off to prison. Ah! Arnwood, my honoured, only friend," she continued, clasping her hands, "had you seen the steady resignation—the placid calmness with which the sad and humbled old man gave himself up to the officers—whom he piously called heaven's menials, appointed to conduct him to his fate—had you but observed that suppressed look of grief, and heard—oh! could you have heard the low struggling sigh which scarcely heaved his bosom, yet with which his heart was bursting, as he bade me farewell, you would have—you would—oh my father!—my father!"—and the unhappy girl sunk down, overpowered by emotion.

"Heaven and earth!" exclaimed Arnwood—"this is dreadful!"

"But I have not told you all—do not interrupt my sorrow while I tell you how the dear old man looked in the midst of his grief. When I rushed after him—when I pleaded with him to suffer me to share his imprisonment—when, in my distraction, I even knelt at the feet of the ruffians who were dragging him forth, and implored them to allow me to follow him to his horrid cell—had you seen how my father raised his bent figure as he held up his hand to heaven, and swore, with the passionate dignity of misery, that the person of his unhappy daughter should never be polluted by entering the walls of a felon's jail—unless the last necessity of bidding farewell to an unhappy parent should force her to waive the delicacies of her nature, and require her to penetrate the abodes of wretchedness and crime;—and he looked, my lord, at that moment—he looked," her figure seeming to expand, as she stood loftily in the moonlight, and extended her arm upwards in the abandonment of her sorrow—"he looked like some sublime personification of human woe, and his voice sounded like a prophecy of his own fate!—Oh God! oh God!—Happy, happy mother! who hast gone to thy quiet rest, and hast not lived to feel the unutterable anguish of this dreadful hour!"—and the unhappy girl again burst into tears.

"But, surely, Agatha," said Arnwood, after a pause, "there must be something more than you have told me about this strange occurrence."

"Sit down beside me," she answered, "and I will tell you all."

"The first intimation I received of this new misfortune," she went on, "was in the perturbed looks and broken surmises of our servant Macara, who came with breathless haste into the room where I sat; and presently two mean-looking men entered the apartment, while the Scotchman clandestinely retired to a back passage, to observe what was to happen. The men began to peep strangely about, and to question me with looks of horrid familiarity. At length they proceeded unbidden up stairs, and were met on the landing-place by my dear astonished father, while I followed trembling with indefinite terror. The strangers then produced a paper, and said they were ordered to search the house for property, belonging to Mr. Bolton, of New Hall. My father, with the calm dignity of innocence, ordered them to proceed; when I beheld with horror the officers bring out several pieces of silver plate, which they found hidden in the passage near my unhappy father's own bed."

"Gracious heaven! this is incredible."

The men exclaimed, "Here is direct proof against you, sir—sufficient proof to hang any man; but I would advise you not to say a word that may criminate yourself, for all that," added one of them, holding out the articles, and addressing my amazed father.

"And your father; could he reply to this?"

"Alas! my lord, after staring for an instant at the men, he burst forth into a wild fearful laugh, that shocked me still more than the occasion of it; then letting his arms drop idly by his side, he looked solemnly upwards, and thanked heaven that his unhappy fate would soon be accomplished."

Arnwood groaned aloud.

"After my poor father had intimated that he was ready to go; the men said they had orders to find a person named Macara; but when I looked round, I observed that our warm-hearted Scot had made his escape, and that only Mary Reynolds was left, who wrung her hands distractedly as she wandered weeping through the house. I cannot tell you more, but that when I found that my father was gone and our ruin complete, I sunk into a state of insensibility from which, when you entered, I had but just revived."

"And is it thus you submit to your father's desolation, Agatha? And does he submit to be sent to a jail, and tried for a vilely-imputed crime, without one effort to free himself, and turn the tables on his hidden enemy? If his opinions lead him to this conduct, they are monstrous."

"What is it you mean? What could my poor father do against wealth and worldly cunning in a case like this? If heaven does not open a way for him to escape, it will at least enable my distressed parent and myself to bear it."

"God above!" he exclaimed as he gazed upon her face, on which a beam of the moon now shone brightly—"that so much beauty and virtue should thus suffer, while thousands of wretches—but I shall become profane. And yet, Agatha, in the midst of degradation, obscurity, and disappointment, let me say one thing—let me give utterance to one word—let me say—

"For heaven's sake, Arnwood," cried Agatha, interrupting him, "do not speak and gaze thus passionately. Do not say any thing at a moment like this."

"You know what I would say, Agatha; I see you know that my interest for you is intensely selfish—and yet, I will say it. By the heaven that now looks down upon us, I love you, Agatha!"

"For God's sake do not talk so," she said, weeping distractedly as she witnessed his ardour; "do not speak of love. I must not hear you."

"And do you refuse my love, Agatha?" he exclaimed almost fiercely.

"No, Arnwood! dear Arnwood, no! but do not look so. Do not speak of love to me. I am a poor outcast, unhappy girl—

"It would be an aggravation of our mutual misfortunes," she continued more calmly—"and is an aggravation of them, at this moment—for thus it ever is with deep feelings and ardent wishes under the frowns of fortune. And yet, I confess I have had the imprudence to permit myself to feel for you—" and she looked up in his face in the moonlight, while the tears streamed down her cheeks upon her clasped hands—"to feel for you—a sentiment—deeper even than gratitude."

To describe the ecstasy of the lover, as he clasped his mistress for the first time in his arms, would be superfluous. Agatha did not refuse, in the excitement of sorrow and of passion, to pledge Arnwood her troth as they stood together; they vowed themselves to each other with an awful, yet somewhat foreboding solemnity.

The night breeze sighed sadly over the sea, and the moon was quite down, as they yet lingered together in silent sadness. Yet they felt and appreciated, even amid their sorrow, the unspeakable consolation of that pure sympathy, which, like the white stone mentioned by the Prophet in the Apocalypse, "No man can know save him to whom it has been given to taste thereof."

CHAPTER XXVI.

We cannot describe the consternation with which the poor Scotchman witnessed the search at the Pilot's Mark, and its consequences; little time was left for consideration. From a small recess in the wall of the Mark, in which he had planted himself, for the purpose of gathering, as well as eyes and ears would permit him, what was going forward, he heard his young mistress scream, and immediately after his own name inquired for. Slipping quietly down the narrow stair-case, and through a back passage, and just managing to obtain a parting salute from Mary Reynolds, with a hasty injunction to keep up her spirits, and to stay close by her mistress until he should make his re-appearance under more promising circumstances, he set off in search of Weathersheet, whom he naturally deemed in similar jeopardy, and away they started, urging their flight for the shore together.

"Rin, ye deevil, rin," was the cry with which he continued to goad the sluggish energies of the sailor, who, floundering away by his side with a heavy and awkward roll under the cliffs, made what speed he was able, from the more habit of passive obedience to his more spirited messmate, but without the smallest understanding wherefore he was thus compelled to put forth such unwonted energy.

"Will ye not rin, ye lumb'ring stot?" cried Murdoch, as the sailor began to flag. "De'il nor ye fa' into the hands o' the beagles, for ye taigle me three knots at least by the log."

"If I pull any harder I shall positively founder, and turn, keel up, over these stones and sea-weed," said the sailor, blowing like a whale. "I shall haul in canvass directly as soon as we weather this point to larboard, if the devil himself was in chase."

"Confound you, rin, for five minutes longer, at least, for they can see us from the Mark as plain yet as I see the naked flagstaff o' the auld castle aboon; an' if the beagles, an' the lawyers, an' the squires catch pair fellows like us, just now, we'll be lagged in wi' the misfortunes o' my puir maister, an' hanging or Botany Bay will be the least o't."

"Not a leg farther," said the sailor, stopping doggedly by the point, "until I know better what all this crowding of canvass is about; and if the bailiffs or pirates, or whatever else, come alongside, why we'll have a yard-arm and yard-arm set to fix it, that's all."

"Just a wee bit farther, Will," said Murdoch, soothingly, and pulling him along. "I tell you innocent or no, we're fleeing frae danger and trouble; fleeing like birds frae the snare o' the fowler. But, truly, sic a bird as you for flight, Will Wathersheet, I never yet saw take the wing."

"I'll pull an oar with any man," said Weathersheet, chafed, "but blow me if I founder myself in this land chase, at least until I know from what quarter the foul weather comes, that drifts us so far out of our course; and even now, I shall very soon tack about, if the devil should be to face, unless I get proper sailing orders, and learn what land's a-head."

"Weel, ye see, William," said Murdoch, as they slackened their pace, "some men are born to trouble an' vexation just as the sparks flee upwards, an' nothing will stop or avert them but the strong hand that sends gude an' ill to mun; an' so my puir maister has been in naething but frae ae misfortune into another ever since I knew him, until now—till at last they ha'e accused him o' this robbery at the squire's, an' his distracted proud heart 'll be broken ae way an' another, I can see—that 'll be the end o't."

"And you have left him at his last pinch, just when his pumps won't work any longer, and he's going down to Davy, you Scotch lubber—I'll not pull another oar wi' you on this cowardly course; if his old hulk can't be kept longer above water, I'll stick to his broken timbers to the last, and then I'll go down with him into the deep, like a seaman."

"Hooly, William Wathersheet—hooly a wee, till I've told'd my tale. What gude would we do to gae back to put ourselves into the jaws o' a jail an' the law, without a shilling to pay for justice, an' without ae word said for us but our ain tale, which would be nae mair minded by judge an' jury, than I would mind a blast o' wind frae the lown side o' Hail Hill. An', ye see, as you an' I were without doubt wandering about New Ha' that morning, an' I was seen by ane o' the squire's fat flunkies at least, wi' a sword in my hand, I tell you, without saving our puir heart-broken maister, who was out himself that dreadful night,—why or wherefore is beyond my ken—circumstantial evidence, an' the squire's siller, an' theae long-tongued lawyers, would hang us baith as clean as leeks."

"And what, in God's name, do you mean to do, and where are you bringing me?"

"To Lunnon, Mr. Wathersheet."

"To London? are you mad? I'll go to the North Pole or the Red Sea first."

"To Lunnon we shall go, as straight as we can steer, if the wind will bide fair," said Murdoch determinedly; "an' noo ye're launch'd, William Wathersheet, an' under my command;—an' if ye mutiny on the road, by my faith I'll ha'e you informed against, an' hang'd by the way, before ye even get a sight o' the muckle punch-bowl that's whumlet on the top o' St. Paul's."

Weathersheet was so accustomed to succumb to the superior intellect of the ready Scot, that he made no reply, but continued to plod on. As they passed under the old burying ground at the rear of Arnwood Castle, the sailor pondered confessedly, as he went, upon the probable plan of his messmate, which was beyond his comprehension, but which he at length ventured to inquire about more particularly. In answer, Murdoch thus continued:

"An' so, William, we maun just go to Lunnon by back roads an' bye roads, if we can, for ye see that is the place for a' the blackguards, an' thieves, an' thief-takers in the kingdom; an' we'll find out wha really robbed the squire's hoose, an' particularly anent a wee thief they ca' Sammy, whom I shrewdly suspect of hiding the silver things in the Pilot's Mark, to turn the scent off the real thieves, an' to get our puir maister and us into this trouble; for I'll gie my bible oath I saw him, or his like, lurking about last night among the planting, though Lord Arnwood phoo'd an' phoo'd at me for saying it. But that's not all—dinna interrupt me, Will Wathersheet—I mean to get another thing in Lunnon that 'll do mair for the obtaining o' justice in this, the case o' my demented master an' myself, than ought else under Providence. I mean to get siller, William, siller!"

In short, the talkative Scotchman informed his companion that, having a brother in London, who was a thriving man, it was his intention to proceed forthwith to him, and get from him the means of procuring such evidence and such legal assistance as would probably obtain an effectual and speedy acquittal of Mr. Waltham, as well as himself and Weathersheet. As for their present flight, he argued that by it they would not only avoid the misery and ultimate risk of commitment and incarceration under so serious a charge, but would be enabled by their exertions to avert a misfortune, under which their unhappy master was too likely to sink.

It being far in the afternoon when Murdoch and his companion took their flight from the Mark, by the time they had travelled about eighteen miles, it had been long dark, excepting an occasional dim light which the moon threw over the lonely landscape. The spirits with which the poor travellers had set out was completely gone, and they began to feel sorely tired and distressed, and to look wistfully around them without speaking, for some house of entertainment and rest.

"Och, och! Mr. Macara, but this land travelling is a sad thing," at length said the sailor ruefully,—as he limped lamely along. "Give me a whole day's heaving at the windlass rather than this; I wonder who would travel by land as long as there was a fathom of sea, or even fresh water, to sail over. Do you not see any sort of cabouse-house ahead, Murdoch, over this dismal moor, for I am confoundedly hungry."

"Come awa, Wathersheet," said the Scotchman encouragingly. "Ye're a vera gude fellow, except for that constant yearning in your stomach."

"O, that I were sitting this minute, as I ought, on the weather-bow of my poor master's yawl," said the sailor sorrowfully—"just coming in with my fish after the night-tide, and looking out for the cobble-stone in the Pirate's Creek. But there is nothing here to remind one of the sweet sound of the waves along shore at Arnwood."

"Or the sweeter sound o' Mary Reynolds's frying-pan, skirling wi' the fish for supper; an' the blessing fire gleaming frae the Mark as ye gang hame wat an' weary, an' the smell o' the butter an' the ingans like Arabia! humph! man, it's enough to gie ane the cramp! the stomach to think o't."

"Murdoch, are you sure you have nothing at all of the prog left?" said Weathersheet, earnestly, his mouth gushing water at the Scotchman's tempting description.

"The deevil a morsel," said Murdoch, with a look of despair.

"God help us! and no port ahead! To be upon short allowance so early in our trip, and beating about here without chart or compass and nothing in the bread-room, neither prog nor grog. I cannot hold out, I'll heave to!" and poor Weathersheet, folding his legs under him with the grace of an elephant, tumbled himself down on the soft sod by the edge of the country road on which they proceeded.

"I'll tell you what, Will Wathersheet," said Murdoch, calling also a halt, and seating himself beside his grumbling companion—"if your stomach would only keep quiet, we're a deevilish deal better here under the wide sky, although it be black an' dark even now, an' lying sae soft on this bonny green turf, that smells like a rose, than in the stone-room under the jeweller's lock an' key in Barchester jail wi' our sorrowfu' maister; och, och! an' there's puir Mary Reynolds, an' our sweet lady Agatha—sitting by themselves greeting their een blind, nae doubt, in the Pilot's Mark, while we are on a pleasant jaunt to Lunnon."

As they continued to murmur and comfort each other alternately, while resting on the sod, the extreme stillness and solitude of their situation was after some time broken by the sound of approaching footsteps, which they heard long before the traveller drew near the spot where they sat.

"There's some comfort for us at last. I hear a bell!" said Murdoch rousing himself—"get up, Will Wathersheet, and let us hail this fellow. He'll at least be able to tell us our way; get up, man, an' put yourself in sailing trim, an' let us not be lying here under a hedge like twa tinklers."

With some difficulty the wearied sailor was induced to take to his feet again, and forward they were trudging slowly, as a stout man in a light great coat, and carrying a bundle, came up at a good pace.

"Good night, good night," were the words exchanged between the three, as the stranger would have passed.

"It's weary walking in the dark, friend," said Murdoch, striving to keep up with him.

"But you were sitting, or lying down just now," said the man somewhat suspiciously.

"Ye hae gude sight in the dark, neighbour," said Murdoch undauntedly. "Tweel we were just resting by the road side, an' might hae dozed a bit, the puddocks were croaking sae musical beside us; but if ye maun ken the truth, sir, we could nae sleep a wink for hunger."

"The log book never told truer," said Weathersheet, determined to speak up when food was mentioned, "and so we must follow you, sir, like two sharks in the shallows, to find our reckoning, as well as to fill our stomachs."

The man was at first a little startled at this pithy appeal from so powerful a man as Weathersheet, but after a little further colloquy, principally with the Scotchman, he promised to bring them where they should have something substantial to satisfy their hunger; "bet as for lodging, my friends," continued he, gruffly, "sheets and feather-beds are not to be had within ten miles, and if you can't walk the night watch, like brave fellows, why, you may sleep on the sod like many better men."

Our travellers were too glad to hear of victuals, to be very curious about what further this speech might import, and on the three trudged together, when turning up a narrow lane, it soon brought them to a small square house, which, neither quite like a cottage nor an ale-house, stood naked and dark by the side of the solitary by path. They were admitted by a door at the end into a place more like a storehouse for grain than ought beside, and the stranger striking a light, a large loaf of household bread, with meat, cheese, and other provender, was produced, and set before the hungry men; upon which Weathersheet in particular soon made a sensible impression, washing the whole down with long draughts of sour ale, the acid quality of which was never perceived by the eager imbibers, until they were filled to the throat.

"It'll be a dear job this, I'm fear'd," said Murdoch, in a monitory whisper to his companion, as, beginning to slacken in his own efforts, he continued to look with astonishment on the destruction of provender and liquor by the voracious sailor. "What do ye think the man'll charge for that sour drink, Will Watersheet," he added, as soon as the stranger's back was turned.

"First let us make sure of it," said Weathersheet, speaking as well as his crammed mouth would allow him.

"Godsake, man, will ye never be done worrying at that dry cheese," said Murdoch, losing all patience as he watched the endless devourer; "an' then ye drink the man's sour brout, just like a whale, never considering that sax an' sarpence is a' the siller I hae to carry us to Lunnon."

"Trust in providence, Mr. Macara," said the sailor, with his usual careless expression, after another enormous draught of the ale.

In spite, however, of the calculation of the cost, Murdoch's heart was beginning to warm wonderfully, after another good draught of the readily supplied drink; which, though sadly acid and stale, did not lack strength, and he and the stranger began to talk and crack jokes together in the most jocose and harmonious manner. In this pleasant chaffing the sailor soon joined also, when his mouth was cleared; and when the host next talked with pride and envy of the marine occupation, addressing himself to the former, nothing could exceed Weathersheet's delight, until their good understanding ended in the stranger proposing to try how he should look in the round jacket and canvass-covered hat, which, he said, so well became the other. This frolic was followed by Weathersheet putting on the light-coloured great coat and hat of the man, amid the compliments on his improved appearance, of the others.

"But what'll be to pay for our entertainment, friend?" at length, said Murdoch, his mind running forbodingly on the cost of all this good cheer.

"Do I look like a Jew or a publican, in this manly dress?" said the stranger proudly, as he strode backwards and forwards in the sailor's clothes. "Do I not rather look like the gallant son of a profession which would scorn to exact payment from the hungry and the needy, whom they alight upon in the course of the hazardous voyage of life, with the signal of distress hung out? Don't mention money, friends, for what you have eaten and drank; but if you will do me a kindness, let me have the pleasure of wearing this coarse, yet enviable, seaman's jacket, and I will give you in exchange the garment with which I have just parted; although, in point of money's value, what I give is more than double worth what it is my humour to take in exchange for it."

The Scotchman was making his acknowledgment for the stranger's hospitality with the gratitude the occasion demanded, while Weathersheet was surveying himself in the other's dress coat, and discussing in his own mind the strangeness of the proposal and the impossibility of such an event in his life as his ever becoming the wearer of of so unseaman-like an article, when he gave a look to Macara, with his accustomed submission, to ascertain what the Scotchman's mind was upon so doubtful a point. Murdoch looked first at the quality of the coat and then at the jacket, and soon gave his opinion in a whisper, with a decision which at once settled the business.

"The coat is superfine double-milled cloth," he said, "and worth three o' that tarry blue jacket o' yours, Will Watersheet. The man maun be mad to offer you sic a bargain, forbye the hat. Aye, catch at a bargain when ye can get it—that's my advice."

The exchange was in consequence of this monition instantly agreed to, not without some sulky uneasiness on the part of Weathersheet; and soon after, Murdoch and he rose to depart, their spirits having been further enlivened by a stiff bumper of brandy which the stranger produced from a stone bottle he had raked out from under some flax at the further end of the apartment.

"Ye're a generous, honest fellow," said Murdoch, shaking the man heartily by the hand as they stood at the door; but hearing a sort of giggle at the moment, and chancing to look upwards to the ceiling he perceived the head of a boy thrust down between the joists, the face adorned with a grin. The sudden apparition as suddenly vanished, and he caught only a single glimpse of the countenance of the concealed urchin: yet there was time enough for the idea of that very Sammy of whom he was in quest, to flash across his mind. Murdoch, however, had not a moment to ascertain the fact, but instantly departed; and as it was completely dark, the stranger further offered to conduct our travellers to the nearest public road, which he did, leading them across several fields, so that when they found themselves at length on hard ground they were perfectly unable to tell in what direction the house stood in which they had been entertained; and forth they proceeded by themselves with all the suspicion on the mind, at least, of the Scot, which the strange conduct of the man, and the unexpected appearance of the boy, whom he was almost assured was Sammy, gave rise to.

Before they had proceeded two miles further, however, the dreary solitariness of the way—for it was now perfectly dark, and the remaining fatigue of the previous day, together with their hearty supper and drink, became quite overpowering; and Murdoch, after two or three vain efforts to look abroad through the darkness, finding the turf by the road-side temptingly soft, proposed a halt, which was gladly acceded to by his drowsy companion, and down they both slid upon the luxurious sod, and in two minutes their cares and suspicions were forgotten in heavy and profound repose.

CHAPTER XXVII.

They who have drained the cup of voluptuousness to the dregs, have never in their lives, probably, enjoyed the luxury of sleeping on a road side in the open air, under circumstances that made it so delicious to our weary pilgrims; who never stirred or awakened until the sun began to shine through the transparencies of their eyelids, and the warbling of the lark began to mix in their slumbers with the soothing dreams of morning. The travellers were awake betimes; and having shaken themselves in the primitive and natural manner that the patriarchs did of old when they slept in the fields by night, they set forth highly refreshed and in immensely good spirits, to pursue their journey.

After walking some hours, they entered a pleasant village, and were just debating in which of the inviting public houses they might best satisfy their renewed appetite, of which Weathersheet began again to complain, when they observed a crowd round a post on which was placarded a hand-bill, which naturally also attracted their attention, and they stopped among the rest to read it. The paper proved to be a notice, or local proclamation, regarding a robbery lately committed in this neighbourhood, and particularly describing, with a view to his apprehension, a robust man wearing a light great-coat, as one of the persons supposed to have been concerned in it. The heart of Murdoch came to his mouth at the perusal; and pulling the gaping sailor by the arm, he hurried him out of the village without his breakfast, and with no other satisfaction than a few hasty exclamations and oaths, in language so terribly Scotch, that even Weathersheet could not make much meaning out of it, while he patiently and from habit submitted to the will of his companion. But all nature is furnished with what Paley calls compensations, and animals who do not reason are generally compensated by a large share of stubbornness, which, with them, answers all the purpose of reflection, saves much time and knowledge, and is, besides, a most useful and easily understood substitute for decision of character.

Accordingly, Will Weathersheet, by the time they had proceeded about a mile from the village, and were almost within hail of a small public house at a cross road, with a white board over the door, and the smoke curling temptingly from the chimney, began to mutiny a second time, and deliberately brought to, swearing that he would not pull another oar unless it were into port for breakfast.

"What do ye mean?" said Murdoch, gazing indignantly at him as he stood stock still, "standing there looking behint you, like Mrs. Lot?"

"What is the use of our running ourselves out like a sand-glass?" said the sailor; "the morning watch is long gone, and we shall have breakfast, or put helm up, by gad."

"De'il be in your wame, Will Watersheet; but ye'll be hanged for't yet. Will ye no come on?"

"Not a fathom till I see the breakfast kettle; and if we are to be hanged let us die with a full belly. Besides, Mr. Scotchman," added the seaman, looking as if he would argufy, "what is the use of running all the log off the reel in this confounded scrape, as if there was no one aloft to mind us poor fellows? If you were a thorough seaman instead of a half and half lubber, as you are, you would know that it is no use shifting to windward, and that fair and foul weather come alike from heaven: so all we have got to do is to stand by the canvass, and pull and pump until the gale blows out; and if we go down, why our time's come, an' it?"

"By my sang," said Murdoch, "ye talk just like my maister himself. Lord help us! we maun just submit, and I wadna be surprised but we were a' hanged together, like the three weavers o' Thurbowton."

Discussing thus, in humbler language, they entered the public house, and soon a clean and substantial breakfast was laid before them, of which they took, as the Scotchman said, "ample pennyworths." They were just discharging their reckoning, and preparing for the road, when two men of that equivocal half-gentlemanly appearance, and air of town-breeding, which carries such weight in country parts, entered the house. The two strangers looked at each other, and smiled knowingly, as they entered; and when Weathersheet got up to depart, they stepped forward and politely begged that, as he was just the picture of a person for whom they were in search, he would condescend to consider himself their prisoner.

"I've made sure of my breakfast, however," said the poor fellow to Murdoch, after he had recovered from his first surprise; "this comes of my hauling down my jack and sailing under false colours, but it is all one," he added, gallantly, as the man brought him out.

"What do you follow us for, my friend?" said one of the men to Murdoch, for the latter, without speaking, was proceeding along with them.

"He's an innocent man that you are taking up, sirs," said the Scot; "and I mean to gang before his betters wi' him, and see him righted."

"Do you, faith! you have much to do, friend, if your business is particular in the line of righting the innocent, that I can tell you. Then I suppose you mean to go into the dock to plead guilty yourself, Mr. Don Quixote the second? If so, come along."

"I'll tell my tale before your betters, when we're brought there," said Murdoch; "for right's right and truth is truth, all over the world."

"No doubt, honest friend; but right and truth, like many other good things, are not always the readiest at hand; but if you will interfere with our business, what is your tale, if it please your Scotchmanship?"

Murdoch here entered into the story of the changing of the clothes, but was quite unable to enlighten the inquirers as to where the house was situated in which this was said to have taken place, and other subsidiary matters.

"I'll tell you what, my man," said the fellow, "take a friend's advice, and keep clear of this business, if you do not wish to run the hazard of getting a free passage round the Cape, or an acquaintance with a certain professor, who will trouble you with a line to the other world; you had better leave your friend to himself, for although his stomach may be a little deeper than yours, as you say, his tongue is not quite so long; and as for his innocence, let the justices find that out for him."

"I told you before that it's no use striving to beat up in the wind's eye," said Weathersheet. "I know it will chop round if it has a mind, and if it has not, why we must just founder and go to Davy, that's all."

"It's nae use in me either, rinning myself off my legs then, and sleeping on road-sides at night," said the Scot, despondingly. "For there's naething goes right wi' either my pair maister or me for years by-gone, an' truth an' justice hae left the world, as far as I see; but whar are ye gaun to take William Watersheet, lads?"

"To the county jail to be sure; and if he can give a good account of himself, his stay will be the shorter."

"Deevil a word he can speak for himself, puir chield, if he should be hanged for it outright. I tell you I'll gang wi' him an' speak up for him."

"You'll speak yourself into a stone room, and perhaps worse," said the man, and they all urged Murdoch to leave them and keep himself out of trouble; to which, with much difficulty he at last assented, first forcing half of the little silver he had in his pocket upon his unfortunate comrade. "Noo, sirs," he said at parting, "be sure the lad gets his meat, and he'll do bravely; but if ye hunger him, my fegs, the sooner ye hang or banish him the better."

With many injunctions and good advices, Murdoch at last suffered himself to be torn from his reckless comrade, and taking different roads, the Scot proceeded doubtfully and disheartened by himself, to finish his journey to the great metropolis.

As Murdoch paced along, musing upon late events, the principal source of that inward vexation and despondency which he could not suppress, arose from his uncertainty as to the present prudence, or the probable effects of the steps he had taken. Dwelling sadly, as he went, upon his master's incarceration, he was inclined to blame himself for not accompanying him to prison, or, at least, remaining in the way, in case any turn in the old gentleman's fortune might make his (Murdoch's) own evidence useful in his exculpation. This was the sorest thought of all, and was often associated with ideas of his weeping mistress and Mary Reynolds, lingering about the Pilot's Mark, perhaps wondering at his absence, and looking sadly for his re-appearance; till at length the poor Scotchman was in fifty minds whether he ought not to return at once, and take his chance of what fortune had in store for him.

He still moved on mechanically, however, and as, on the following evening, he drew near to London, the expectation of meeting his brother, whom he had not seen for many years, and the thoughts connected with their early days, spirited him up, and induced him to hope better from the prosecution of the plan which first determined him to leave home. He would not suffer any qualms to cross him about his reception, but entered the city in good spirits; and after buffeting his way through many streets and turnings in the great Babel, and flinging back with interest the jeers of the cockneys at his Scotch tongue, and his barbarian look, he at length made out his brother's house, situated somewhere in the elegant vicinity of Barbican.

"There's a fine nicht, mem," he said, as he stepped into a well-filled snuff-shop, first looking all round him, and then addressing a fat woman behind the counter, with an awful bust, and a more awful expanse of lace and ribbons on her head.

"Good evening, sir," said the lady politely; "what do you please to want?" and she mechanically took up the snuff scales.

"Is the laird at hame, mem?" said Murdoch, delighted with his reception, and the goods and gear he beheld round him.

"The laird?" said the fat lady, haughtily, displeased at Murdoch's freedom of manner. "Whom do you mean, good man?"

"Isn't this William Macara's shop, mem?" said Murdoch taking another look round him.

"This is Mister Macara's shop, if it please you," said the lady, tossing her head like a duchess.

"Ou, nae doubt, mem," said Macara, civilly—"to be sure, his father was ca'd Mr. Macara afore him, but mair ordinarily, Deacon Macara o' Dumbarton—a sponable man was the Deacon, an' wore a cocked hat. Is your gudeman at hame, mem? for ye see, mem, I'm his brother."

The fat snuff seller turned green and yellow at this declaration, for while Murdoch and herself were talking, two other Barbican ladies of her acquaintance had entered the shop, and were prevented from addressing her by their wonder at her condescension in holding discourse with such a Hottentot.

The lady never dignified our friend the condescension of an answer to his enquiry, but broke forth into a shower of how-d'ye-do-ings to her gaudy visitors, whom she shook by both hands with all the warmth of female hypocrisy, while she left poor Murdoch standing as still, and looking as silly as the wooden Highlander who stood taking his everlasting pinch, for a sign to the passers by, at the door of the establishment.

Murdoch's drooping spirits were raised shortly, however, after standing for a time like an idiot, as he said, in the middle of the shop, by the appearance of his brother; who, red and rosy in face, and broad and buxom as an alderman, accompanied by a similarly comfortable tradesman, entered the shop. All Murdoch's early recollections crowded into his mind upon meeting the companion of his boyhood; who, though his manner now carried the precision of a man conscious of wearing a character, and his language was of that execrable mixture called cockney Scotch, received his humble brother with considerable warmth and kindness.

But Murdoch had the wit to observe, in the course of the evening, and at the setting forth of supper, that his presence seemed to give embarrassment, particularly to his brother's wife, and no entreaties would induce him to sit down at their table; so that he was entertained by himself in a small back apartment, where he was appointed to sleep. All this, however, was made up by the feeling with which his brother seemed to listen to his story, and the interest he appeared to manifest for him, which brought tears of fraternal gratitude into Murdoch's eyes; and he retired to rest delighted to find that he had yet a friend and a brother amidst his troubles, and that prosperity did not always render men callous to the misfortunes of their friends.

Next day, however, things were an appearance of alteration with the comfortable tobaccoist, and the first feeling seemed to have died wonderfully away. He now talked only of his trade, and his own comfort and greatness, and when Murdoch began to press him slightly regarding finance matters, he answered by giving him good advice, and blaming him with much suavity, and professed interest for his welfare, for attaching himself to such a falling house as Mr. Waltham's. In short, Mr. William Macara, tobaccoist, of Barbican, like many of higher station, was one of those worthy men, (if a Scotchman so much the more characteristic,) who have great admiration of generous and sympathetic actions, and, at first, a sort of intention to enact them themselves, when the occasion is presented; but who lose the stomach actually to perform such feats, so soon as reflection allows their naturally narrow and griping spirit to regain the ascendancy.

Poor Murdoch was sorely chop-fallen when this ordinary discovery of worldly knowledge did burst upon his unsuspecting and sanguine feelings, and he first tried remonstrances, and then his spirit rose into reproaches. But all this only made the matter worse, and determined his brother to get rid of one, who not only wanted him to give away money, but to plead guilty to certain faults and errors in his ways, a thing that was monstrous to think of, in any man who was independent. Accordingly as Murdoch began to feel indignant, and to take the high hand in sentiment, Mr. William Macara, tobaccoist, &c., with the special countenance and counsel of his wife, took the high hand in tangible power and might; and, finally, the petitioner and his complaints were driven forth out of a house which he only disturbed, as an impudent ne'er-do-well, who deserved to be unfortunate.

Our hapless Scot would have gone to Bow street to give at once all the information he was in possession of, both as to the robbery and Sammy, whom he was convinced he had seen a second time in the strange cottage. But the natural faint-heartedness and apprehension of misfortunes, and the moral cowardice which are so apt to hang over the consciousness of an empty pocket, together with his want of knowledge of the town, completely scared him; and as he was determined to submit to any privation rather than be beholden to his brother, he wandered about London for a time without any particular object, resolving to wait until he should see how Providence would dispose of him and his unhappy master.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

The private examination of Mr. Waltham, before commitment for trial, was soon hurried over, and was sufficiently conclusive against him; for opinions of guilt or innocence, like all other opinions, are much affected by inclination and prejudice. The proud sensitiveness with which he shrunk under the insulting and degrading questions that were put to him, was considered as evidence of conscious guilt; and his very silence, and look of piety and melancholy resignation, were turned against him, as the cunning acting of a mysterious plunderer, and the hypocrisy of a hoary but unfathomable villain.

Arnwood had an interview with him in the outer court of the prison, which was neither of long duration, nor at all satisfactory, at first, to the ardent spirit of the latter. For, instead of Mr. Waltham's sanctioning and co-operating in the plans he suggested, to bring about his acquittal, the old man begged of him earnestly to give them all up, and literally to do nothing directly, for the present, for fear of inveigling himself, and making matters worse, as appearances stood; but to leave the issue to time and the merciful disposal of Providence, making, if he pleased, only such indirect enquiries, and taking such measures, as might become useful in connection with whatever events might transpire in the interval preceding the trial.

The very calmness and heart-broken resignation of Waltham, under his wrongs and sufferings, now thrust, as he was, into this horrible place, among the worst of society, were dreadful to Arnwood to witness; but there was one subject in which the sufferer could not well command his feelings, and which he seemed carefully to avoid, and this was his daughter. A word—a look—and a grasp of the hand from Arnwood, were sufficient to satisfy him upon this point.

In the mean time, the disconsolate Scot, when he found all his pleasing dreams vanished, and himself driven forth upon the wide world, a stranger in the great city, without even a character, and no dependences, as he said, but on Providence and his wits, became as sad and miserable as thousands are prone to do under the same circumstances. Being forced to abandon, for the present, his intentions with regard to his master, and obliged to turn his efforts to the procuring of immediate subsistence, he naturally smelt his way towards the West End, and sagaciously planted himself behind great houses and about stable lanes, to catch, in this humble way, the windfalls of fortune.

He spent above a fortnight in such endeavours, but this being the season when the town was empty, and the great houses shut up, fortune, "the jade," never troubled herself to make one movement in his favour. It was in vain that he put himself upon short allowance, and looked starvation in the face, with all the bravery of a man who had been hardened by the world, and all the tough abstinence of his country. It would not do; and eschewing Bow street and all his former plans, for fear a worse thing should befall him, he at last with a heavy heart, and many wise reflections upon the remorseless progression of misfortune, set out to measure his way back, at least to the point where he had left his companion Weather-sheep.

He had plodded his weary way a considerable distance from London, when lingering for a while in front of an inn, in a pleasant village through which he passed, his attention was attracted by a spruce, sleek serving-man, who was regaling himself at an open window near the door, with a lusty joint of cold meat, and a buxom jug of ale before him, and causing the maidens of the house to laugh incontinently at his wit while thus pleasantly occupied. Murdoch could not help casting in at the window that look of expressive misery which a man whose mouth waters at others' good things is apt to give; but which, of course, greatly diverted the fellow, and gave opportunity to a pleasant joke, which made the wenches, who idled near, laugh above measure. However, one of the females thought fit to give the gallant a hint; and in order to show off a little before them, he forthwith addressed Macara.

"You seem rather low in the larder, old chap," said he, as Murdoch came up, and looked wistfully in at the meat and ale.

"Something toom in the inner parts, I'm free to confess, sir," said Murdoch with becoming humility.

"It is a melancholy thing to see so respectable a man as you evidently appear to be," said the footman, winking to the girls, "in this sort of unfortunate plight. Will you condescend to engulf a portion of this pre-butt? It is an imperial renovator, is the home-brewed, and will give you an edge like Goddard's razor-strop."

"Ye're a coevil fellow and has a pleasant eloquence," said Murdoch, so grateful for the glass and compliment, that his natural shrewdness had almost forsaken him; and indeed, as ye say, friend, it's a sair pity to see a Scotch gentleman, the son of Deacon Macara o' Dumbarton and Suss, obliged to be thankful for a bit an' a drap by the road-side, on his journey."

"So it is, indeed," answered the valet, with pretended pathos, and taking the hint, "and as you are pleased to hint, and as I have heard, that Eatwell is your brother to Drinkwell, suffer me, Mr. Deacon Macara, to affront your worship with this bone; which, properly applied, will be of great benefit to the empty viol of your sounding music case, and this lump of loaf-heel will be of particular service to your idle mastication, to remind them of busy days gone by; so, please pen, catch this bone, and commence:" and he benevolently thrust the meat and bread into the hands of the hungry man.

"Dood, sir, the bone's no to be ginned at, in time o' need," said Murdoch, with a sigh of injured dignity—but his pride and courage began to revive with every tag he gave at it, and every suck at the ale. He had nearly finished anatomising the bone, and was licking his chops and answering the wit of the charitable server with increased spirit, when the noise of a carriage approaching made the latter start, and deflag his brief greatness, and bounding to the door as it came up, he waited for it with all the acquired humility of an obedient lacquey.

A travelling carriage with four post horses soon came up, and stopped at the door. "Any intelligence, John?" enquired a voice from within, the moment it stepped.

"None whatever, sir," said the servant.

"Did you inquire particularly where I told you?" said the voice of a female, in a tone of anxious eagerness.

"I did, my lady, and they never heard of any such person," said the man.

A few words of murmuring sadness at some disappointment, was indistinctly heard, but the voice of the female struck Murdoch, as he listened, with sensations unaccountable to himself, and coming a little forward he tried to get a look of the fair complainant.

"Ah! do let us drive on," said the lady, leaning back in the carriage, but as she took her hand from her eyes, Murdoch obtained a glance of a beautiful and youthful face, that made him almost sink to the ground where he stood, from the effect it had in some rapid imagination or recollection that flashed at the moment through his brain.

"Mount and follow us," said a gentleman from within, to the wit-sporting servant, and before Murdoch had time to recover his bewilderment, the latter had mounted the horse which was held at the door, and the whole set off and were instantly rattling before him though the village.

"I'll hae another look o' that betsy laddy's face, if legs an' lugs will hold out," said Murdoch determinedly, "what's to hinder me to run a dozen miles after this comfortable refreshment," and away he set off at a rapid highland trot to follow the carriage.

He still managed to keep the vehicle in view, running with a great heavey, when he perceived coming forward on horseback from a cross road, a smart little gentleman with a red nose, and a white hat, who, as he came up, turned round and looked at him, as if doubtful whether to follow or pass on.

"By the ruby pimple of Bacchus's nose and the wings of Mercury's heels, if that is not the very man!" cried the gentleman, following Macara. "Hilloo! Mr. Scotchman! are you running for a wager, I'll back you against time, six to one, by gad."

"I canna speak to you, sir," said Murdoch continuing his race; "I'm running after a laddy."

"By the knee-buckle of a highland penny, you shall speak to me, sir," said Mr. Hulson, "or I'll take you prisoner. . . Pull up, I say! if you ran after ladies at that rate, Mr. Scotchman, you'll founder my mare."

"Oh sir!" said Murdoch beseechingly, stopping and taking breath, "dinna step me, if ye please, frae following the coach, for if I hae the sight of my ain c'en, an' a' my skill o' the sound o' a woman's voice, that is the daughter o' my pair broken-hearted maister, wha has been lost these three years, an' she's seeking him, nae doubt, an' he's seeking her, an' may die without ever the satisfaction o' seeing her."

"Your head's crazed, friend; besides, you're perfectly unable to proceed another step," said Mr. Hulson, as Murdoch stood panting with exhaustion. "It is in vain the year to attempt impossibilities."

"Naed, I believe sae," he answered resignedly, "naething gangs right wi' me mair than my maister, an' time an' chance, God's will an' man's mercy, must just make us or 'mair' for I can do nae mair;" and the poor Scot threw himself down on the road side, and covering his face with his hands, a few tears burst forth to relieve the oppression of his feelings.

Mr. Hulson, and the servant who accompanied him, sat about watching and encouraging him, and having explained that his presence was particularly wanted at a town about ten miles distant, besides giving him hopes of yet being able to trace the strange lady, they at length persuaded him to get up and proceed along with them.

It appeared that Mr. Hulson, being accidentally in the neighbourhood, and in fact having passed the night at the house of the magistrate before whom Weathersheet was carried, was present at his examination. The circumstances which then came out, induced him and his friend to exert themselves in tracing out further information regarding the robbery, the result of which was, that they succeeded in capturing the boy Sammy, under circumstances of considerable suspicion. But unfortunately it happened that Reynolds, Mr. Hulson's servant, having had a severe fall in London, was laid up in a hospital there, and there was no one to speak to the lad's identity; after some delay, therefore, fearing that Sammy would be discharged for want of evidence, Mr. Hulson determined to ride up to London, either to find out Murdoch, or by means of his own servant to clear up the matter of the robbery, and get both Weathersheet and his unfortunate master, if possible, acquitted. Having, however, fortunately met with Murdoch on the road, he hoped to get all explained, and the Scot was forthwith examined upon the subject.

But Mr. Hulson, with the sanguine feelings of a naturally honest and open mind, had calculated without his host; for although, on the evidence of Macara, the boy was fully committed by the cautious and experienced magistrate, yet the circumstances regarding the two others appeared to him so improbable, or romantic, that he detained them, likewise, in custody.

CHAPTER XXIX.

It is now high time that we should recall our reader's attention to that portion of Waltham's history in which the abduction of his eldest daughter by Bolton is referred to. Bolton was one of those men in whom strong passions, an instinctive bias towards evil, and a natural recklessness of consequences, are so constitutionally blended, that they leave the moral power utterly helpless and insufficient. The last named of these infirmities, the recklessness of consequences, was, however, in Bolton, anything but the hardness of a character conscious of its own wickedness, and resolved at all hazards to gratify its impulses and abide their results. In a word, there was a strange deficiency of the reasoning faculty in this man, with a remarkable elasticity in sinking into the gins and pitfalls of villany and baseness.

"He held this maxim ever in his view, What's basely done, should be done safely too."

Accordingly, his best caution was cunning, and his highest courage a feeling of secure impunity.

It was now that Mr. Waltham and his wife were gone, and his two daughters placed under the care of one who was likely to rest satisfied with extending to them such protection merely as his roof-tree, or his hearth afforded, that Bolton began to feel his spirit expand, and a fair field open for his operations. With the knowledge that Mr. Waltham was utterly at his mercy, he was assured that his daughter, after a short period, would be no less at his disposal; and if there should still be any compunctious and unreasonable virtue remaining, why, the old gentleman might easily be pacified, and the young lady rendered quiescent and resigned under the new circumstances by which he meant to surround her.

With these views and intentions he proceeded to set about his congenial task without delay. But here he found much greater difficulty than he had at first expected. In spite of the sedulous and delicate attentions which he had heretofore paid her, it was clear even to his own apprehension that he had succeeded in creating no very favourable impression upon Eliza Waltham; and it was obvious that any project meant to be successful, must be one of profound secrecy and consummate deceit. He revolved in his own mind, therefore, the best means of obtaining possession of her person first, and afterwards of compelling her to such terms as he should deem it expedient or honourable to offer.

It was one morning, about a fortnight after the departure of Mr. Waltham, that Bolton called at the house of Mr. Toller, with whom the daughters of his friend were resident, and requested a private interview with the elder on the plea of a particular communication which he was intrusted to make to her.

"I am sorry, Miss Waltham," said Bolton, with an expression of anxiety and concern in his face, "to be the medium of unpleasant intelligence; but a little awkward matter has occurred—don't alarm yourself—I entreat—your father—Miss Waltham—"

"What of him?" cried the alarmed girl, "tell me, sir, at once; surely nothing has happened—"

"Why, no," said Bolton, with a grim smile, intended for consolation; "no, nothing but what a little promptness will dispose of;" and he drew some papers from his pocket with an air of business.

"Oh! tell me, sir, how I can be of service—what can I do?"

"Why, madam," said Bolton, "my London agent was to have met your respected father at Antwerp, to furnish him with funds to proceed to Madeira."

"Well, sir?"

"He did so, bringing with him bills on Paris which he thought, reasonably enough, there would be no difficulty in negotiating there, but—"

"But what, sir?" cried Eliza, surveying the hesitating Bolton with surprise.

"Well, not to keep you in doubt, the house in Paris has failed, and the London drawers with whom they were connected have also stopped payment."

"Is that all, Mr. Bolton?" cried the young lady, greatly relieved by this disclosure, "that can surely have been but a temporary inconvenience—my father—"

"Ah! my dear Miss Waltham," said Bolton, pressing her hand, with a tender smile of mingled pity and interest, "you are, I perceive, quite unaware of the nature of these things. Madam, the ruinous effect of such a failure—the extent—"

"For heaven's sake, sir, be more explicit."

"Your father, Miss Waltham, is now in Paris—whither he was compelled to proceed upon the first intimation of this intelligence,—and there must remain, until an arrangement, which you alone can effect, be completed."

"Tell me, in mercy, Mr. Bolton, how my assistance can be of any avail?" cried the distressed girl, "and I will instantly render it to my poor father."

"Thus, then, we are situated," continued Bolton; "your father, with a prudence which I cannot sufficiently commend—for the protection and support of his family, was pleased to make over a portion of his property in your name; and it will be necessary, in order to remove this little untoward business, that you should assign the property to him; or, in other words, your presence in Paris is required before he can be extricated from his present situation."

"Let us fly at once, sir!" exclaimed Eliza—"I will instantly acquaint Mr. Toller with the urgency of the case, and place myself under your protection."

"Do you not think, Miss Waltham," said Bolton, as though respectfully tendering advice—"that that gentleman had better remain ignorant of this transaction, and, indeed, of your projected journey? I must confess, there seems to me many objections to his being made a party in this matter."

"I cannot myself see," said Miss Waltham, hesitating, "what possible objection there can be to Mr. Toller's knowledge of the circumstances?"

"The circumstances?" returned the other; "my dear madam, you alarm me; you do indeed;" and he shook his head, and lowered his brows meditatively, as though he were pondering on the best means of convincing her of the imprudence of such a step. "I feel it impossible, Miss Waltham," he resumed, after a pause, "to furnish you with such facts as must at once show you the ruin such a course would occasion. Let me, however, impress upon you the necessity of your instant departure for Paris—I cannot answer for the consequences to your family, should you delay it for a single hour."

In brief,—by half intimations and doubtful shadowings forth of evil, Bolton prevailed upon Eliza Waltham to accept his protection to Paris; whither she set out with him on that very evening, without acquainting Mr. Toller or her sister—or leaving any clue whereby her destination might be discovered.

It was clear to Bolton, that the most politic and safe method of proceeding—after he had entrapped his intended victim, was so to act during the journey, as should excite no suspicion in her breast, of his immediate or ultimate intentions regarding her. His demeanour was, accordingly, of the most respectful kind; and as the unhappy girl had hitherto been instructed to believe him one of her father's best and most zealous friends, and his present apparently gratuitous friendship was another and a strong evidence of his anxious desire to serve herself and her family to the utmost of his power, she was less disposed to suspect his real motive or intentions. Bolton, for his own part, well knew, that once arrived in Paris, the chances of detection or discovery were by very many degrees lessened—if not altogether extinguished; and he waited, therefore, in the calm consciousness of security, till their arrival in that city should place her utterly and for ever in his power.

Upon their entrance into Paris, Miss Waltham was somewhat surprised, instead of being conducted instantly to her father, as she had expected,—to be ushered into a handsome hotel, with an assurance that Mr. Waltham should be sent for forthwith. Hour after hour, however, elapsed, without the appearance of that gentleman, and vague forebodings of evil, and apprehensions of she knew not what, began insensibly to occupy the breast of his daughter.

"Permit me to insist, Mr. Bolton," she at length felt herself constrained to say, "that I be without delay conducted to my father. Surely, every hour is of imminent consequence to his peace of mind; he cannot be well, or he should have been here long ere now."

"Why, madam," replied Bolton with a careless air, leaning back in his chair, and looping his thumbs in his waistcoat, "as to that, I dare say the old gentleman is well enough; let us, if you please, drink his health," filling a glass at the same time, "and his safe arrival at Madeira."

"What mean you, sir?" cried the astonished girl, "is not my father in Paris?"

"Forgive me, my lovely Eliza," said Bolton rising, "if I confess that he is not; you know, my dear Miss Waltham, that love has many strange devices, and this is one of them—the excess of my passion for you may, perhaps, plead my excuse, and if the devotion of my life!"

"Villain!" exclaimed Miss Waltham, also rising and retreating a step, till the instant consciousness of the insult offered to her, recalled her to reason, while it filled her with indignation; "do you think, sir," she said calmly, advancing towards him, "that this contrivance to place me in your power will avail? You little know me," and she rang the bell with violence. "I will at once depart again to Brussels, and under the roof of Mr. Toller!"

"Jack Toller knows all," interrupted Bolton in triumph, "an accessory in the affair, my particular friend and colleague, and therefore, my spirited girl, you must stay with me," and he drank off a bumper of champagne.

At this moment a nondescript being, who, informed that the new comers were English, had been assorting from the ruinous storehouse of his memory such portions of the English language as were not altogether too faded for ready use, entered the room, enquiring—

"Did madame or monsieur want any thing?"

"Order me a carriage instantly, if you please," said Eliza to the smirking attendant.

"A carriage, madame, dere is no carriage."

"Begone, begone, fool," cried Bolton; "no carriage is wanted," and he slipped a retainer in his palm.

"Secret!" cried the Frenchman, "what a noise is dis, you vill distract de gentil-homme in de neat appartement;" and, shrugging his shoulders and eyebrows, he retired with a kind of inverted smile on his plastic visage. "Come, come," said Bolton, turning on his victim a look of determination, and seizing both her wrists with one hand, while he pointed with the other to her vacant chair, "sit down, and let us talk this matter over quietly. What reason on earth can there be for this foolish conduct? Look at me;—your father's friend, how can you suppose this any thing but an innocent stratagem to gain possession of my Eliza; be seated, and compose yourself."

"Betrayed and lost for ever," cried the unhappy girl, as she sunk into her chair in a passion of tears. "Oh! my father! how could you leave your children to the mercy of this villain!" and she buried her face in her hands and sobbed convulsively.

Bolton was all this while drinking his wine with a great deal of tranquillity, his hands in his pockets, and his eyes at intervals directed to the daughter of Mr. Waltham with an expression similar to what may be conceived of the gaze of an alderman upon a newly imported turtle.

"Nay, nay, Eliza, this is unkind," said he, at length, taking up the bottle and filling a glass, "you do me injustice by supposing me guilty of deliberate duplicity or baseness; but, my dear girl, what could I do? Jack Toller dared not appear to consent to your elopement with me during your father's absence, and I was compelled to resort to this measure, upon my soul I was; come now, drink this glass of wine, it will revive you," and he placed his hand upon her shoulder to enforce the request.

"Contaminate me not by your touch," cried the spirited girl, springing from her seat, and attempting to thrust him from her with all the little strength of which she was mistress, "approach me nearer and I shall demand assistance from below."

"Confound the little vixen—but this won't do," muttered Bolton between his teeth. He had just drank sufficient to stimulate his native impudence into brutality. Gazing at her for a moment with a pair of burning eyes, he began to sing, "Come live with me and be my love," in an alarming falsetto, and commenced dancing towards her with extended arms.

Miss Waltham, as he approached, uttered a piercing and protracted shriek, which for a moment paralysed Bolton himself, and in a minute after the door was burst open, and a young gentleman strode into the apartment.

"What, in Heaven's name, is the matter?" said he, as Miss Waltham clung to his arm for protection.

"Oh! save me, save me from that man."

"What am I to think of this, sir?" said the stranger, addressing Bolton; "will you explain?"

"Think what you please, and go to the devil," said Bolton, away to and fro; "hand over that woman to me—that's all—she's my wife."

"Oh! no, no, no," sobbed Miss Waltham; "'tis false—take me away from that man, and I will bless you for ever!"

"It appears to me, sir," said the stranger, turning sternly to Bolton, "as well from the appearance of this young lady, as from your own manner, that there has been some villain's work here. I shall take the liberty of affording my protection to this lady. 'Come, madam!'—and he moved towards the door.

"Will you, by—!" exclaimed Bolton, buttoning his coat; "no, no, young gentleman, that won't exactly answer my purpose;" and as he made towards Eliza, the stranger obstructed his progress.

The struggle that now commenced between the two was but of short duration, for the stranger, a young man of five-and-twenty, was far more active and powerful than Bolton; who, besides, not having foreseen the present emergency, had not contributed to the firmness of his footing by any exemplary display of temperance. Shaking Bolton violently from him, the stranger made to the door, from which Miss Waltham had already escaped; but, as if recollecting himself, advanced again towards him, and said, "I do not know, sir, that you are entitled to the assurance I am about to give you, that the young female now under my charge shall be, in every respect, taken due care of; as for yourself, if you require to see me, I am easily to be found during my stay in Paris;" and, throwing his card upon the table, he disappeared.

"Fool, idiot that I was!" exclaimed Bolton, when the stranger was gone, "to let the girl escape in this absurd manner—but I am doomed to disappointment and misery in every thing that concerns that infernal Waltham and his family. And who, I should like to know, is the young spark that has superseded me in so masterly a style," he continued, taking up the card from the table—"Sir Eustace Walford." Walford—Walford," mused Bolton, "sure I should know the name—a Lincolnshire family—ha! the young baronet just come to his fortune—hum—an awkward affair this, upon my soul!"—and the sobered sot fell into a long and profound reverie.

It would appear that Mr. Bolton's meditations were of no agreeable nature, for he paced up and down the room muttering curses and imprecations,—all his original brightness and florid splendour of cheek exchanged for the whiteness of malignant rage. Finding no rest for his troubled thoughts, he seized his hat and sallied forth into the street to a neighbouring café, the appearance of which seemed to invite him; and entering was soon buried in contemplation in one of the boxes, apart from the rest.

Not long, however, had he been thus situated, when a precise figure, habited in black, with an important walking stick in his hand, was seen to be moving over the floor with a formal but quiet step. As he approached the object to whom he seemed to be directing himself, and which, indeed, was no other than Bolton himself, a smirk was projected gradually into his countenance, and now, bowing and cringing before the other, he looked like an anxiously busy undertaker about to desecrate upon the curious felicity of his newly-contrived patent coffins.

"Sure my eyes do not deceive me," he lisped at length, "Mr. Bolton, is it not? this is too great a happiness."

"Who the devil are you?" said Bolton, eyeing the sable one with no friendly aspect; "I don't know you, never saw you before in my life, to my knowledge."

"Pardon me, my dear sir, you have seen me before, years ago, I admit," replied the other, with a low bow; "my name is Johnston, and many years back, I had some transactions with your revered father, when you, dear sir, were but an interesting lad. You are altered, Mr. Bolton; manhood has improved you—in fortune also—may I hope—eh?" and Mr. Johnston slid into a seat.

"Ha! Johnston, I am devilish glad to see you," cried Bolton, partially rising from the almost incumbent position in which he had been indulging, "give me your hand, my good fellow; I had forgotten you, upon my soul; well, how does the world use you, what are you about?"

"Why, dear sir," said Johnston cantingly, "it is a bad world, but there's no help for it. I was, till this very day, tutor to the young Lord Arnwood, a headstrong young man, very much so; we parted on bad terms, but I bear the youth no ill will."

"What! Lord Arnwood of the castle? the deuce you were, why I have just purchased—"

"I have heard it, my dear sir," interrupted Johnston, in a faltering tone, "I have heard of your purchase of New Hall in that neighbourhood; you are a thriving man, Mr. Bolton, yes you are, don't shake your head. I know it, and am very glad to hear it, upon my sacred word I am."

"Johnston," cried Bolton earnestly, rising of a sudden, "can you do me a service? but I know you can; come with me to my hotel and take a bottle with me."

"Too happy, dear sir, too happy," returned Johnston, bustling for his hat, and really glad of an opportunity of ingratiating himself in a quarter more likely than that which he had just relinquished, of furnishing lining for his decayed pockets. "I am quite at your service in any capacity that may afford me the means of showing how much I am your very humble servant."

"Well, my dear Johnston," said Bolton, when they were quietly seated over a bottle, which, indeed, rarely came unwelcomely to Bolton, and was not altogether ungenial to the other, so long as his own purse suffered no disparagement or diminution by the indulgence in it; "I want you to do me a particular favour," and here he recounted the events we have just related.

"It is, as you say, an awkward affair, certainly," quoth Johnston, when his companion had concluded.

"What, my dear sir, would you have me do?"

"I would have you keep a keen eye upon the spark and the young baggage—eh, Johnston? while I return to Brussels and tell some confounded lie in that quarter; what say you, my boy?"

"Why, under all circumstances, and sinking the morality of the thing, which I cannot altogether approve," cried Johnston, smiling forgivingly, "we must even do so," and he drank off his glass with the air of a professor of moral philosophy.

These preliminary plans being settled, our two worthies became the best friends in the world, and it was late in the night before they retired to rest to recruit themselves for the operations of the morrow.

CHAPTER XXX.

"Now, Mr. Scotchman, here you are a free man again," said Mr. Hulson to Macara, who was just discharged from durance; "and your master's trial will be on in three days; now, whether will you go to the assize town to him, or recommence your crazy chase after the lady?"

"Aro ye sure he had heard naething of her when you left, sir?" said the Scotchman.

"Perfectly certain."

"Noo, sir, ye said ye would help me to seek the lady, an' if ye will, I'll rin after her frae this to Johnny Groat. Oh, sir, will ye come?"

"It will be more important for me to look after Mr. Johnston. His evidence may be of great importance on the trial, for I must tell you, Macara, there have been strange doings at New Hall within these few days. Bolton and Johnston have quarrelled, and I have no doubt threatened to 'peach upon each other.'"

"Deevil, nor they scratch ane anither's sea out," said Murdoch, "if I only get a sight o' my maister's bonny daughter before the trial—so, sir—och! will ye just get me a bit poney that has lang wind and needs little meat, an' I'll ride the country until I find her."

After some farther colloquy, the Scotchman was accommodated, and off he set—his only confidence being in his natural impudence and sagacity, and, in the expectation that through the medium of all possible post-boys and serving men, whom he should meet, he might at last trace out the lady.

Mr. Hulson volunteered to accompany and assist him in his search, having also some views of his own in regard to Bolton, who had unaccountably left New Hall—and Macara having been somewhat trimmed up in his outward man, agreeing to act the part of servant, away they set forward together.

For two days they travelled without making out any intelligence on which they could rely; and in the evening of the second, Mr. Hulson, stopping at a cross road which led to the house of an acquaintance on whom he intended to call, sent forward Murdoch to the next town to make sure of dinner, or, at least, to order supper and accommodation for the night.

It was a consolation to Murdoch, as he went along, that if he had been as yet unsuccessful in tracing the lady, the town to which he was going was not above a day's journey from Barchester, the assize town; so that he should, at least, be able to see Mr. Waltham on the following evening, when as he thought all might yet be well. When he reached the inn door, to which he was directed, he found it quite a handsome establishment, and determining to be waited upon like a gentleman, he halted in front, and giving his horse to the ostler, stepped boldly into the hall.

He found, however, that the "saucy scum," namely the waiters and servants, of whom he found a crowd in the lobby, paid little attention to his orders, and less to his enquiries, being all in a bustle about company who were at dinner above stairs; till at length one of them, running along carrying an armful of dishes, asked him, without the least respect, either to lend a hand in carrying up the second course to the company above, or to get out of the way until his betters were attended to.

Murdoch having a natural turn for industry, mechanically took hold of a dish of partridges, and now assuming a business-like look, at once followed the others up stairs. Whether, however, he began to recollect on his way that he was the son of Deacon Macara of Dumbarton, or whether it was sheer ill-breeding that prompted him—instead of giving away the dish that he carried to the servant at the door, he passed on in the bustle, and walked straight into the apartment among the company.

The first thing the Scot set his eyes upon, as he turned himself in the centre of the lofty room, was the jolly face of the servitor, who, a short time ago, had regaled him with meat and ale at the inn door; and glancing to the company at the table, with his heart in his mouth, he discerned at once the beautiful features of Mr. Waltham's daughter, whom he well remembered from a girl, and of whom he had so long been in anxious pursuit. He was so riveted to the spot that he completely forgot himself and his situation, and uttering an involuntary cry of surprise, he missed his purpose in endeavouring to give away the dish that he held to the attendants, and let it fall at his feet.

The attention of the whole company as well as of the servants was by this time attracted to the man. Lady Walford raised her dark eyes and directed them towards Murdoch with a look of doubtful enquiry; but the momentary hectic that lighted up her transparent countenance, soon subsided, and she relapsed into that look of placid resignation so characteristic of her unfortunate parents. Sir Eustace only laughed and made some observation on the attendance at country inns; while, in the meantime, before Murdoch could recover his speech, he found himself absolutely driven forth from out of the apartment by the waiters and servants, with sundry undetected epithets, and muttered curses upon his Scotch awkwardness, to which it was by no means convenient on the instant to reply. He was not even clear, so great was his confusion, that by the time he was jostled out of the room and had reached the landing-place, the hinder part of his person had not been visited by the foot of some one of the better bred domestics, in a manner to which it hardly became the son of Deacon Macara of Dumbarton thus tamely to submit.

"Heek! but it's wi' mony kicks an' cuffs that a poor man gets through the world!"—he said at length, drawing breath as he descended the stairs. "But de'il may care, the bit an' the buffet is only some folk's lot, an' it has aye been mine, but I hae found my maister's daughter, an' we'll a' be happy an' joyfu' yet. Och! what a blessed meeting it'll be, but I'll no say a word till the gentry aboon hae done their dinner, an' then I'll kick every skunkie in the place wi' my ain foot!"

Meditating an exploit of this kind, when the tables should come to be turned, and upon what he should say to the lady above, Murdoch waited patiently for some time in the hall, every moment also expecting the arrival of Mr. Hulson. The only thing he could learn as he tarried regarding Sir Eustace and his friends was, that they had been twice at the present inn, as they travelled, within the last few days.

Murdoch was just drinking in this information from the gossip of the servants, when three gentlemen on horseback stopped at the entrance, and presently dismounted and entered the inn. On hearing Mr. Hulson's voice among them, the Scotchman ran forward, and recounted the success of his diligent researches with a triumphant pride, which not even his joy at the discovery enabled him altogether to keep in the back-ground.

"Where are these well-timed people, my sagacious friend?" cried Hulson, in a transport, making his stick rebound from the floor on which it was with such energy caused to descend; "by my faith, Macara, we shall be too much for the rascals yet!" and as he spoke, the Scot was already on the way trotting up stairs and mumbling unintelligible transports.

"Gentlemen!" exclaimed Hulson, as he entered the room without ceremony: "there is one here, I am told, interested in the fate of Mr. Waltham, and——"

"I am that person, sir," cried Sir Eustace, rising and approaching the stranger; "speak, my dear sir!—have you any information touching the residence, or the fate of Mr. Waltham?"

"Waltham," repeated Hulson, looking in the other's face; "is it possible, sir, that you are the son-in-law of the mysterious tenant of Lord Arnwood, who is now in such jeopardy?"

"What is it you say, sir? know you Lord Arnwood,—what mysterious tenant?"

"Oh! dinna ye ken me?" exclaimed Murdoch, coming forward. "Oh, this is a happy day! Oh, your pair father will be saved yet as sure as a gun—an' I'll gang mad wi' joy."

"What of my father?" exclaimed a female voice as a young lady rushed forwards,— "What voice is that?" and Lady Walford, supported by Sir Eustace, fixed her eyes on Hulson, and then on the Scotchman.

"Your father is safe, lady," said the Scotchman, with tears of joy. "Oh! now I see ye havena forgot puir Murdoch. What a joyful meeting it will be, considering your father's deep distress."

"My father's distress!" exclaimed Lady Walford;—"where is he? let me see him! tell me, honest Murdoch, where I may go to him, and Agatha, and——"

"Your father, my lady, is at this moment in sadness and sorrow," said Murdoch; "but God above hears the groans of the prisoner, and frees them that are doomed to die."

"Prisoner! doomed to die!" and Eliza grew pale, and clung to her husband for support.

Mr. Hulson now addressed himself to speech, and in a succinct manner explained all the peculiar circumstances attending Mr. Waltham's case, both before the robbery and since his committal to Barchester jail; concluding with an elaborate resumé of those after occurrences which, by the blessing of God, he hoped would be available in the prostration of the deeply laid scheme whereby Waltham's ruin was sought to be accomplished.

"Well, my friends," said Hulson, as he concluded; "what say you to our instant departure for Barchester; where I have drawn into a focus an accumulation of evidence which I cannot but think will be successful. Your friend Weathersheet and the egregious Sammy will be there," he continued, turning to Murdoch; "together with his worthy coadjutor, who by this time will, doubtless, have recovered his own drab great coat.—And now, let us be gone."

This arrangement was joyfully acceded to by the party, and having ordered post-chaises they set forth, not a little anxious and impatient for the result of the trial, which was, in all probability, once more to return Mr. Waltham to tranquillity and honour.

CHAPTER XXXI.

In the mean while Lord Arnwood had been indefatigable in his attentions to Agatha, during her father's constrained absence from the Pilot's Mark, and in constant communication with Waltham himself, as often as the prison regulations permitted his visits. But, in spite of all the consolation which he was able and solicitous to afford him, it was too evident that the unhappy prisoner drooped strangely, and that, whether from inward anxiety, or the length of his imprisonment, or both, Waltham was rapidly sinking into a state of weakness and exhaustion, which Arnwood much feared no result of the trial, however fortunate and satisfactory, would suffice to counteract.

Arnwood had, indeed, received, during the pending trial, several indirect overtures from Bolton, through the medium of Johnston—to the effect, that if Waltham and his family would quit the country, he would forego the prosecution, and, moreover, prepare the execution of a deed, whereby a sufficient stipend should be secured to the latter during his life time, with a provision for his family after his death.

But Arnwood, without consulting Waltham, peremptorily rejected every offer of this nature. With a perfect knowledge and scorn of Bolton and his minion Johnston, whom the former, neglecting his usual prudence, had chosen as his agent in this matter, the young man chose to indulge that implicit reliance upon immutable justice and an all-seeing Providence, which not only "shape our ends," but prepare and encourage us in a concurrence with them—and be waited, therefore, without losing a jot of heart or hope, till the day of trial, in which he thought he saw the hour of deliverance should come round.

Bolton, however, and that unflinching lover of morality, his colleague Johnston, were upon no such easy terms with each other or themselves. Those two gentlemen, seated in a small parlour at New Hall, and encouraged by the amiable presence of the small but important Justice Wragg, were, early on the morning of the trial, fortifying themselves against the influence of a keen autumnal air, by the absorption of brandy, in which the justice, with many shrugs and smirking protestations of dislike, declined a participation. That worthy functionary, indeed, after many compliments addressed to Bolton, upon his public spirit in thus making an example of a delinquent for the special benefit of the country, took his myriad-bowing leave, having to attend the judge in an official capacity on his procession to the court-house.

Bolton and his friend, thus left to themselves, relapsed into an awkward and uncomfortable silence, which was, however, soon broken by the former.

"I'll tell you what, Johnston," said he, "curse me if I like this morning's business at all; we shall never get the old gentleman comfortably hanged or transported"—and he drained his glass. "That prig Arnwood, whom you, Johnston, like a fool and a rascal as you are, instigated me to insult and quarrel with, will be too much for us, I fear."

"Really, Mr. Bolton," returned Johnston, with a serious and offended air, "this is language which I am not accustomed to; you know that I was not the cause of that rupture; besides, what power can a poor devil like him possess—a man of your property?"

"It won't do, Johnston, it won't do," interrupted Bolton, with bitterness; "I tell you it won't do in a case like this, and you know it."

"Well, sir, we must take our chance, that's all," said Johnston, with assumed composure, but quailing wretchedly; and as he spoke he buttoned his precise black coat closely, and felt his walking stick, shaking himself as though the coldness of the morning affected him.

"And where, I should like to know, is that scoundrel Hulson?" demanded Bolton. The other shrugged his shoulders, and shook his head, but said nothing.

"Ah! Johnson, we've got ourselves into a precious pickle; we have, indeed," continued Bolton, "but there's no help for it, and now it's time to be off, so take your hat, and keep up your spirits, my boy;" and he slapped his companion on the shoulder, "and when we return, we'll make a night on 't, my old buck, eh?"

Mr. Johnston slowly received his hat, which the other placed with a familiar thump on his head, and with a grievous sigh, accompanied his friend to the court.

It is hardly necessary to say that a great sensation had been created in the neighbourhood by the robbery at New Hall, and the committal of its suspected perpetrators; and still less so, perhaps, to inform the reader, that in a remote county the assizes are an event of no slight importance, and the cause of no small excitement to the inhabitants. No wonder, therefore, that the court should have been crowded upon this great occasion.

At length, the arrival of the judge proclaimed the trial at hand, and the unhappy prisoner was in due time placed at the bar. Certainly, if the appearance of a man under such circumstances were at any time an evidence of his guilt or innocence, (and that, in the minds of the spectators at least, such evidence is of no small weight, is well known,) Mr. Waltham must at once have been proclaimed guilty. During his confinement he had worn away to a skeleton, his eyes were sunk deep in the sockets, and the hair still remaining on his temples had turned to a bleached and arid whiteness. The serenity of his pale countenance, and the composure of his eye, however, which was ever and anon directed at Bolton with a steadfast and scrutinising gaze, went far to counteract the unfavourable impression which his first appearance had excited.

The prosecutor's case was stated at considerable length, and with great clearness and precision, by the counsel employed for that purpose, and nothing was left untold that could, even by the most subtle ingenuity, be supposed to refer to any other party than Waltham, aided by his servant Macara, who had not hitherto been discovered. Indeed the whole of the evidence went to fix the commission of the robbery upon them alone. Mr. Bolton by this time had regained sufficient composure to detail with all the damning accuracy of a prosecutor acting upon public grounds, his interview with Waltham in his own garden; the attempt of the latter to murder him, and the subsequent robbery in his own room; the perpetrator of which, as well from the manner as the ineffectual attempt to disguise his voice, he solemnly believed to be the prisoner. Mr. Johnston, also with much solemnity of measured phrase, deliberately swore how he had been in like manner placed in bodily fear, and maltreated in his sleeping apartment by a person to whose identity he had no hesitation in swearing; and he accordingly denounced and inculpated the hapless Murdoch, who was by this time perspiring and clenching his hands together in an obscure corner of the court.

The evidence of the servant was next taken, who proved satisfactorily the fact of Macara's warlike appearance before the door of the house, brandishing a drawn sword, and otherwise evincing hostile intentions; and now the crowd gazed at each other, and next at the prisoner, with a manifest expression of belief, that Waltham's case was henceforth utterly hopeless. Mr. Wragg, likewise, the small but great Mr. Wragg, looked around, but for a different purpose. That indefatigable justice met many a welcome and approving glance from the gentry within eye-shot; an ample reward for his promptitude in bringing so heinous an offender to condign punishment, and accordingly he rubbed his hands and indulged himself in an extra pinch of snuff with a marked emphasis and appropriate action.

Waltham, who had, during the trial, appeared to stand at the bar in listless apathy, being called upon for his defence, raised his eyes to heaven, and seemed about to speak, for his lips moved, but no sound came from them; at length, he directed his eyes towards Arnwood, motioning faintly with his hand, and sank back in a state of insensibility.

Lord Arnwood having been sworn, proceeded to relate, with a coherence and minuteness that admitted not of doubt,—the period of his departure from the house of Mr. Stone—the proceedings at the ale-house—the questionable appearance of the men, and of Sammy in particular, and the subsequent conversation between them which he had overheard in the fields. He further deposed to the search that he had made, at the instigation of the prisoner's daughter, for her father, and its success, in company with Agatha, the sailor and Murdoch; and lastly, his expedition to New Hall, reinforced by the two latter, in an attempt to preserve the property, or to secure the robbers.

Great was the astonishment of the court upon the hearing of this evidence. The judge leaned back in his seat in unquiet and doubtful expectation—Bolton and Johnston exchanged looks with each other, of nearly equal value and apparent similarity. Mr. Wragg blew his nose with startling violence, and applied to his box with a more than usual celerity—and the spectators arranged themselves in their seats, as if awaiting some further and more important disclosure.

Nor were they disappointed. "May it please you, my lord," said the owner of that voice, as he seemed to arise from the crevices of the floor, and by degrees to expand into and to assume the form of a short man with a red nose and a pair of piercing eyes—and no sooner were these words uttered, and this vision seen, than the prosecutor and his principal witness changed respectively into ghastly white and forlorn purple,—“may it please you, my lord,” proceeded the little man, whom the reader will, without our instruction, have conjectured to be Mr. Hulson—"I think I have evidence by me, and now in court, which cannot but prove satisfactory to all parties"—and he took a cool survey of the astounded Bolton and the trembling woe-begone tutor. And here Hulson, who was perfectly a man of the world, and knew with marvellous exactness all the technicalities and nicer shades of the law, laid before the court a mass of accumulated evidence which acted altogether as a demolition of the sworn statements of the prosecutor and his accomplice, and concluded by causing his man Reynolds to mount the witness-box, to the almost irrepressible curiosity of the court.

Reynolds, in his turn, disclosed fully his passive participation in the robbery at the Hall, giving up the real names of his accomplices, with such further particulars as his exclusive knowledge of the parties enabled him to afford—and now the aspect of affairs began to assume a more favourable colour for Mr. Waltham.—And now Johnston, with a peculiar prescience with which a man in his circumstances is wont to be gifted, began

To see as from a tower, the end of all, and decided in his troubled mind, that it was high time he should be as far distant as possible from the present scene, in as short a space of time as human locomotion could enable him to transfer himself; and was stealthily receding from the court.

"May it please you, my lord, to order that gentleman in black to remain in his place;" cried Hulson, addressing the judge; and in a moment the hapless Johnston was quietly conducted under the protection of an officer, back to his seat—"we have more evidence behind, which it may be interesting to him to hear," and as he spoke, the discomfited fugitive groaned audibly.

"My lord," resumed Hulson, with the composure of an adept, and in a professional tone, "we have obtained permission from the magistrates at — to produce, under charge of an officer, two worthies whom I wish to introduce to the court; here, you gentleman in the great coat, step forward, and, for once in your life, let us hear the truth from you."
